

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

VOLUME 113.

INTERSTATE TRUST & BANKING CO. et al. v. DIERKS LUMBER & COAL CO.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. Oct. 19, 1908.)

1. RECEIVERS (§ 204*)—DISCHARGE—EFFECT.

On the final discharge of a receiver, he ceases to be a representative of the court, and can neither sue nor be sued as the representative of the estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

2. RECEIVERS (§ 210*)—FOREIGN RECEIVERSHIP—ACTION BY FOREIGN RECEIVERS.

Though receivers were appointed by a foreign court, they may maintain an action in this state, either under rules of comity or those of law, to recover the purchase price of goods sold defendant after the property had come into their possession as receivers; and, in determining their rights to sue as receivers, the case will be treated as if they had been appointed by courts of this state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. § 417; Dec. Dig. § 210.*]

3. ABATEMENT AND REVIVAL (§ 45*)—TRANSFER OF INTEREST—TERMINATION OF RECEIVERSHIP.

Under Rev. St. 1899, § 764 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 743), providing that, when an interest is transferred in a pending action other than by death, etc., the action shall be continued in the name of the original party, the transferee indemnifying the party in whose name the suit is continued, or the court may allow the transferee to be substituted, the discharge of the receivership of a corporation, pending an action by the receivers, would not abate the action, but the corporation could be substituted as plaintiff, or the receivers, and the corporation might elect to continue the action in the name of the receivers, they being regarded as trustees of the corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abatement and Revival, Dec. Dig. § 45*; Receivers, Cent. Dig. § 236.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; J. H. Slover, Judge.

Action by the Interstate Trust & Banking Company and another, receivers, against the Dierks Lumber & Coal Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Kirkpatrick & Schwind, for appellant.
Haff & Michaels, for respondents.

JOHNSON, J. This is an action on an account for merchandise sold and delivered to defendant by plaintiffs as receivers of Powell Bros. & Sanders Company, Limited, a corporation created under the laws of Louisiana. Material facts appearing in the record, stated chronologically, are as follows: December 1, 1905, plaintiffs were appointed receivers of Powell Bros. & Sanders Company, Limited, by the district court of Vernon parish, La. They qualified as receivers, and became possessed of the assets of the corporation. In February or March, 1906, they sold and delivered to defendant, a lumber merchant doing business at Kansas City, lumber in car load lots of the total price of $5,336.88. The account fell due the 1st day of May following, and all of it was paid by defendant, except $642.15, to recover which amount plaintiff brought this suit in the circuit court of Jackson county, on the 10th day of September, 1906. Defendant answered, and filed a counterclaim for $890 damages, alleged to have been sustained by it in consequence of a breach by plaintiffs of a contract to sell and deliver other cars of lumber to defendant. December 20, 1906, the district court of Vernon parish, La., made an order in chambers in the receivership proceeding, from which we quote: "First. That the Interstate Trust & Banking Company and Thomas C. Wingate, receivers of this court of the property of Powell Bros. & Sanders Company, Limited, are hereby discharged as such, and relieved of full responsibility in the premises, and are hereby authorized and empowered and directed to deliver and restore to Powell Bros. & Sanders Company, Limited, all of the property, assets, and effects of said company in their possession as such receivers, taking from said company receipts and releases in triplicate, one of which receipts shall be filed herein. Second. That the bond tendered by Powell Bros. & Sanders Company, Limited, in the sum of $25,000, with the United States Fidelity & Guarantee Company, as surety, to guarantee the payment by Powell Bros. & Sanders Company, Limited, of all lawful debts of said company now unpaid (except the debts purchased by D. G. Sanders in his individual name, or in his trade name of D. G. Sanders Lumber Company), is hereby accepted and approved and ordered filed herein. Third. That Powell Bros. & Sanders Company, Limited, shall assume and pay, as and when due, the accounts payable of the receivers herein, and shall pay within six months from the date of this order all the lawful debts of said Powell Bros. & Sanders Company, Limited; and, in the event of their failure to do so, the court reserves the right to retake the property and place the same in the hands of its receiver or receivers. * * * Fifth. That the receivers shall forthwith proceed to pay out of the funds placed in their hands by Powell Bros. & Sanders Company, Limited, the debts of the receivership that are now due and payable. Sixth. That as soon as said debts are paid, said receivers may apply for final discharge and the cancellation of their bonds." It does not appear that any order was made subsequently for the final discharge of the receivers. Before trial defendant filed an amended answer and counterclaim, in which, to the other defenses, it added one in the nature of a plea in abatement, as follows: "As a further defense, and without abandoning or waiving any other defense pleaded herein, defendant denies that plaintiffs are receivers of Powell Bros. & Sanders Company, Limited, and alleges the fact to be that, since the commencement of this action, and since the filing of defendant's first amended answer herein, the plaintiffs have been, by the order and judgment of the district court of the state of Louisiana, under which they claimed appointment, discharged and dismissed, and are no longer qualified or acting receivers of Powell Bros. & Sanders Company, Limited; that plaintiffs are not in possession of any of the property or assets of Powell Bros. & Sanders Company, Limited, and have no right, title, or interest in the subject-matter of the cause of action set up in the petition, and are not entitled to maintain this action." A jury was waived by the parties, and after hearing the evidence, the court found all the issues in favor of plaintiffs, and entered judgment in their favor for the full amount demanded. Defendant appealed, and presents for our determination but one contention, viz., that plaintiffs were disabled from prosecuting the action by their discharge in the court which appointed them.

On the final discharge of a receiver, he ceases to be a representative of the court, and becomes functus officio. High on Receivers (3d Ed.) 767. He can neither sue nor be sued as the representative of the estate. But should we concede (and we do so only arguendo) that the order before us was the legal equivalent of an order for the final discharge of the receivers, we do not perceive any good reason for holding that such discharge compels the abatement of this suit.

Plaintiffs brought the suit to enforce a contract of sale they made, as receivers, with defendant. Though appointed by a foreign court, they were entitled to enforce a demand of such character in the courts of this state, either under rules of comity or those of law. The subject of the contract they made with defendant being the sale of property of an estate already reduced to their possession as receivers, there can be no question of their right to sue in a jurisdiction foreign to that of their appointment. Robertson v. Staed, 135 Mo. 135, 36 S. W. 610, 33 L. R. A. 203, 58 Am. St. Rep. 569. And we shall regard the question before us as though it had been raised in an action brought by receivers appointed by a court in this state.

The effect of an order discharging the receiver, and restoring the estate to the corporation during the pendency of a suit properly brought by the receiver in his representative capacity, is not to compel the abatement of the suit. In such cases the provisions of section 764, Rev. St. 1899 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 743), should be applied, and the corporation, treated as the transferee of the cause of action, should be substituted on its motion, or the motion of the receiver, as the party plaintiff. Should the parties to the transfer elect to proceed with the cause in the name of the receiver, they should be permitted to do so, and thereafter the plaintiff should be regarded as the trustee of the transferee, and not as the representative of the court. This would be in accord with the plain purport of the statute, and would do no injury to any right of the defendant. It follows that no error was committed by the court in the refusal to dismiss the action on the ground under consideration.

The request of plaintiffs that 10 per cent. damages be awarded for vexatious appeal is denied, and the judgment is affirmed. All concur.

TEXAS & P. RY. CO. v. STOKER.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Nov. 4, 1908.)

1. STATUTES (§ 124*)—SUBJECTS AND TITLE OF ACTS—ACTS RELATING TO MORE THAN ONE SUBJECT.

Acts 30th Leg. c. 24 (Gen. Laws 1907, p. 509), approved May 25, 1907, is entitled "An act providing for the appointment of official stenographers for district courts by the judges thereof to report cases, and providing for the method of making up and filing the statement of facts of all evidence introduced on the trial of causes, providing for the time within which such statement of facts must be filed, and providing for the appointment of special stenographers in county courts, for their compensation, and for making and filing statements of fact in civil causes tried in the county courts," etc. Held, that the title does not contain more than one subject, in contravention of Const. art. 3, § 35, since the different provisions of the statute relate to the preservation by the proper persons of the evidence taken in trials and of questions arising out of it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 644*)—STATEMENT OF FACTS—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—ORIGINAL STATEMENT—DEFECTS—WAIVER.

Acts 30th Leg. c. 24 (Gen. Laws 1907, p. 509), approved May 25, 1907, after providing several methods in which statements of fact may be preserved, provides that the original statement of facts shall be sent up on appeal. There is no conflict between the act and Acts 30th Leg. c. 7 (Gen. Laws 1907, p. 446), approved May 14, 1907, except as to the time in which the statement must be filed, so as to allow the filing of the conclusions of the trial judge after the adjournment of court. Held, that while the original statement of facts, and not a copy, should accompany the record, the appellate court may consider the copy, since appellee's objections to such course, because of the additional cost of the transcript and the lack of authenticity of the copy, might be waived by appellee, and the first objection, if urged, would be satisfied by adjudging the additional expense against appellant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 644.*]

Certified questions from Court of Civil Appeals of Second Supreme Judicial District.

Action by I. A. Stoker against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Questions certified by Court of Civil Appeals to the Supreme Court. Questions answered.

H. C. Shropshire, for appellant. Stubblefield & Patterson and J. S. Sheppard, for appellee.

WILLIAMS, J. Certified questions from the Court of Civil Appeals of the Second District as follows:

"The above entitled and numbered cause is pending before us on appeal from a judgment against appellant and in appellee's favor for $1,230 as damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the operatives of one of appellant's passenger trains in failing to give warning of its approach toward a public road crossing near the town of Eastland, over which appellee was driving, as more particularly shown in our opinion on a former appeal. See Tex. & Pac. Ry. Co. v. Stoker, 103 S. W. 1183. On the present appeal no original statement of facts has been filed in this court, as provided in the act of the Thirtieth Legislature approved May 25, 1907 (Gen. Laws 1907, p. 509, c. 24), relating to the subject, and the assignments of error are such as cannot be considered in the absence of a statement of facts. We have, however, a copy of what purports to be a statement of facts incorporated in the transcript. The judgment from which this appeal is prosecuted was rendered on August 7, 1907, the term of the court adjourned August 24, 1907, and the statement of facts, as shown by the incorporated copy, was thereafter filed within the time allowed by the 20-day order therefor. We have a number of cases before us in like condition as to statements of fact, and in view of the decision of the Court of Civil Appeals of the Sixth Supreme Judicial District in the case of Garrison v. Richards, 107 S. W. 861, holding that under the act of the Legislature referred to statements of fact so incorporated in the transcript cannot be considered, we deem it advisable to certify to your honorable court for decision:

"First. Whether or not the title of the act of the Thirtieth Legislature of Texas approved May 25, 1907, providing for the appointment of stenographers, etc. (Gen. Laws 1907, p. 509, c. 24), contains more than one subject, in contravention of section 35, art. 3, of the Constitution?

"Second. If not, then are we authorized under said act to consider the statement of facts incorporated in the transcript in this case?"

1. The first question is answered in the negative. The different provisions of the statute, as stated in the title, may all be considered properly as the regulation of one subject, which is the subject of the bill, viz., the preservation by the proper persons of the evidence taken in trials and of questions arising out of it, and the statement thereof in authentic form for the information of the appellate courts upon appeal. The provisions for the appointment and compensation of stenographers are incidental to and in aid of this general purpose, and we see no good reason why all of the provisions could not properly be included in one bill.

2. Two questions are involved in the second one stated in the certificate: (a) Do the provisions of the act referred to, which forbid the copying of statements of facts into records and require the sending up of the originals, apply to all statements of facts? (b) If so, may the Court of Civil Appeals, nevertheless, consider that before it? Act May 25, 1907 (Laws 30th Leg. p. 512, c. 24) § 15, after providing several methods in which statements of facts may be preserved, adds that "no statement of facts shall be incorporated in the transcript on appeal, but the original shall be sent up therewith." Considering comprehensive treatment of the subject throughout the law, this language could leave no doubt upon the first question, but for the passage of another act, not only at the same session, but upon the same day, which, however, was approved on the 14th day of May. Gen. Laws 1907 (30th Leg.) p. 446, c. 7. The law last referred to would appear, when considered by itself, to be intended to continue in force the rules under which statements of facts had always been prepared by the parties in cases where no stenographer's report had been prepared (Middlehurst v. Collins-Gunther Co., 100 Tex. 349, 99 S. W. 1025), and, being passed at the same time with the other, suggests that the other may have been intended to regulate only those cases in which stenographers were employed, leaving others subject to be regulated by different procedure. If the two acts could be made to operate together by such a construction consistent with the terms of both, it would be our duty to adopt that construction; but it is impossible to so restrict the act approved May 25th without doing violence to its language. In unmistakable terms it provides for the making up of statements of facts in both of the methods previously recognized, and as to both provides that the original statement, and not a copy, shall accompany the transcript. There is no conflict between the two acts, except as to the time in which the statement is to be filed, and no question depending on that conflict is presented by the certificate. The purpose of the act of May 14th was to amend the previously existing statutes, so as to allow the filing of the conclusions of the trial judge after the adjournment of court; and this probably explains its passage, notwithstanding the adoption of the other statute containing full provisions for the making and filing of statement of facts. We must hold, therefore, that the original statement of facts, and not a copy, should have accompanied the record.

It does not follow necessarily that the Court of Civil Appeals may not consider the copy. The appellee would have the right to object to the course pursued for but two reasons that we can see, which are (1) the additional cost of the transcript and (2) the lack of authenticity of the copy; the statement of facts being authenticated by the certificates required to be upon the original, and the clerk being no longer authorized to certify to a copy. These objections could certainly be waived by the appellee, and the first, if urged, would be satisfied by adjudging the additional expense against the appellant.

The certificate does not give sufficient information to enable us to determine definitely whether or not the Court of Civil Appeals should consider the statement in the record.

INTERNATIONAL & G. N. R. CO. v. VALLEJO.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Nov. 4, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 842*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT—VERDICT.

Where there is any evidence tending to prove a fact essential to a recovery, the issue is for the jury; but whether there is such evidence in the record is a question of law for the Supreme Court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3323-3325; Dec. Dig. § 842.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 359*)—INJURY TO PERSON ON TRACK—NEGLIGENCE.

Where, in an action against a railroad company for injuries to a child run over by its cars, the facts disclosed created no duty on the part of the company to the child, there could be no negligence, and therefore no liability.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 359.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 378*)—INJURY TO PERSON ON TRACK—NEGLIGENCE.

While a train, after dark, was moving backward on a side track, the fireman saw a child on the main track, 14 feet distant, going in the opposite direction. The only danger that could exist to the child would arise from his leaving the main track and crossing over to the side track. The child crossed over to the side track and was run over by cars coupled to the front of the engine. Held, that the trainmen as a matter of law owed no duty to the child, and the company was not liable for the injuries sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1281; Dec. Dig. § 378.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 595*)—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY—INFERENCES.

An inference can only be drawn from facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 595.*]

5. RAILROADS (§ 378*)—INJURIES TO PERSON ON TRACK—CARE REQUIRED.

To impose on the crew of a train the duty to watch all children about railroad yards and tracks during the operation of the train is beyond the proper limitation of all correct principles of law.

Error from Court of Civil Appeals of Fourth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by Evaristo Vallejo, by his next friend, against the International & Great Northern Railroad Company. There was a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals (108 S. W. 1187) affirming a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and rendered.

Jno. M. King and Hicks & Hicks, for plaintiff in error. Bertrand & Arnold, for defendant in error.

BROWN, J. The appellee was a child three years old. His mother lived in a section house of appellant at Bermuda, a station between the city of San Antonio and Laredo. At the station there was a side track of considerable length, which was situated on the west side of the main track. The section house was on the east side of the main track. A freight train was on its way to Laredo, and, arriving at Bermuda, took the side track in order to let another freight train pass on the main track. It was after dark, about 8 o'clock. There were some flat cars loaded with gravel standing on the side track, and when the train that took the side track passed in it pushed the flat cars to the south far enough so that the freight train would clear the switch and leave room for the train going to San Antonio to pass. The engine was coupled to the train of flat cars. After the train which was going north passed on the main track, the freight train, which it is charged inflicted the injury upon appellee, moved backwards toward the main track and pulled the flat cars with it down to the point where they stood before the freight train had entered upon the side track. The side track was about 14 feet west of the main track, and as the freight train was passing down on the side track to the north the fireman, who was on the east side of the engine, observed the appellee, a small child dressed in white, walking along the main track. The fireman said, "Halloo, kid!" when the child looked, and then "struck a trot" going toward the section house. The fireman went over to the engineer and told him that he had seen some child, "a little bit of a fellow," on the main track, and when they came back on that track to be careful, as it might be on that track playing, or something to that effect.

The fireman testified that he saw the child as it went down the track until it went out of his sight, and then he said he "could have seen it further." There was an electric light on the engine, which was burning and gave a bright light upon the main track for a considerable distance, and on all the space between the track and the flat cars, to within a few feet of the cars. The fireman spoke to a brakeman, who got on the train at the switch, and asked him if he had seen the child on the track, and the brakeman said that he had not. Fletcher, the fireman, manifested a good deal of concern and anxiety for the child. He said he was not afraid that the child would go close to the cars of the train he was on, but he feared that the child might stop on the way somewhere and get hurt. No one on the train knew the child was hurt until they got to Laredo. After the train left, one of the men at the section house heard a woman crying and the child crying. He went out and found that the mother of the child had it in her arms with one of its feet injured. They took the child to Laredo for treatment. There was no direct evidence as to what place the child was when injured; but the testimony showed that there was blood upon the track at the rear trucks of the second car from the engine where the cars were stopped. The mother seems not to have testified, although she took the child from the track. The engineer testified that it was unusual for the fireman, if he saw a person within 12 or 14 feet of the track, to come over and tell him of it. He said that he heard the fireman say, "Halloo, kid!" and the fireman told him about seeing the child. Fletcher, the fireman, testified that it was his duty to keep a lookout in the direction the train was moving, and he did so. There was some conflict in the statements of Fletcher as to the distance the train had moved after he saw the child and before it stopped. The evidence seems to indicate that the train had moved but a short distance, perhaps two cars' length, after he saw the child, before it stopped and cut loose from the flat cars.

If there is any evidence in this case which tends to prove negligence on the part of the employees of the railroad company that caused the injury, then an issue of fact was made, to be decided by a jury, and of which this court has no jurisdiction. Whether there is such evidence in the record is a question of law, which it is the duty of this court to decide. The important question in this case is, what duty did the railroad company owe to the defendant in error, under the facts as they appear in the record? If it be true that the facts disclosed before the jury and presented to us created no duty on the part of the railroad company to the child, then there can be no negligence; and, being no negligence, there can be no liability on the part of the railroad company. When Fletcher, the fireman, saw the child, it was on the main track and 14 feet distant from the moving train, on which Fletcher was. The train was then moving northward and backward, and the child was on the main track going in the opposite direction. While upon the main track the child was in no present danger from the moving train. The only danger that could be said to exist was that he might change his course and, leaving the main track, cross over to the side track and come in contact with the train. But this danger depended upon the action of the child, and could not be guarded against by the employees by any means consistent with the performance of their duties in the operation of the train. They could exert no control over the child's action, and, situated as he and the train were in relation to each other, there was no danger that the child would be injured by the train's movements so long as he continued in the direction he was going.

The question then arises, what should the employees of the railroad company have done under the circumstances to guard that little child against injury? It is manifest that there was nothing for them to do, but what they did do—leave the child in its then secure condition and attend to their duties, or stop the train and send some one to carry the boy to his mother. Would any one contend that it was the duty of the railroad company to cease the operation of its train in order to perform the duties of nurse? If there had been probability that by the continued movement of the train injury would be inflicted on the boy, the duty to stop the train would have arisen; but no such result was indicated by the facts. We conclude that negligence cannot be predicated upon the fact that the fireman saw the child upon the main track after night, although he knew it was liable to get into danger, because such condition of things imposed no obligation upon the railroad company, and therefore there was no act to be performed by its employes, the failure to do which renders the company liable for the results.

There is testimony which tends to show that the fireman was mistaken as to the distance the child had traveled when it went out of his sight, and the evidence shows that he did in fact leave the main track, and cross over to the side track, and come in contact with the moving train, and thereby received the injury; but these facts are not sufficient in themselves to create a liability on the part of the railroad company. The fireman testified that it was his duty to keep a lookout in the direction the train was moving, and this is manifestly true, because he would be called upon to inform the engineer of signals which might be given by the train crew in the movements of the freight train. Therefore it was not his duty to keep the lookout to the rear of the moving train. Green v. Railroad (Ky.) 78 S. W. 439; Pedigo's Adm'r v. Railroad (Ky.) 68 S. W. 463. Since it was not the duty of the fireman to watch in the rear, the fact that the child did pass over at a place where he could have been seen does not justify an inference that the fireman saw him as he passed from one track to the other. This is the ground upon which the Court of Civil Appeals concludes that the jury rested their verdict. It is perhaps the most plausible theory that can be advanced in support of their finding; but in our opinion it is absolutely without probative force upon the question whether the fireman saw the child or not. An inference can only be drawn from facts; and, there being no facts upon which to base it, such an inference or conjecture is wholly unsupported.

The cases cited by the appellee are not in point on this question. In the case of M., K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Nesbit (Tex. Civ. App.) 97 S. W. 825, the child was going in the same direction as the train, and was on a road which crossed the railroad track. He was in plain view of the engineer. It was evident to all bystanders that the child intended to cross the track. It was the duty of the engineer to keep a lookout, and if he had done so he could have seen the boy. The facts distinguish that case from this. It is unnecessary for us to comment upon the other cases cited. Their facts are so dissimilar to this case that their want of applicability here is manifest. There is a marked difference between the duty of the crew in starting a standing train, about which children have been loitering, and the continued operation of a train already in motion, when no child has been observed to be near to it. To impose upon the crew of a train the duty to watch all children that may be about the railroad yards and tracks during the operation of the trains would be going beyond any adjudicated case which has been brought to our notice, and beyond the proper limitation of all correct and just principles of law.

We are of opinion that there is no evidence upon which to base the verdict in this case, and that the trial court should have instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant. The Court of Civil Appeals erred in affirming the judgment of the district court, for which error judgments of the district court and Court of Civil Appeals are reversed, and judgment is here rendered for the plaintiff in error.

ST. LOUIS, I. M. & S. RY. CO. v. BOSHEAR.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Nov. 4, 1908.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 230*)—CONTRACT FOR CARS—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—AGENT'S AUTHORITY—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Whether a carrier's traveling freight agent was authorized to contract to furnish cars to plaintiff to transport his cattle held, under the evidence, for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 230.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 230*)—CONTRACT FOR CARS—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—RATIFICATION—AGENT'S CONTRACT FOR CARS.

Whether a carrier ratified the contract of its traveling freight agent to furnish cars for a through transportation over its own and a connecting line, if he acted without authority, held, under the evidence, to be for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 230.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 228*)—CONTRACT FOR CARS—ACTIONS—RATIFICATION OF AGENT'S ACT—EVIDENCE.

Evidence that similar agreements of a traveling freight agent to furnish cars at points on other lines for through shipments to points on his line were acted upon by the carrier tends to show that the making of such agreements was within the agent's actual authority.

4. CARRIERS (§ 207*)—CONTRACT FOR CARS—ACTIONS—RATIFICATION.

Where defendant's agent contracted to furnish cars at a point on another line for a through shipment to a destination on his own line, and the rule of the initial carrier was that responsibility for through transportation must be assumed, if at all, by its connecting carrier, the transaction must be assumed to have been conducted in accordance with that custom, the duty to furnish the cars under the

5. CARRIERS (§ 228*)—CONTRACT FOR CARS—AGREEMENT OF AGENT—EVIDENCE.

Defendant not being legally bound to furnish cars on another line, unless it had agreed to do so, and the rule of the other line requiring defendant to do so to insure the passing of the shipment to destination over defendant's line, the fact that it furnished cars to be so used at the instance of its agent would justify an inference that it acted upon the agent's agreement.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where the time required by stock trains to make a trip was fully shown by witnesses testifying from their own knowledge, the admission of opinion by witnesses based upon trips made by them, two of whom spoke of also knowing the time from conversations with others and from general reputation, if erroneous, was not prejudicial.

7. TRIAL (§ 190*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for breach of contract by a carrier's agent to furnish cars, where the evidence was conflicting as to what the agent told plaintiff, a requested charge that the agent's statement that he would try to have the cars furnished would not be an agreement to do so, and the verdict should be for defendant, was properly refused, as assuming that the statement was as stated.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fifth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by T. B. Boshear against the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company. From a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals (108 S. W. 1032) affirming a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Leake & Henry, for plaintiff in error. W. B. Wynne, J. A. Germany, and H. M. Cate, for defendant in error.

WILLIAMS, J. This action was brought by the defendant in error against the Texas & Pacific Railway Company and the plaintiff in error to recover for damage to a shipment of cattle from Wills Point, Tex., to St. Louis. The judgment of the district court was in favor of the former company and against the latter; and the questions now in the case are wholly between the latter and the plaintiff.

A part of the cause of action asserted by plaintiff consisted of a claim that this defendant had broken a contract by which it agreed to furnish cars at Wills Point for the shipment at a specified time, in consequence of which the cattle sustained damage while being held in pens at that place, awaiting the coming of the cars. The defendant denied the making of the contract by its agent, as well as his authority to make it. The trial court submitted to the jury the questions whether or not the agent made the agreement, whether or not he had authority to make it, and whether or not, if he had not such authority, the defendant had ratified his action. Most of the assignments of error depend upon the proposition that there was no evidence of authority of the agent nor of ratification. The evidence in brief tends to show that plaintiff had ordered cars for the shipment of his cattle from Wills Point to Terrell, and thence, over the Midland road, to St. Louis. W. D. Young, the traveling freight agent of the defendant, requested Mantius, the station agent of the Texas & Pacific Company at Wills Point, to induce plaintiff to ship by the defendant's route. An interview followed between these two and Allen, plaintiff's agent, in which, according to the testimony of Mantius and Allen, Young agreed to have the cars at Wills Point on Saturday, November 11th, and that the cattle should go through to their destination over the Texas & Pacific and the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern roads. Young denies the making of any agreement, and testifies that he only promised to do the best he could to furnish the cars. He further testifies that his authority was merely to solicit freight shipments for the company represented by him, and that he had no authority from it to agree to furnish cars at points off its road. At the time of the alleged agreement, a rule of the Texas & Pacific Companies forbade its local agents to receive cattle and obligate it to ship them beyond its line, unless other companies over whose lines they were to go would furnish cars for the purpose, but it allowed the use of its cars to be furnished by the other companies. Mantius testifies that, when the agreement was made, at the request and in the presence of Young, he at once wired his superintendent "to request the Iron Mountain to have the cars at Wills Point to receive the cattle on the morning of the eleventh," and that the superintendent at once wired back that the request had been made. Young also states that he wired to the "head man" in Texas of his road a "notice" that the cars had been ordered, and the request that he have them furnished. The cars did not arrive on the 11th, but Young was at Wills Point on that morning to see to the billing and loading of the cattle, and stated to plaintiff that he did not know why the cars had not come, but assured him they would be there in a little while. They did arrive on Sunday morning. None of the telegrams mentioned were produced, and the defendant offered no evidence as to Young's authority, or as to ratification, except his statement already quoted. The plaintiff adduced evidence of several other transactions in which Young had made agreements for his company to furnish cars at stipulated times on other roads, which agreements were complied with. We think the evidence justified the submission of the questions both as to authority and as to ratification.

The reliance of the plaintiff in error is upon the decision of this court in Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railway Company v. Jackson & Edwards, 99 Tex. 343, 89 S. W. 963, to the effect that a soliciting agent, like Young, has no implied authority to bind his principal, a railroad company, to undertake the carriage of freight over other roads than its own. In that case there was no evidence either of authority or of ratification. The fact that the cars were furnished was not evidence of ratification, for the reason that the cattle were tendered to the company on its own line, and it was bound without any contract to furnish cars and to receive the freight upon proper demand. Its action in doing this, therefore, had no tendency to show that it was acting upon the unauthorized agreement of its agent; and, when the property was received, the company demanded the execution of contracts limiting its obligation to a carriage over its own road. In the present case, the evidence that other agreements of the agent like that in question were recognized and acted upon by the company unquestionably tends to show that the making of such agreements was within his actual authority.

The most plausible contention is that it was error for the trial court to submit the issue of ratification in addition to that of precedent authority. While the cars were eventually furnished, it is urged that this does not show action by the defendant in error, because they may have been furnished by the Texas & Pacific Company. But the answer to this is that the whole transaction was evidently conducted in accordance with the rule or custom of the latter company that responsibility for through transportation must be assumed, if at all, by its connecting carriers. It was the Iron Mountain Company that was called upon, in accordance with that understanding, to furnish cars for a through transportation. The inference is justified that the cars sent were sent by or for that company. But it is said that this still furnishes no evidence of ratification of Young's agreement because it does not appear that the principal acted upon and with knowledge of it. If the case were one in which freight was tendered upon the line of the company furnishing the cars, the objection might be unanswerable; for, as already remarked, it could not be inferred that the cars were sent upon the agreement rather than in the discharge of a legal duty existing without agreement. But this company was not bound to furnish cars on another line, unless it agreed to do so. To insure the passing of the freight over this defendant's road, the rule of the other company exacted the furnishing of the cars by it, and from the fact that it furnished cars to be used off its line in response to such notice as was given the jury might well infer that it acted upon an agreement by which alone it could have been required to do so.

Objection was made during the trial to the admission of the evidence of certain witnesses as to the time required for stock trains to make the trip from Wills Point to St. Louis. The witnesses showed that they had made other trips, and were qualified to testify to the fact. Two of them also spoke of knowing the time from conversations with others, and from general reputation, but this was not their only qualification. Whether this would have been an admissible way of showing the time we need not decide, since that was fully shown by a number of witnesses testifying from their own knowledge.

The defendant would have been entitled upon proper request to have had the jury correctly instructed as to the legal effect of a mere promise such as Young testified to, but the instruction requested "that the statement of W. D. Young that he would try or would use his best endeavors to have the cars furnished at Wills Point by Saturday would not be a contract or agreement to do so, and your verdict will be for defendant," was objectionable in that it assumed that Young's statement was as he testified when there was a conflict of evidence about it, and in that it excluded any right of recovery on the other ground set up by plaintiff, that the cattle were negligently handled on plaintiff in error's own road.

Error from Court of Civil Appeals of Second Supreme Judicial District.

Action by N. J. Wade against W. J. Flanary and others. The judgment of the district court was reversed on appeal to the Court of Civil Appeals, and defendants bring error. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and judgment of district court affirmed.

For prior report, see 108 S. W. 506.

Dillard & Word, Cureton & Cureton, and Dewey Langford, for plaintiffs in error. W. M. Knight, for defendant in error.

BROWN, J. By written contract Tom Wood employed N. J. Wade, an attorney, to file a suit in the district court of Bosque county against W. J. Flanary for damages. By the contract Wood agreed to give to Wade one-third of the land recovered in the suit. The contract was duly filed among the papers of the suit of Wood against Flanary. On the 18th day of September, 1902, Wood recovered a judgment in that case against Flanary for the sum of $2,400, from which judgment Flanary appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, and perfected his appeal in that court, but did not give a supersedeas bond.

Flanary owned two tracts of land, each lying partly in Bosque and partly in Erath counties. On the 11th day of December, 1902, Wood caused an execution to be issued and delivered to the sheriff of Bosque county, who levied it upon the portion of each tract of land which was situated in Bosque county, and on January 6, 1903, the land was sold under the execution, and was bid in by Wood for the sum of $200. The facts do not show how much of the land was in Bosque county. The $200 was credited on the judgment of Wood against Flanary. The case of Flanary against Wood having been filed in the Court of Civil Appeals of the Second district, that court entered these orders:

"April 18, 1903. This cause came on to be heard on the transcript of the record, and, the same being inspected because it is the opinion of this court that there was error in the judgment, it is therefore considered, adjudged, and ordered that the judgment of the court below be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the opinion of this court; unless appellee files a remittitur of all exemplary damages in excess of $500.00 within twenty days from this date. Upon the filing of such remittitur the judgment will be affirmed. It is further ordered that the appellee Tom Wood pay all costs in this behalf expended, and this decision be certified below for observance."

"May 9th, 1903. In this cause a remittitur having been filed, it is ordered by the court that the judgment be affirmed for $56.00 actual damages and $500.00 exemplary damages, and that the appellee, Tom Wood, do have and recover of and from the appellants W. J. Flanary, Will Flanary, Jr., Lee Flanary, and Arch Adkins, and from each of them, the sum of $556.00, with interest thereon from this date at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. It is further ordered that the said appellee pay all costs incurred by reason of this appeal, and that this decision be certified below for observance."

On April 28, 1903, Wood sued out an alias execution in the district court of Bosque county upon the judgment in his favor against Flanary, and caused the same to be levied by the sheriff of Erath county on the land in that county on May 8, 1903. The remittitur required by the Court of Civil Appeals was entered, and that court on the 12th day of May, 1903, gave judgment affirming the judgment of the district court for the sum of $556. Under an order of sale issued from the district court of Bosque county in said case, the sheriff sold the land lying in that county on July 7, 1903, and Tom Wood bid it in at the sum of $600, which amount was credited upon the judgment. The sheriffs of Bosque and Erath counties each made a deed to Tom Wood for the land purchased by him. On August 2, 1905, a suit was pending in the district court of Bosque county in favor of Tom Wood and his wife, Mattie, in which W. J. Flanary, F. V. Flanary, and a number of others not necessary to name were defendants. In that suit Tom and Mattie Wood sought to recover from the defendants Mattie Wood's interest in the community estate of her deceased mother and W. J. Flanary; F. V. Flanary being a second wife and the other defendants being children of the deceased wife. Tom Wood employed N. J. Wade to sue for the land purchased by him under his judgment as hereinbefore stated, and entered into a written contract binding himself to convey to Wade one-half of the land that he might recover in that action. Wade filed in the pending suit an amended petition, in which he set up, in addition to the claim of Mrs. Wood as the heir of her mother, his own title as purchaser from the sheriff as before stated herein. Wood and wife and all of the defendants compromised their suit, and Wood and wife signed a motion to dismiss the suit from the docket, whereupon Wade filed a plea of intervention setting up his title to one-half of the land under the contract with Tom Wood. All parties except Mrs. F. V. Flanary disclaimed title to the land. She claimed title under deed of gift made to her by her husband on the day that Wood recovered his judgment against Flanary. At the trial judgment was given in favor of Wade for $290, but against his claim for the land, which judgment was upon appeal to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Second District reversed and rendered for Wade for one-half of the land.

The order which the Court of Civil Appeals entered in the case of Flanary against Wood on the 18th day of April, 1903, reversed and set aside the judgment which the district court had entered in that case and this condition continued until May 9, 1903, when the judgment of the district court was affirmed; a remittitur having been entered. On the 28th day of April, 1903, there was no judgment in the district court of Bosque county between the parties hereto which would authorize the issuance of the execution that the clerk of that court issued directed to the sheriff of Erath county. Therefore the execution issued upon the judgment which had been annulled by the Court of Civil Appeals being without authority was void, and the levy made by virtue of that execution upon the land in controversy on the 8th day of May was likewise invalid. It follows that, the execution and the levy upon which the subsequent proceeding and sale depended being invalid, the sale itself was void, and conferred no title upon Wood who purchased at the sale made on July 17, 1903. The title of Wade being derived from Wood, necessarily falls with it, and the conclusion must be reached that Wade had no cause of action in this case for the recovery of this land.

The subsequent affirmance of the judgment of the district court of Bosque county by the Court of Civil Appeals was in fact the entering of a new and different judgment, but in no phase of the case could the subsequent entry of the judgment have the effect to make valid that which was void before.

The Court of Civil Appeals erred in reversing the judgment of the district court and in rendering judgment for Wade for the land. It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

LANDRY v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 53*)—DELAY OF MESSAGE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

In an action for failure to promptly transmit a telegram to plaintiff's brother announcing the serious illness of her husband, and requesting her brother to send some one to her, the brother having been 15 miles away from the destination of the message, so that he could not have taken a certain train had the message been sent promptly, it was error to permit plaintiff to recover for the failure of her brother to arrive by that particular train in time for the funeral; his nonarrival not being caused by the failure to transmit the message.

2. TRIAL (§ 251*)—SUBMISSION OF ISSUES—ISSUES NOT WITHIN PLEADINGS.

In an action for failure to transmit a telegram to plaintiff's brother in S. in time to enable him to attend her husband's funeral, there being no allegations that another brother would have gone had the message been delivered, or of any damage arising from the failure of any one to attend except her brother S., it was error to submit the issue of damages for the failure of her other brother to attend the funeral.

Error from Court of Civil Appeals of Fourth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by Ida Landry against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment in the Court of Civil Appeals (108 S. W. 461) reversing a judgment for plaintiff, and she brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Cocke & Cocke, for plaintiff in error. Webb & Goeth, for defendant in error.

BROWN, J. Ida Landry sued the Western Union Telegraph Company to recover damages for the negligent failure to promptly transmit and deliver the following message, which was sent from Ganahl, Tex., dated on the 1st day of March, 1905, and was delivered at the office of the telegraph company at 7 o'clock a. m.: "Sam Roundtree, Schreiver, La. Gus Landry very low. Send some one to me. Answer. [Signed] Ida Landry." Proper and sufficient allegations of the negligence in failing to transmit and deliver the message were made. It was alleged that, at the time the message was delivered, the agent of the telegraph company who received it knew of Landry's condition. The petition, in connection with other necessary and proper allegations to properly set forth the cause of action, contained these allegations: "Plaintiff further alleges that there was a west-bound passenger train scheduled to pass through Schreiver, La., at or about 10:20 a. m. of the morning of March 1, 1905, and said train did pass said point on said date at or near the schedule time, and on which train the party to whom said telegram was sent, Sam Roundtree, or some one under his direction, could have reached San Antonio, Tex., about 5 or 6 o'clock a. m. of March 2d, had said telegram been promptly transmitted and delivered, as it was defendant's duty to do, but that, due to the delay in transmission and delivery of said telegram the said Roundtree was not advised of the needs and conditions of plaintiff until after said train had passed said point, for which reason said Roundtree could not come or send aid to this plaintiff until the following day, causing a delay of 24 hours." The petition also contained this allegation: "That the husband of plaintiff died on March 1, 1905, at Center Point, Tex., and it was her wish and desire to carry his remains for burial to the family burying ground in Louisiana, and which she would have done had her brother Sam Roundtree, Jr., who was sent by her father, Sam Roundtree, in response to said telegram, reached her on the morning of March 2d, as he could have done had said telegram been properly transmitted and delivered."

Again, plaintiff alleged as follows: "Plaintiff further alleges that, due to the failure of defendant to transmit and deliver said telegram promptly, her brother, who finally came in response thereto, did not reach Center Point, Tex., at or about 11 o'clock on the morning of March 2d, as otherwise he could and would have done, much to the sorrow, disappointment, grief, and humiliation of this plaintiff; that due to the failure of her brother to so reach and assist this plaintiff in shipping said deceased back to Louisiana, as aforesaid, it became necessary and indispensable for plaintiff to make preparation to have her said husband buried at Center Point, Tex., decomposition having set in, and she having no funds with which to have his body embalmed or transported to Louisiana, all of which were known to defendant at the time of sending said telegram; that, being wholly powerless to accomplish her said desire to have the body of her husband buried in the family burying grounds in Louisiana, as aforesaid, due to the negligence and failure of defendant to properly transmit and deliver said telegram, and the consequent inability of plaintiff's brother to reach her on the morning of March 2d, it devolved on this plaintiff to personally direct, supervise, and attend to all the necessary details and arrangements in preparing said body for burial, the digging of the grave, the conveyance of the body thereto, and all other things and duties ordinarily incident to such an occasion; that plaintiff was in a comparatively strange country, was among strangers, and without any relatives to aid, comfort, console, or assist her; that she was, by reason of the delay in transmitting and delivering said telegram, compelled to attend the public burial of her deceased husband among strangers, and alone—that is, without the comfort, consolation, assistance, and support of her brother—which caused her much mental pain and anguish, much sorrow and grief, and which would have been tempered and more easily borne had her said brother been present to cheer, comfort, and assist her; that plaintiff was humiliated over the thought that the people who attended said burial would conclude that she had not the esteem, regard, and sympathy of her people because of the failure of any of them to be present; that because of the increased mental anguish, humiliation, pain, and suffering experienced by plaintiff as aforesaid she had sustained actual damages in the sum of $500, in addition to the actual damages sustained by her in the sending of the said telegram."

The trial court charged the jury, in substance, if they believed from the evidence that the telegraph company negligently failed to transmit and deliver the message within a reasonable time to Sam Roundtree, Sr., at Schreiver, La., then to find for the plaintiff such sum as would compensate her for the damages actually sustained by her, "and in estimating such actual damages, if any, the jury should include the amount received by the defendant for sending the message, and, in addition, the mental anguish, pain, sorrow, or grief, if any, which she sustained because of the failure of her brother to arrive at Ganahl on the noon train of March 2, 1905, and be present and cheer and comfort her, and to assist in the burial of her husband, and which she would not have sustained had the telegram been promptly transmitted and had her brother arrived on the noon train of March 2, 1905."

The undisputed evidence showed that at the time the message should have been delivered at Schreiver, and at the time the train passed on which the brother must have taken passage to reach Ganahl on the 2d of March, Sam Roundtree, Jr., was 15 miles distant from Schreiver, and that he did leave that station the next day on the first train that he could have taken had the message been promptly delivered to Sam Roundtree, Sr. It was therefore error for the court to submit to the jury the issue of the damages which the plaintiff sustained by reason of the failure of her brother Sam to arrive on the train on the 2d of March, because his failure to so arrive did not result from the failure to deliver the telegram in a reasonable time.

The honorable Court of Civil Appeals says that there was another brother, Joe, who was within the purview of the telegram. There is no allegation in the petition that, if the telegram had been delivered in time, the brother Joe would have gone to his sister in Ganahl, nor is there any allegation of any damage arising from the failure of any one to go to plaintiff's aid and relief, except the brother Sam, Jr. There was no evidence which justified the submission of the issue to the jury.

We therefore reverse the judgments of the district court and Court of Civil Appeals, and remand the case to the district court.

MAHS v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 21, 1908.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 649*)—TRIAL—POSTPONEMENT—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for burglary with intent to rape, prosecutrix did not identify the intruder in her house on the night in question, nor did she attempt to do so, in her testimony. The state attempted to identify him first by comparison of handwriting between a letter the authorship of which defendant admitted, with another letter received by prosecutrix, and by evidence of the postmaster that he saw defendant write and mail a letter the day before prosecutrix received the letter in question. Held, that the court erred in refusing to delay the trial for a few minutes, necessary to obtain the presence of the postmaster a second time, in order that he might testify that he only meant that he saw defendant writing, and did not notice whether he wrote a letter or postal cards, as defendant testified, on the ground that the court had given notice that he would not wait for witnesses to be brought in, and because no affidavit had been filed affirming the truth of the expected testimony.

Appeal from District Court, Hemphill County; H. G. Hendricks, Judge.

Herbert Bernard Mahs was convicted of burglary with intent to rape Amie Dustin, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Hoover & Taylor, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., W. D. Fisher, Dist. Atty., and Baker, Willis & Willis, for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of burglary with intent to commit the crime of rape upon Amie Dustin.

The prosecutrix was on the 28th day of May, 1908, and had been since December 24, 1907, a waitress in a café owned by one Kellas, and occupied a room in his residence as her sleeping apartment. Appellant was cook in the same café, but did not sleep at the residence of the proprietor. The alleged burglary occurred on the 26th of May, 1908. Prior to the burglary, prosecutrix became somewhat uneasy on account of the conduct of two men who had followed her along the street. Upon her invitation, appellant subsequently became her protector and companion between the café and the Kellas residence. This brought about a friendly relation between the parties. On one occasion prosecutrix, looking through appellant's clothing, found a letter he had written to a girl in another state. This letter indicated the existence of more than a friendly feeling between appellant and that girl, and alluded to the prosecutrix. The letter evidenced a decidedly more intimate relation between the girl addressed than with the prosecutrix. Prosecutrix kept this letter, and it was produced upon the trial. A day or two before the alleged offense, appellant informed prosecutrix of his intended departure from Canadian for Kansas City. She replied that she did not care. He asked what was the matter. She replied: "Oh, enough." They immediately separated. On the following night, the 26th of May, prosecutrix attended a dance, escorted by a Mr. Belden. She returned in company with Belden about 12 or 12:30 o'clock that night. Belden and prosecutrix separated at the entrance; prosecutrix going into the house. She did not know what became of Belden. After entering the house she lighted a lamp, went to the different rooms of the house, and finally to her own sleeping apartments. The window was up and blinds partially open in Mrs. Kellas' room. Prosecutrix found the same condition of affairs in her own room. She was not at first disturbed about this, because the wind frequently blew the shutters open. She, however, later looked under her bed and discovered nothing, disrobed, and went back to Mrs. Kellas' room; in fact, was preparing to take a bath. After reaching Mrs. Kellas' room the second time, she testified she discovered somebody had been sitting upon the bed. Upon making this discovery she noticed the bed moved slightly, and under it discovered a man. She immediately fled to a neighbor's house and gave information of the condition of things. As she went out of the house and off the premises she said she looked back and saw the intruder standing in the doorway of the kitchen; that at no time did he speak to her, or in any manner attempt to catch hold of her, and her testimony does not make it appear that he came from under the bed while she was in the room. The Kellas family was away from home, and had been for some days. Prosecutrix had been in the habit of inviting Miss Jackson to sleep with her. On this particular night, or day preceding the night, she had informed Miss Jackson she need not come that night, as she had invited another young lady. She did not, however, invite the other young lady, and she was to occupy the house that night alone. She says appellant had always treated her courteously, and had in no way misbehaved towards her or in her presence. Belden left town on the train that night, or early the next morning. Appellant had, a day or two prior to this, severed his relation as employé at the café, and had informed the prosecutrix of his intended departure from Canadian, and of his intended return to Denver, in the state of Colorado.

On the 28th of May prosecutrix received a letter in which the writer stated that he had intended having intercourse with her on the night in question, and if she had resisted he would have killed her. This letter became a serious issue in the case on the trial. The state introduced in evidence the letter prosecutrix had taken from the pocket of appellant as a standard of comparison to show that the one received on the 28th of May was written by appellant. Some bank officials were called as experts, and testified in their judgment the same party wrote both letters, but denied being experts. Appellant denied under oath writing the second letter. He admitted writing the one prosecutrix had taken from his pocket. In this attitude of the case the postmaster testified for the state that appellant had written a letter on the evening of the 27th of May in the post office and mailed it. It was the state's theory that this was the letter received by prosecutrix on the 28th of May. Appellant took the stand and denied under oath that he wrote the letter in question, and further denied that he wrote any letter in the post office at all, but testified, in regard to the matter of the writing in the post office stated by the postmaster, that he wrote two postal cards and mailed them—one to his sister in Wyoming, and the other to his former landlady at Denver to secure apartments in her house he had occupied when he formerly lived at Denver. The testimony closed, and appellant then offered to recall the postmaster for the purpose of proving by him that when he stated to the jury that he saw appellant write a letter that it was through inadvertence; that he had paid but little attention to what appellant was doing—simply saw him writing and did not notice whether he wrote a letter or postal cards, and that he did not intend to swear that appellant had in fact written a letter; that his attention was not directed to the fact that whatever was written by appellant might have been postal cards instead of a letter. It was stated to the court, in this connection, that the postmaster was at the post office a short distance away in the town where court was being held, and an officer had gone for him and he would be produced in a few moments. The court refused to permit the introduction of this witness. In qualifying the bill he states, in effect, that he had notified counsel upon either side that he would not wait for witnesses to be brought in, but that they must be kept present all the time; and he further states that no affidavit had been filed affirming the truth of the expected statements from this witness until on motion for new trial.

The record does not disclose affirmatively at what time appellant discovered that the postmaster would thus qualify his evidence; but it was offered to prove these facts before the argument was begun. This testimony was very material under the circumstances. The prosecutrix had not identified the intruder in her house on the night of the 28th, nor did she undertake in her testimony to do so. In fact, not only her testimony, but the whole record, tends to prove the fact that she did not identify him. The state sought to do this by two circumstances: First, comparison of handwriting; and, second, postmaster saw appellant write and mail a letter. It will therefore be observed at once that the evidence of the postmaster was of a most material character, and tended with some degree of cogency to corroborate the testimony of the experts. This letter had been denied under oath. Therefore the testimony of the experts could not of itself furnish a basis of conviction under the terms of the statute. If in fact appellant wrote this letter, or the jury believed he wrote it, and such was the effect of the postmaster's testimony, it became a strong circumstance against the accused. It therefore became of first importance to appellant that this evidence be met, if possible, and to this end he offered the witness. It was rejected, first, because the court stated he would not permit witnesses to be brought in, but that they must be present; second, that the postmaster's affidavit was only filed on motion for a new trial. Neither reason is valid under this condition of the record. The delay would only be for a few moments at least, and the affidavit is not necessary to inform the court of the materiality of the rebutting or explanatory evidence, when the evidence is tendered during the trial.

The affidavit in regard to such testimony, if newly discovered, would find proper place in the motion for a new trial; but here the facts were known, had been ascertained, and were tendered before the argument was commenced. Under our statute which authorizes the introduction of evidence at any time before the conclusion of argument, for the due administration of justice, appellant was in ample time, and should have been accorded the right to have the postmaster explain away the circumstances sought by the state as evidence of guilt. It certainly would not have caused any longer delay in the trial to have introduced it then than it would at any stage of the subsequent portion of the trial to the conclusion of the argument. It will be seen this evidence was not only material, but it would have explained away one of the most cogent facts against appellant. The evidence of the postmaster, in connection with the letter, tended somewhat to identify the letter. If appellant in fact wrote the letter, it tended to prove two facts for the state: First, identification of appellant as an intruder; second, it served also to throw light upon the reason or purpose of his being in the house. It would take no argument to disclose that these were crucial points in the case. If the postmaster had been permitted to explain his former evidence, and testify to facts tendered as stated by counsel to the court, these two questions would have been presented to the jury in a much more favorable light for appellant; because, if he did not write that letter, then there is but slight, if any, evidence to show the purpose of being in the house, and there was nothing to identify him as the party being in the house. We are of opinion, therefore, that this action of the court was clearly erroneous, and in direct violation of that statute which permits the introduction of testimony in aid of the due administration of justice at any time before the argument has been concluded.

There are other questions in the case; but they may not arise upon another trial, and are not discussed.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

DUELING (§ 4*)—CHALLENGE TO FIGHT—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held insufficient to sustain a conviction of sending a challenge to prosecutor to fight a duel with deadly weapons, with intent to kill prosecutor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dueling, Dec. Dig. § 4*]

Appeal from District Court, Lubbock County; L. S. Kinder, Judge.

C. Daughtry was convicted of sending a challenge to prosecutor to fight a duel with deadly weapons, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

H. C. Ferguson and McGee & Puckett, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was charged with and convicted of sending a challenge to one J. W. Campbell to fight a duel with deadly weapons, with intent to kill and murder said Campbell.

It is contended that the evidence falls to show that appellant sent a challenge as charged. Campbell was the only witness. He testified that in the evening, after he had left his office, he was called to the phone at his residence; that he asked who it was, and was informed that it was C. Daughtry; that the speaker stated that he had received a letter from Campbell to Campbell's sister, wife of appellant, in which some charges were made against Daughtry. An explanation was demanded. Campbell informed the speaker that he did not wish to talk with him about private matters over the phone, and requested him to come there and talk with him, and that he would talk with him anywhere as a gentleman about anything necessary. The party who called Campbell over the phone stated: "I will be there tomorrow evening at 4 o'clock, and I demand that you meet me." Campbell informed him that he would meet him at any time, finally saying to him, "I don't want to talk to you over the phone about family matters." Campbell then rang off, hung up the receiver, and walked away. Campbell's wife and sister being sick at the time, he did not care to talk, as they might hear and become excited. The phone rang again. The speaker informed Campbell that he wanted him to stay at the phone and hear what he had to say, and demanded that he meet him. Campbell again declined to talk with him over the phone. The party said he would meet him at his hall in front of the door. Campbell declined this, but said he would meet the speaker anywhere. Again he rang off and hung up the receiver. This ended the matter, except two letters, one of which was dated at Lubbock, July 15, 1907, and directed to J. W. Campbell, Plainview. The letter is rather rambling, at least is not very coherent, and the writer seems to have had some grievance about a letter he charges Campbell with having written. This letter referred to a letter the writer had received. Without going into the details of this letter, getting down to that portion of it that would suggest, if anything does suggest, a challenge, we find this: "Now, waiving all ceremonies, will you meet me at any time you may suggest, in combat? Now my blindness is no excuse, since, if you like, you may blindfold yourself, though that is altogether as you like, for I am not afraid of you, and much less afraid to die. Address me at Hereford, advising me if you will meet me in combat, select your weapons, and say whether or not you wish to enter the combat blindfolded." Then follows another letter, dated the 16th of July, 1907. This, also, was purported to have been written at Lubbock, in which the writer retracted some things he had said the previous day about the mother of Campbell. This expression occurs in the latter letter: "I regard you as a man not afraid to meet me." Both letters are signed, "C. Daughtry." Omitting quite a lot of matter in the letters, which seems to have little or no bearing on the case, outside of showing incoherent anger, this is about the substance of the case.

We are of opinion this evidence does not sustain the conviction. If the language quoted be construed into an offer to fight Campbell with deadly weapons, so as to bring it within the purview of the statute on dueling or sending challenges, which we think is somewhat doubtful, we are then met with this trouble: Campbell does not undertake to swear that it was appellant talking with him over the phone, nor that appellant was the man who sent the letters or wrote them. There was no evidence introduced, except as above stated; no witness introduced, except Campbell, and he does not swear that it was the handwriting of appellant; nor is his testimony, in our judgment, sufficiently cogent, even if the letters contained a challenge, to connect appellant with writing and sending the letters. There may be some suspicious circumstances, as shown in the statement; but they are not sufficient to authorize the incarceration of a man in the penitentiary under article 715 of the Penal Code, under which this indictment was found.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

GREEN v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 21, 1908.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 701*)—RECORD—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—ABSENCE OF STATEMENT OF FACTS.

In the absence of a statement of facts, the appellate court will not ordinarily review assignments questioning the sufficiency and correctness of the charge of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2933; Dec. Dig. § 701.*]

Appeal from District Court, Bastrop County; Ed. R. Sinka, Judge.

Johnnie Green was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

Robert A. Brooks, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. The appellant was charged by indictment in the district court of Bastrop county with the offense of murder. He was put upon his trial in July, 1908, in said court, and was by the jury convicted, and his punishment assessed at death.

The record discloses that, preliminary to the main trial, there was some suggestion made that appellant was insane, which issue was tried in said court in advance of the main trial, resulting in the return of a verdict by the jury that the appellant was then sane. There is no statement of facts in the record, notwithstanding 30 days after adjournment was allowed within which to file a statement of facts.

We have carefully examined the charge of the court, and so far as we can tell, in the absence of a statement of facts, it is unobjectionable. The only instruction requested by appellant's counsel was given by the court.

There are some complaints of the charge of the court made; but it is well settled that in the absence of a statement of facts we cannot, ordinarily, at least, review assignments questioning the sufficiency and correctness of the charge of the court. Holloway v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 110 S. W. 745, and authorities there cited. It is a matter of regret that, in a case with the assessment of the death penalty, we are not aided by a statement of facts. None, however, was filed, nor was any excuse or reason given why it was not done.

As presented to us, notwithstanding the awful penalty imposed upon appellant, we are without discretion in the matter, and the judgment of the court below must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

MOLAND v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 21, 1908.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1097*)—APPEAL—RECORD—STATEMENT OF FACTS—EFFECT OF FAILURE TO MAKE.

Error in overruling a motion for new trial on the ground that the verdict was not sustained by the evidence cannot be considered, in the absence of a statement of facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2947, 2948; Dec. Dig. § 1097.*]

Appeal from District Court, Ellis County; F. L. Hawkins, Judge.

Aaron Moland was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was convicted in the district court of Ellis county of the offense of burglary, and his punishment assessed at five years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The case comes to us without either statement of facts or bills of exception. The only ground of the motion for new trial filed in the court below was to the effect, in substance, that the verdict of the jury was wholly unsupported by the evidence introduced on the trial of the cause. In the absence of a statement of facts, it is evident that we cannot consider this question.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

STEEL v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 21, 1908.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 778*)—DEFENSES—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction, on a trial for carrying a weapon, which places the burden on accused to prove beyond a reasonable doubt the defense that he was a traveler, is erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1849; Dec. Dig. § 778.*]

2. WEAPONS (§ 17*)—CARRYING WEAPONS—INSTRUCTIONS—DEFENSES.

Where, on a trial for carrying a weapon, accused admitted having a pistol about his person, and testified that on the day of his arrest he had started out to make a collection tour which would carry him through several counties, an instruction that if the jury believed beyond a reasonable doubt that accused had a pistol about his person, and that he was a traveler pursuing his journey and engaged in business connected with the same, they should acquit him, was erroneous as requiring the jury to find, in order to acquit accused, that he was in the pursuit of his journey and also engaged in business connected therewith.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Weapons, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

Appeal from Wood County Court; J. O. Rouse, Judge.

H. F. Steel was convicted of carrying a pistol on his person, and he appeals. Reversed, and cause remanded.

H. C. Geddie, H. F. Boyett, and Jones & Jones, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. The appellant was charged by complaint and information with the offense of carrying a pistol on and about his person on the 18th day of September, 1907. On trial in the county court of Wood county he was found guilty by the jury, and his punishment assessed at a fine of $100. From this judgment he appeals to this court, and asks a reversal thereof.

We think the judgment of the court below must be reversed. There was evidence introduced in the case that appellant on the 17th day of September, 1907, had a pistol in the house of Henry Douglass, in the town of Mineola, under circumstances which probably would have left him, if the testimony had been credited by the jury, substantially without defense. It was also shown by the state that appellant had on and about his person a pistol in the town of Mineola on the morning of September 18, 1907. There was no election by the state, and under the charge of the court the jury were authorized, if they credited the testimony of the state, to find appellant guilty as to either of the occasions on which it was claimed he had a pistol. Appellant denied that he had the pistol on the night of the 17th of September at the home of Henry Douglass. He admitted having the pistol in his hack on the next day at the time of his arrest by the witness Woods. His claim was that he was protected in having the pistol as a traveler. He testified, in substance, that he left home on that day and had started out to make a collection tour, which would carry him through Hopkins, Rains, Van Zandt, and Smith counties, during which time he expected, and it was his purpose, to collect a considerable sum of money for the company for which he was working. His testimony fully supported this contention.

In this state of the proof, appellant's counsel requested the court to give the following charge: "If you believe from the evidence that, at the time the defendant was arrested by J. B. Woods and John S. Daniel, the defendant was started on a trip to Hopkins, Rains, Van Zandt, and other counties, then I charge you as a matter of fact that he was a traveler, and would not be guilty of violating the law by reason of having the pistol in his possession at the time." This charge was by the court refused. The court, however, did give to the jury the following charge: "If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant had on and about his person a pistol, as charged, if any, and that he was a traveler pursuing his journey and engaged in business connected with the same, then you will acquit the defendant." The vice of this charge, apparent by the reading of same is, that it places the burden upon appellant to prove beyond a reasonable doubt his defense; that is, that he was a traveler. It is also objectionable in that it requires that he must be both in the pursuit of his journey and engaged in business connected with the same. This is so manifestly erroneous as not to require elaboration.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded.

YOUNG v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 21, 1908.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1156*)—APPEAL—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—TIME.

Under Code Cr. Proc. art. 819, requiring a new trial to be applied for within two days after conviction, but permitting the court in felony cases, for good cause shown, to allow the application to be made at any time before adjournment of the term, where a motion for a new trial was made five days after trial and sentence, the denial of the motion will not be reviewed in the absence of an abuse of discretion.

Bank. On trial the appellant was found guilty, and his punishment assessed at confinement in the penitentiary for two years.

We gather from the record that appellant was not defended by counsel on the original hearing. No motion for a new trial was filed until five days after the verdict of guilty was returned against him. The judgment of guilty bears date December 12, 1907. The motion for new trial was filed on December 17th of the same year. A motion was made by the district attorney to strike out appellant's motion, for the reason that same was not filed within two days after the rendition of the verdict, and because not filed at all until after the court had pronounced sentence on appellant on said verdict of conviction, reciting and averring that appellant was so duly and properly sentenced by the court at 9:30 o'clock a. m. on the 17th day of December, 1907, and said motion for a new trial was filed at 3:30 o'clock p. m. on the same day. Article 819 of our Code of Criminal Procedure is as follows: "A new trial must be applied for within two days after the conviction, but for good cause shown, the court, in cases of felony, may allow the application to be made at any time before the adjournment of the term at which the conviction was had. When the court adjourns before the expiration of two days from the conviction, the motion shall be made before the adjournment." Under this provision of our Code of Criminal Procedure it has been held that motions for new trial filed more than two days after the verdict, where no sufficient excuse is shown for the delay, will not be entertained. Valentine v. State, 6 Tex. App. 439. Again, it has been held that the article, in effect, confides to the judicial discretion of the trial court the determination of applications for new trial made after the expiration of two days, and the exercise of that discretion will not be revised, unless it has been abused to the defendant's prejudice. White v. State, 10 Tex. App. 167; Bullock v. State, 12 Tex. App. 42; Smith v. State, 15 Tex. App. 139; Hernandez v. State, 18 Tex. App. 134, 51 Am. Rep. 295.

In this case the motion for new trial was not filed until five days after the conviction. No reason or excuse is given why it was not filed earlier; nor, indeed, was it filed until after the appellant was sentenced. There is no bill of exceptions, preserved in the record, showing any reason why the discretion justly confided to the court should or can be revised by us. Necessarily, in matters of this sort, much discretion must be confided to the district judge. We know in practice that motions and amended motions are frequently filed after the expiration of two days, and we cannot assume that the trial court would decline to entertain a motion for new trial without any reasonable and just ground for so doing. Under the condition of the record as here presented, we must assume, as we do, that there was no abuse of the discretion of the trial court, so that it results that we must treat the case as if no motion had been presented. If this is correct, it follows of necessity that article 723, Code of Criminal Procedure, which provides: "Whenever it appears by the record in any criminal action, upon appeal of the defendant, that any of the requirements of the eight preceding articles have been disregarded, the judgment shall not be reversed unless the error appearing from the record was calculated to injure the rights of the defendant, which error shall be excepted to at the time of the trial, or on motion for a new trial"—should control in the disposition of the case. In the light of this article a careful inspection of the record does not disclose the denial of any substantial right to appellant of which he can in fairness complain; nor, indeed, do we believe that, if the motion might be considered, there is any error justifying or requiring a reversal of the case.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of conviction of the court below be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

JONES v. STATE

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1090*)—APPEAL—RECORD—NEW TRIAL.

In the absence of a statement of facts or bill of exceptions in the record, matters presented in a motion for a new trial cannot be reviewed.

Appeal from District Court, El Paso County; James R. Harper, Judge.

Sam Jones was convicted of theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Appellant was convicted of theft, and his punishment assessed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The record is before us without a statement of facts or bill of exceptions. The matters presented in the motion for a new trial, with the record in its present condition, cannot be reviewed.

There being no error, therefore, shown, the judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte COLEMAN.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Feb. 12, 1908. Rehearing Denied June 24, 1908.)

1. EXTRADITION (§ 24*)—DUTY OF STATES.

The provision of the United States Constitution requiring the surrender of fugitives from justice is in the nature of a treaty stipulation between the states, equally binding on each state and its officers, so that, where the proceedings are regular, the executive of the state on which the demand is made has no discretion to refuse to honor it.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

2. EXTRADITION (§ 36*)—WARRANT—CLERICAL ERRORS.

Where extradition papers showed that the alleged fugitive from justice was charged by affidavit, a recital in the warrant of the Governor of the state on which the demand was made that the fugitive was charged by indictment was a mere immaterial clerical error.

3. EXTRADITION (§ 30*)—"FUGITIVE FROM JUSTICE."

That petitioner remained in Alabama for some time after an alleged homicide, then moved to Georgia, remaining in constant communication with the Alabama authorities, and where his location was known to them when he moved to Texas, where he lived for a number of years before extradition proceedings were instituted, did not prevent him from being a "fugitive from justice" within the extradition law, which term includes any person who commits a crime in one state for which he is indicted, and departs therefrom and is found in another state.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 2995, 2996.]

4. EXTRADITION (§ 32*)—INDICTMENT.

Where extradition proceedings were based on a sufficient affidavit, it was not material that, after arrest of accused in the state to which he fled, the sheriff having him in charge was furnished with an objectionable indictment by the authorities of the demanding state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Extradition, Cent. Dig. § 38; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

5. EXTRADITION (§ 32*)—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—TIME AND PLACE.

Where extradition proceedings were instituted by Alabama to prosecute petitioner for an alleged homicide committed in that state, under the laws of which it was not essential that the indictment should charge either the time or venue of the offense, an indictment omitting such elements was not objectionable for that reason in the extradition proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Extradition, Cent. Dig. § 38; Dec. Dig. § 32.*]

6. HABEAS CORPUS (§ 30*)—GROUNDS FOR RELIEF—ERRORS AND IRREGULARITIES.

An alleged fugitive from justice in extradition proceedings will not be discharged on habeas corpus because of substantial defects in the indictment under the laws of the demanding state; it being sufficient that he is charged by indictment with the offense and that all other prerequisites to extradition are complied with.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Habeas Corpus, Cent. Dig. § 25; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

Application for a writ of habeas corpus by William H. Coleman. Writ denied. Petitioner remanded.

Crawford & Lamar and M. L. Dye, for appellant. Walter F. Seay, Lee Richardson, and F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. This is an original application for a writ of habeas corpus, which was granted by this court, and relator insists that he is illegally restrained of his liberty by A. L. Ledbetter, sheriff of Dallas county, Tex., for various reasons, and asks this court to release him. After the original application was granted by this court, the sheriff came in and made return showing that he held relator in custody under a writ of arrest issued by John G. Bradley, clerk of the criminal court of Jefferson county, Ala.; second, a warrant of arrest issued by J. F. Williams, justice of the peace, precinct No. 1, Dallas county, Tex.; third, an authorization for the person of Henry Coleman, issued to Robert L. Collier on January 7, 1908, by B. B. Comer, Governor of the state of Alabama, a copy of which is attached; fourth, an executive warrant for the custody of Henry Coleman, issued on the 13th day of January, 1908, by his excellency, T. M. Campbell, Governor of the state of Texas. A copy of all of said papers is attached to the sheriff's return.

After the above return was made, the sheriff amended his return, which was entirely proper. The same shows that, in addition to the above, he holds relator by virtue of (a) an affidavit filed by Ellisha A. Reeves in the criminal court of Jefferson county, Ala., on the 6th day of January, 1908, charging the relator with murder; (b) a petition, filed and sworn to by H. P. Heflin, solicitor of Jefferson county, Ala., signed and sworn to on the 6th day of January, A. D. 1908, which petition prays for the extradition of relator, to the end that he may be returned to the state of Alabama to be prosecuted for the crime of murder; (c) a warrant of arrest, issued by S. L. Weaver, judge of the criminal court of Jefferson county, Ala., for the arrest of the relator on a charge of murder, the said warrant being issued on January 6, 1908; (d) a requisition issued by the Governor of the state of Alabama, directed to the Governor of the state of Texas, requesting that the relator be apprehended and delivered to Robert L. Collier, to be conveyed to the state of Alabama, to be prosecuted for the crime of murder of which he stands charged in the state of Alabama; (e) a written authorization, issued by the Governor of the state of Alabama, which confers authority on Robert L. Collier to receive for the authorities of the state of Alabama, to answer to a charge of murder alleged to have been committed in said state, the said authorization having been issued on January 7, 1908, a copy of which is attached to the relator's petition, and the original of which is on file in this court; (f) an executive warrant issued by the Governor of the state of Texas, on January 13, 1908, which warrant authorizes the relator's delivery to Robert L. Collier, to be conveyed to the state of Alabama, to be tried on a charge of murder in said state, a copy of which executive warrant is attached to relator's petition filed herein, and the original of which is on file in this court.

The requisition of the Governor of the state of Alabama reads as follows:

"Executive Department, State of Alabama. The Governor of the State of Alabama, to his Excellency, the Governor of Texas: Whereas, it appears by the annexed copy of an affidavit, which is hereby duly certified to be authentic in accordance with the laws of this state, that Henry Coleman stands charged with the crime of murder, committed in the county of Jefferson, in this state, and it has been represented to me that Henry Coleman has fled from justice of this state and has taken refuge in the state: Now, therefore, pursuant to the provisions of the Constitution and laws of the United States in such case made and provided, I request that you cause the said Henry Coleman to be apprehended and delivered to Robt. L. Collier, who is hereby authorized to receive and convey him to the state of Alabama, there to be dealt with according to law. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the state to be affixed at the capitol, in the city of Montgomery, this 7th day of Jan'y, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eight, and in the one hundred and thirty-second year of American Independence. B. B. Comer, Governor of Alabama. [Seal.] By the Governor: Frank N. Julian, Secretary of State."

The affidavit upon which said requisition of the Governor of Alabama is issued is as follows:

"State of Alabama, Jefferson County. Criminal Court. Before me, John G. Bradley, clerk of the criminal court, personally appeared H. P. Heflin, who prosecutes for the state in said county, who upon oath says that Henry Coleman stands charged in said county with the offense of murder; that said Henry Coleman is now a fugitive from justice in this state, and has taken refuge in the state of Texas; that this application for his extradition is made in good faith, for the sole purpose of prosecuting him for the offense with which he is charged, and not to procure his presence here to serve him with any civil process, nor to collect a debt, nor to enforce any claim, nor for any other improper purpose; that he has investigated the facts in this case, and is of the opinion that a conviction will be had. And the petition recommends Robert L. Collier as commissioner on the part of the state of Alabama to receive this prisoner. H. P. Heflin, Solicitor of Jefferson County, Alabama.

"Sworn to and subscribed before me this 6th day of January, 1908. John G. Bradley, Clerk of the Criminal Court of Jefferson County, Ala."

The accompanying affidavit of Elisha A. Reeves reads as follows:

"The State of Alabama, Jefferson County. The Criminal Court of Jefferson County, ——— Term, 190—. Personally appeared before me, S. L. Weaver, associate judge of the criminal court of Jefferson county, in and for said county, Elisha A. Reeves, who, being duly sworn, says that Henry Coleman, whose other and further name is unknown to affiant, within twelve months before making this affidavit in said county, did unlawfully and with malice aforethought kill James Cordray by shooting him with a pistol, against the peace and dignity of the state of Alabama. Elisha A. Reeves.

"Subscribed and sworn to before me this 6th day of January, 1908. S. L. Weaver, Associate Judge of the Criminal Court of Jefferson County."

The warrant of arrest is as follows:

"The State of Alabama, Jefferson County. To any Lawful Officer of Said County—Greeting: You are hereby commanded to arrest Henry Coleman, whose other and further name is unknown to affiant, and bring him before the judge of the court of Jefferson county at the present term of said court, to answer the state of Alabama on a charge of murder preferred by Elisha A. Reeves. Witness my hand this 6th day of January, 1908. S. L. Weaver, Judge of the Criminal Court of Jefferson county.

"Witnesses for State: ———, residence ———; Geo. W. Courson, Deputy Sheriff; W. J. McGrail, City; W. D. Paris, City."

The certificate of the clerk to said warrant is indorsed thereon as follows:

"The State of Alabama, Jefferson County. I, John G. Bradley, clerk of the criminal court of Jefferson county, in and for said county and state, do hereby certify that the within and foregoing is a true, complete, and correct copy of the affidavit and warrant now on file in my office, in a cause wherein the state of Alabama is plaintiff and Henry Coleman is defendant, which cause is now pending for trial. Witness my hand this 6th day of January, 1908. John G. Bradley, Clerk."

The requisition issued by the Governor of the state of Texas is as follows:

"The State of Texas, to All and Singular the Sheriffs, Constables, and Other Civil Officers of said State: Whereas, it has been made known to me by the Governor of the state of Alabama that Henry Coleman stands charged by indictment before the proper authorities with the crime of murder, committed in said state, and that the said defendant has taken refuge in the state of Texas; and whereas, the said Governor, in pursuance of the Constitution and laws of the United States, has demanded of me that I cause the said fugitive to be arrested and delivered to Robt. L. Collier, who is, as is satisfactorily shown, duly authorized to receive him into custody and convey him back to said state; and whereas, said demand is accompanied by copy of said indictment, duly certified as authentic by the Governor of said state: Now, therefore, I, T. M. Campbell, Governor of Texas, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and laws of this state and of the United States, do issue this my warrant, commanding all sheriffs, constables, and other civil officers of this state to arrest and aid and assist in arresting said fugitive, and to deliver him, when arrested, to the said agent, in order that he may be taken back to said state, to be dealt with for said crime. In testimony whereof, I have hereunto signed my name and have caused the seal to be hereon impressed, at Austin, Texas, this 13th day of January, A. D. 1908. T. M. Campbell, Governor.

"By the Governor: L. T. Dashiell, Secretary of State."

The original authorization is as follows:

"Executive Department, State of Alabama. The Governor of the State of Alabama, to All to Whom These Presents shall Come—Greeting: Know ye that Robt. L. Collier is hereby authorized and empowered, as agent on the part of this state, to receive from the proper authorities of the state of Texas Henry Coleman, charged with the crime of murder, and who is a fugitive from justice, and convey him to this state, to be dealt with according to law. All persons are therefore requested to permit the said agent at his own proper cost to remove the said Henry Coleman unmolested into this state; the said agent peaceably and lawfully behaving. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the great seal of the state to be affixed at the capitol in the city of Montgomery, this 7th day of Jan'y, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eight, and in the one hundred and thirty-second year of American Independence. B. B. Comer, Governor of Alabama.

"By the Governor: Frank N. Julian, Secretary of State."

On the trial of the case before this court evidence was introduced showing conclusively that W. H. Coleman is the relator. Henry Coleman, the man called for in the executive warrant. Relator filed what he terms a contravention of the last statement; but, after a careful perusal of same, we find that there is no dispute thereof offered of the statement that he is the person wanted under the Governor's warrant. But he insists that after he committed the homicide he remained in Alabama for some time, then went to Georgia, and had been living in Texas a number of years; but in no respect does he dispute the fact that he is the same person for whom the Governor of this state issued his requisition, or executive warrant. We do not deem it necessary to comment in detail on the evidence on this question; but this, as we understand it, is the legal effect and proof upon the question as to relator's identity. Then we are relegated back to the question of the sufficiency of the papers upon which the executive warrant is issued.

In approaching the question in this case, we deem it appropriate and quite apt to quote the language used by that great jurist, Judge Roberts, in the case of Hibler v. State, 43 Tex. 208, in discussing the duty of one Governor to honor a requisition, when properly made: "This provision of the Constitution of the United States, requiring the surrender of fugitives from justice, is in the nature of a treaty stipulation between the states of the Union, and it is equally binding upon each state and all of the officers thereof, for its faithful execution, as though it was a part of the Constitution of each state, whether Congress had passed laws relating thereto or not. Those laws have been passed to establish uniformity in the mode of performing this constitutional duty resting upon each state. When its execution is put into active operation by the proper authority of this state, the Governor, based upon the authentic information and demand as required by law, it is equally obligatory upon all of the officers of this state as is the enforcement of any criminal proceeding under the Constitution and laws of this state; and any undue means resorted to for the purpose of thwarting or preventing the due execution of this duty of the states are equally to be reprehended. This may be done by abusing and perverting the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus, as well as by any other means. This is a great writ of liberty, by being left unshackled with forms and conditions in the mode of obtaining it. Therefore it can easily be obtained where there is no foundation for it in fact or in law." We recognize, as suggested by the learned judge, that the beneficent writ of habeas corpus unshackled, as it is and ought to be, can be used as a means of frustrating the orderly proceedings and due administration of the laws of this state, and we hold that in this case the relator has abused the principle of the writ, in that there is no merit in his insistence that he is illegally restrained of his liberty. But under relator's insistence we will now proceed to pass upon many, if not all, of his insistences why he should be released.

We will first consider the supposed defects in the papers issued by the Governor of this state. It will be seen, from the warrant above copied, that the Governor says Henry Coleman stands charged by indictment before the proper authorities with the crime of murder; whereas, in truth and in fact, he is charged by an affidavit, as indicated by the affidavit of Elisha A. Reeves, above copied. This is a mere clerical error, since we can look, and must look, to both papers—that is, the executive warrant and the affidavit—and, when construed together, it clearly appears to have been a clerical error, in using the word "indictment" in the executive warrant. The Supreme Court of New Hampshire, in the case of State ex rel. Munsey v. Clough, 72 N. H. 178, 53 Atl. 1086, 67 L. R. A. 946, says that a Governor's warrant for the arrest of a fugitive from justice is not void because it describes the offense as uttering forged wills, where the indictment in each count charged the uttering and publication as true of a "certain forged instrument purporting to be a will," where, by reference to the indictment, the meaning of the warrant is rendered plain and definite. So in this case, by reference to the warrant of the executive, it will be seen that it was the sheerest inadvertence that the word "indictment," instead of "affidavit," was used. Furthermore, said last-cited case holds that a finding that an accused is a fugitive from justice is not precluded by the fact that the indictment shows that the offenses were committed more than six years before the indictment was found. The application of the last-cited principle is pertinent, in this: Appellant insisted by his affidavit and testimony that by reason of the fact that he remained in Alabama for some time after the homicide, moved to Georgia, remaining in constant communication with the authorities in Alabama, or at least his whereabouts being well known by them, and moved from the last-named state to Texas, where he has lived a number of years, precludes the conclusion that he is a fugitive from justice. This proposition is furthermore answered by Judge Roberts in the case of Hibler v. State, 43 Tex. 203. It is there held that "a person who commits a crime in one state, for which he is indicted, and departs therefrom, and is found in another state, may well be regarded as a fugitive from justice in the sense in which it is here used."

It seems that after the arrest of relator the sheriff of Dallas county, who now has him in charge, was furnished an indictment, which indictment does not state the county or the state in which the crime was committed, nor the date thereof. The statement is made in the evidence that this indictment was furnished the sheriff by the officers of the state of Alabama. It will be noted, however, that the Governor of this state granted the requisition upon an affidavit, and not upon an indictment. The affidavit was made and the requisition granted prior to the time the indictment was found, and is in no sense a predicate for assailing the validity of the executive warrant of this state. However, even if appellant's insistence be correct, in the case of Ex parte Pearce, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 306, 23 S. W. 15, this court decided this question against appellant in the following language: "In the case at bar there is no question as to the nature of the crimes charged, and that they are offenses against the laws of Alabama. Embezzlement and theft are crimes in every state of the Union. Neither time nor place are essential elements in said crimes. We do not think an indictment failing to charge time and venue must necessarily be fatally defective in every state in the Union, whatever be its statutes or forms of proceeding. In the case of Noles v. State, 24 Ala. 693, this question was passed on by the Supreme Court, which held that the then Code, dispensing with the necessity of allegation of time and venue, but requiring proof thereof, was not against the Bill of Rights; that the accusation of the commission of crime is the gravamen of the indictment that could not be dispensed with, but the particulars as to time, place, and circumstance, not constituting essential elements in the crime, may be dispensed with by statute, and be left as a matter of proof in establishing jurisdiction." So, if relator was held, as he insists, under an indictment that states no venue, that states no time, under the above excerpt from the decision last cited, it will be seen that, under the laws of the state of Alabama, these are not requisites of an indictment in said state. The indictment is preferred by a grand jury of Jefferson county, Ala. So, even conceding, as stated, relator's insistence that the requisition was granted upon the indictment above described, still this would not vitiate the proceedings or entitle relator to be discharged. In the Pearce Case, last cited, the lamented Judge Hurt very aptly put the duty of this court on the question of requisition, as follows: "Our position upon this question is that if it reasonably appears upon the trial of the habeas corpus that the relator is charged by indictment in the demanding state, whether the indictment be sufficient or not under the law of that state, the court trying the habeas corpus will not discharge the relator because of substantial defects in the indictment under the laws of the demanding state. To require this would entail upon the court an investigation of the sufficiency of the indictment in the demanding state, when the true rule is that, if it appears to the court that he is charged by indictment with an offense, all other prerequisites being complied with, the applicant should be extradited." The last expression of this court upon this question was in the case of Ex parte Denning, 100 S. W. 401, 18 Tex. Ct. Rep. 740. The requisition in that case presented to the Governor contained the following requisites: "(1) That the affidavit had been lodged in the demanding state. (2) The demand was made by the Governor of that state, stating that the affidavit was authentic. This left no discretion to the executive of this state. The law is mandatory when these two requirements are made, and there is but one thing for the executive of this state to do, and that is to issue the warrant, after ascertaining that the party was in fact a fugitive within the borders of this state, the manner of which ascertainment is left entirely to the discretion of the Governor of the fugitive state."

The papers before us are in all things formal, and, as stated at the outset of this opinion, there can be no serious cavil over the fact that the sheriff of this county legally holds said relator under said executive warrant, and he is hereby remanded to the custody of said A. L. Ledbetter, sheriff of Dallas county, to be turned over by him to Robert L. Collier, who has heretofore been authorized by the Governor of Alabama to receive him and carry him from this state to the state of Alabama.

DE ROACH et al. v. CLARDY et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 14, 1908. On Rehearing, Nov. 4, 1908.)

1. DEEDS (§ 38*)—EXCEPTIONS—VALIDITY—UNCERTAINTY OF EXCEPTED PART—EFFECT.

A grant of a certain entire tract, excepting a part thereof, is not executory, and, if the land excepted is not described with certainty, the exception will fail, and not the grant, as the uncertainty affects the exception only.

2. DEEDS (§ 137*)—EXCEPTIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

A grant of all "that portion of a tract of 150 acres," described, except certain parcels previously conveyed, and excepting further "three acres upon which our residence now is, and adjoining the same," was a grant of the entire 150 acres excepting therefrom what had been conveyed and the three acres, and not of that portion of the 150 acres remaining after taking away the excepted parts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 457; Dec. Dig. § 137.*]

3. DEEDS (§ 140*)—EXCEPTIONS—CONSTRUCTION—SELECTION OF LAND EXCEPTED.

A deed granted all "that portion" of a certain tract of 150 acres, excepting "three acres upon which our residence now is, and adjoining the same, and which said tract is to be hereafter surveyed for us," and thereafter the grantor conveyed a lot adjacent to the residence, bounding it by the land so conveyed. Held, that the deed, construed in the light of the grantor's subsequent conveyance, showed that the grantor had the right of selecting the three acres excepted, so that the grantee was not bound to make a survey to give validity to the deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Dec. Dig. § 140.*]

4. DEEDS (§ 140*)—EXCEPTIONS—CONSTRUCTION—SELECTION OF LAND EXCEPTED.

Where a tract was granted, excepting three acres, which the grantor had the right to select, he could not defeat the grant by failing to make the selection.

5. JUDGMENT (§ 252*)—RELIEF GRANTED—CONFORMITY TO PLEADINGS.

In trespass to try title to land conveyed by plaintiff's predecessors, the deed excepting three acres which were to be thereafter surveyed, but had never been determined with certainty, plaintiff seeking to have the deed declared void and the land it purported to convey adjudged in him, upon judgment for defendant, plaintiff may not complain that the judgment did not adjudicate the boundaries of the three acres, as he was not entitled to that relief under the pleadings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 441, 442; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

On Motion for Rehearing.

6. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE (§ 35*)—PLEADING—VARIANCE.

Where, in trespass to try title, defendant pleads title specially, he cannot rely on any other title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass to Try Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 50-52; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

7. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE (§ 6*)—RIGHT OF ACTION—TITLE TO SUPPORT ACTION.

Plaintiff in trespass to try title cannot recover if he fails to make out his title, even though defendant pleads specially a title which he fails to prove.

Appeal from District Court, El Paso County; J. M. Goggins, Judge.

Action by L. Aguirre De Roach and others against Allie D. Clardy and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

F. G. Morris, for appellants. A. G. Foster and Turney & Burges, for appellees.

JAMES, C. J. Appellants were the plaintiffs in an action of trespass to try title against Mrs. Allie D. Clardy and F. Desloge. Plaintiffs alleged possession in themselves of a certain tract of 53¼ acres of land, which remained of a larger tract of 150 acres described in a deed from Pedro Aguirre and wife to Zeno B. Clardy and F. Desloge, less parts thereof previously conveyed by Aguirre and wife, and 3 acres in a certain locality. The amended petition set forth said deed; that plaintiffs were the heirs of Pedro Aguirre and wife; that defendant Allie B. Clardy was the sole devisee and independent executrix of Zeno B. Clardy, and alleged that said deed never took effect as a conveyance of any land, for that there was never surveyed for the said Pedro Aguirre and wife three acres of land upon which their residence was at the time the deed was signed, and adjoining said residence, and, without such survey being made for them of said land, said deed did not identify any land so as to operate as a conveyance thereof; that no survey of said three acres having ever been made, said deed, if it had any effect, remained executory, and did not take effect as to any land and has so remained for 4 years, more than 10 years, and 19 years, after its execution, wherefore the right of the vendees, if any such right existed to have said survey made of said three acres for Pedro Aguirre or his heirs, so as to give effect to said deed, has long since become a stale demand, and said right is also barred by the statute of four years. The prayer was for decree setting aside said deed, that plaintiffs have their title to said land established, and defendants' claim thereto, constituting a cloud on plaintiffs' title, removed, and for general relief. The above indicates the nature of the case. The result of the trial will be shown by a brief statement from the judge's conclusions; there being otherwise no statement of facts.

The court found that the deed, as above described, was executed by Pedro Aguirre and wife on July 14, 1887; "that neither plaintiffs nor defendants at any time have surveyed or otherwise segregated the three acres for Pedro Aguirre or his heirs adjoining his residence, except that sufficient land remains unsold around the residence of Pedro Aguirre to make the quantity of three acres, and that possession of the land around the residence of said Pedro Aguirre has at all times remained in Pedro Aguirre and wife, and since their deaths in their heirs, and that such possession of said land has always been respected by said defendants, and that said defendants have treated the land so held by plaintiffs as the property of Pedro Aguirre, his wife, and their heirs, and it was generally understood by the parties that the three acres meant were three acres immediately surrounding the house; that the plaintiffs executed a deed to a portion of the land lying east of the Aguirre home, describing said land as being bounded on the east 119 feet with the lands of Mr. Clardy and bounded on the north 56 feet with land of Mr. Clardy, which deed was a confirmation deed of one given by Ysabel Aguirre in her lifetime on February 7, 1891"; that Pedro Aguirre and his wife remained in possession of said homestead and resided there until their death, the latter dying in 1892, and that thereafter and up to this time their daughter has remained there, but not by such assertion of claim as makes title to land by limitation, and that neither plaintiffs nor defendants had any title by that character of possession. The court also found that Z. B. Clardy and F. Desloge paid taxes on 170 acres out of the Elijah Bennett survey No. 11 in the year 1887 and in 1888 and all subsequent years on 250 acres out of said survey, and that Victoriano Martinez (husband of one of the plaintiffs) rendered for taxes in 1888 in the name of Pedro Aguirre 30 acres of said survey, and in 1890 there was rendered and paid on 3 acres of said survey in the name of Pedro Aguirre, and that for the years 1904, 1905, 1906, and 1907 Chona Lucero, who remained in possession of the Aguirre house, rendered and paid taxes on 3 acres of said survey, and stated that her claim was for 3 acres of land. The court's conclusion of law was that the deed by Pedro Aguirre and wife operated to vest title in Clardy and Desloge to all the land described as unsold, except three acres adjoining the house in which Aguirre and wife resided at the time the deed was executed. The judgment rendered was that plaintiffs take nothing and that defendants have and recover of plaintiffs the land involved, describing the 53¼ acres by metes and bounds, "except three acres" of land upon which was situated on the 14th day of July, 1887, the residence of Pedro Aguirre and wife, and adjoining said residence. Plaintiffs have appealed.

The two propositions upon which appellants rely in this court under their assignments are:

First proposition:

"The granting clause of the deed from Aguirre and wife to Clardy and Desloge being operative only on 'that portion of a tract of 150 acres * * * except [certain tracts before sold], and excepting, further, three acres upon which our residence now is, and adjoining the same, and which said tract is to be hereafter surveyed for us,' the grant could not take effect without identifying that on which the grant was to operate by eliminating that on which the grant did not operate. The grantors did not convey the 150-acre tract by the granting clause and then provide for exceptions out of it of certain parts, but the granting clause only operated on that portion which remained after withholding from the operative words of conveyance all except that part remaining after eliminating certain parts, and, the three acres to be surveyed adjoining and to include the house not being described so that they could be identified at the time the deed was executed, the deed attempted to convey a particular part of a larger survey, and not an undivided interest, and, the part on which the granting clause was intended to operate not being susceptible to identification otherwise than by describing the parts on which the granting clause did not operate, the deed constituted an attempt to convey and describe a particular part of a larger tract of land, and was void for uncertainty as to the particular part on which the conveyance was intended to operate, and did not convey an undivided interest, this not being intended by the parties, and, the right given the grantees to select and survey for the grantors three acres adjoining and to include the grantors' house never having been exercised, the deed never took effect as a conveyance of any land, but remained executory. Without such selection and survey or pleading the right and offering to specifically perform the same, said deed was no obstacle to a recovery by plaintiffs, the successors in title of the grantors, in an action of trespass to try title."

Second proposition:

"The deed under which defendants claim not having vested any title when executed, but having remained executory, the right of defendants to tender performance by selecting and surveying for plaintiffs, especially as to J. A. Lowe, who holds by purchase from the heirs of the grantor, after 20 years from the accrual of a cause of action for specific performance accrued, is barred by the four-year statute of limitation, and has become a stale demand, and could not now be exercised, nor was any offer or tender of performance made in this suit. Therefore judgment should have been for plaintiffs." The exceptions in the granting clause are in the following language: "Have granted, sold, and conveyed, and by these presents do grant, sell, and convey, unto the said F. Desloge and Zeno B. Clardy * * * all that certain piece or parcel of land situated in the county of El Paso and state of Texas, and being all that portion of a tract of 150 acres part of survey No. 11 conveyed to said Pedro Aguirre by Joseph Magaffin * * * except certain pieces or parcels of land out of said tract which we have heretofore conveyed by deed to * * * all of said deeds to said grantees being recorded in the deed records of said county * * * and excepting further three acres upon which our residence now is and adjoining the same and which said tract is to be hereafter surveyed for us." The parts referred to as previously sold off were identified. The primary contention of appellants is that the granting clause did not purport to grant the entire tract of 150 acres less the exceptions; but in express language operated only upon what land was left after taking from the 150-acre tract the parcels excepted. The rule is that a grant of a certain entire tract, excepting a portion, is not executory in any sense, and, if the land sought to be excepted is so described as to be unascertainable, it is the exception that will fail, and not the grant, as the uncertainty affects the exception only. Loyd v. Oates, 143 Ala. 231, 38 South. 1022, 111 Am. St. Rep. 39; McAllister v. Honea, 71 Miss. 256, 14 South. 264. The converse of this proposition is what appellants invoke as applicable to the granting clause in question. The position is made clear by a quotation from Frank v. Myers, 97 Ala. 444, 11 South. 835, in discussing certain cited cases: "In neither of these cases did the vendor sell a certain whole excepting an uncertain part, but attempted to sell an uncertain part of a certain whole. The uncertainty and infirmity which render inoperative a sale like these lie in the grant itself, and not in any uncertain exception from the grant." There is therefore some ground for appellant's construction of the clause, because it uses the words "that portion" of the tract of 150 acres, from which it would appear that this granting clause operated upon, and was in terms addressed, only to that portion of the 150 acres which remained after taking off the excepted parts, using the excepted parts of the 150 acres merely as a matter of description of "that portion" which was granted; that making uncertainty exist in the grant itself.

The contention just referred to is, however, dealing with the clause upon the abstract theory that the three-acre exception as described in the deed is incapable of identification. As we think the said three-acre tract was left, and is, susceptible of identification, there is really no need of our holding that this granting clause is or is not entitled to the effect contended for. We will state, nevertheless, that the clause, when read in its entirety, shows that the intention of the grantors was to pass title to all of the 150 acres, excepting therefrom what had previously been conveyed and the 3 acres. The very use of the word "except" indicates this. The exception reads: "And excepting, further, three acres upon which our residence now is and adjoining the same and which said tract is to be hereafter surveyed for us." The facts are that the deed was made in July, 1887; that the grantors were living in a house upon the three acres at the time, and up to their death, the husband dying first and the wife dying in 1892, and their heirs have since been living there, using the surrounding land, it being treated as theirs by defendants; that it was generally understood that the three acres meant the three acres immediately surrounding the house, and that in November, 1906, the plaintiff Carolina Aguirre Martinez and her husband executed a deed to a portion of land lying east of the Aguirre house, describing the same as being bounded on the east 119 feet with the lands of Mr. Clardy and bounded on the north 56 feet with land of Mr. Clardy, which deed was a confirmation deed of one given by Ysabel Aguirre in her lifetime in 1891. In the first place, we believe that appellant's counsel is in error in saying that the deed imposed upon the grantees the duty to survey the three-acre tract for the grantors. The deed does not say so. It says that it was to be surveyed for the grantors. We take this to mean that it was to be surveyed in their behalf, or in their interest. It meant that the grantors were to have the three acres about the house as they wished it. It would be wholly unreasonable to say (unless the deed had expressed otherwise) that the grantees were authorized to survey off any three acres, including the house, in any shape they saw fit, for the grantors, when both the exception and the mode of its ascertainment were manifestly to be in the interest of the grantors, they alone knowing their desires in that respect. But we are not left to the bare language of the deed. In questions of this kind light is thrown upon what was intended by the practical construction placed upon the clause by the parties. Neither party called upon the other to make any designation. The surrounding land remained open except as used by the occupants of the Aguirre house. But in 1891 Mrs. Aguirre, who had survived her husband, deeded a lot east of the house and bounded it on the east and north by the land of Mr. Clardy, which deed was long afterward confirmed by another deed. This would appear to have been in respect to the excepted three acres, and a selection, or designation in respect to it, at least so far as fixing one corner was concerned, and the north and east lines to some extent. We thus have the grantors acting upon the theory that the deed gave them the right of selection, and it does not appear that this exercise of the right was ever questioned.

Accordingly we conclude that it was not necessary for the grantees to designate the three acres, in order to give the deed validity. The matter involved here is essentially different for a grant such as of a certain number of acres to be selected by the grantee out of a tract, which is held to be executory, and as not confirming any title until the selection is made, and that such right of selection in the grantee may not be enforced after the lapse of too long a time. The present is the case of a grant, depending upon the selection or description by the grantor of a certain excepted number of acres at a certain locality, and he and his heirs cannot defeat the grant by their own failure to make the selection. Enough has been said to dispose of both the propositions. The judgment rendered does not adjudicate the boundaries of the three acres. The plaintiff did not seek such adjudication, but sought to have the deed declared void, and to have the entire land attempted to be conveyed by it adjudged to them. This they were not entitled to, and under the pleadings and evidence they have no just reason to complain of the judgment as rendered.

Affirmed.

On Rehearing.

The amended petition on which the case was tried set forth the conveyance from plaintiffs' ancestors to defendants, and alleged that it was not signed by the ancestors, and, if signed, was void for indefinite description. We might presume that plaintiffs introduced the deed in evidence. The fact is it was introduced and was the basis of the controversy; and, by whomsoever introduced, it precluded plaintiffs from recovering upon their pleadings in so far as it had validity as a conveyance. It is true that defendants pleaded and sought to establish that the three acres had been agreed upon, or had been selected, and that the proof failed to show this. Nevertheless defendants were entitled to the benefits the deed conferred on them, and plaintiffs were not entitled to relief contrary to its effect. The judgment entered was in accordance with a correct construction of the deed, and the court, evidently from lack of proof, was unable to correctly go further than to make the adjudication it did. It is undoubtedly true that when, in trespass to try title, defendant pleads title specially, he can rely on no other. But, viewing the amended pleading as embodying the statutory action of trespass to try title (which we think it was not), it is equally true that plaintiff in such an action, even when defendant pleads specially a title which he fails to prove, cannot recover if the evidence develops he has no right to the relief he asks. *Hayes v. Appeal from Pulaski Chancery Court; Jesse C. Hart, Chancellor.

Action by Cinderella E. Blackburn against L. W. Cherry, trustee. From a decree dismissing the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Carmichael, Brooks & Powers, for appellant. Whipple & Whipple, for appellee.

HILL, C. J. Cinderella E. Blackburn and Gideon E. Blackburn were husband and wife, and the wife owned the tract of land in controversy, containing 160 acres, situated in Pulaski county. Mrs. Blackburn obtained a decree of divorce from her husband on the 9th of October, 1890. A certain deed, purporting to be executed by her and her then husband, Gideon E. Blackburn, on the 5th of June, 1890, conveyed the land to James P. Webb. Mrs. Blackburn brought suit in chancery, alleging that said deed was a forgery, and asked that the defendants be restrained and enjoined from selling and conveying the property and from transferring, negotiating, or handling any of the purchase-money notes which they may have given to Gideon E. Blackburn for it, and that the deed be set aside and held for naught, and her title quieted. The suit was brought against Blackburn, who was subsequently dismissed from it, and against Cherry and Cox, who held under conveyances the validity of which was dependent upon the deed from Mrs. Blackburn to Webb. The chancellor held that said deed was not a forgery, but was a good and valid deed, and dismissed plaintiff's complaint for want of equity, and quieted the title of defendants. From this decree she has appealed.

Several questions are discussed; but, as the court views the facts, these questions are unnecessary to the determination of the case. The evidence of the forgery of the deed is the testimony of Mrs. Blackburn, which is positive and direct, and that of her daughter, who says that the signature to the deed is not the signature of her mother. On the other side, the clerk of the court before whom the deed was purported to be acknowledged testifies positively that he knew Mrs. Blackburn, and remembers her execution of the deed. He says that she signed it in his presence and acknowledged it. The deed bears his certificate and the seal of the court. It also bears the name of a third party as witness, and this party testifies that he witnessed the execution of the deed. There is some corroborating evidence tending to support each side; but this is all of the direct evidence in the record. The burden was upon Mrs. Blackburn to establish by a preponderance of the testimony that the deed was a forgery, and in this she has failed; and the chancellor properly so held. This court does not reverse chancery decrees unless the finding is against the preponderance of the evidence; and it cannot be said to be that in this case.

Even if Mrs. Blackburn had sustained her case by a preponderance of the evidence, still she would have been barred of recovery by reason of her own laches. But it is not necessary to review the facts upon that subject, as the proposition already mentioned settles the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

HART, J., who presided in the chancery court, was disqualified and did not participate. McCULLOCH, J., being related to one of the parties, did not participate.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 230*)—TITLE—NOTICE OF OUTSTANDING CLAIMS—RECITALS IN CONVEYANCE.

A recital in a patent that it was issued upon a certificate issued from the land department "in favor of A., widow of J.," did not charge one in whose chain of title the patent was a link with notice that the conveyance was to A. as widow or by virtue of her rights as widow; the words "widow of J.," being only a description of the person, and not limiting the estate taken by the patent.

Appeal from Mississippi Chancery Court; Edward D. Robertson, Chancellor.

Suit by G. W. Thompson and others against W. J. Bowen. Decree for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Edwards & Ledbetter and D. F. Taylor, for appellants. W. J. Driver, for appellee.

McCULLOCH, J. Appellants, as heirs at law of James H. Thompson, deceased, sue to recover a quarter section of land in Mississippi county. In 1885 James H. Thompson purchased said tract of land, which was swamp and overflowed land, from the state of Arkansas, paid the purchase price, and received a certificate of entry. He died in 1861, leaving surviving his widow, Ann Thompson, and two children, who continued in possession of the land. In 1870 the State Land Commissioner, upon proof being made by affidavit filed in his office of the loss of said certificate, issued a duplicate certificate to the widow, Ann Thompson; and on February 23, 1870, the Governor of the state executed to Ann Thompson his deed on behalf of the state, purporting to convey said land to her in fee simple. The deed contained a recital that "the Land Commissioner of the state of Arkansas did grant his certificate, dated the 12th day of February, 1870, and numbered 56, to and in favor of Ann Thompson, widow of James H. Thompson," for said land. It also recited that "Ann Thompson is entitled to a deed from the state of Arkansas for said lands," and purports to convey the same to "Ann Thompson and her heirs and assigns." The same language is employed in the habendum clause, and in no part of the deed is any reference made to the prior issuance of the certificate to James H. Thompson. This deed was duly recorded, and on January 2, 1900, said Ann Thompson, who had continued in possession of the land up to that time, sold and conveyed it to appellee, who paid a valuable consideration and claims to be innocent of any actual knowledge or information concerning the issuance of a certificate to James H. Thompson. Appellants pray that the appellee be declared to be a trustee for them as equitable owners of the land and that the same be decreed to them.

The preponderance of the testimony supports the finding of the chancellor that appellee had no actual knowledge of any infirmity in the title, and the only question of law presented for our consideration is whether or not he is chargeable with constructive notice of the purchase of the land by James H.

Thompson and the issuance to the latter of the certificate of entry.

It is a well-established principle of law that a purchaser of real estate must take notice of all prior recorded instruments in the line of his purchased title. Is a certificate of entry, issued by the state prior to the issuance of a patent to another person, to be considered in the line of title of persons holding under the patent, so as to charge them with notice of outstanding equities under the certificate? This court seems to have already answered this question in the negative. Osceola Land Co. v. Chicago M. & L. Co., 84 Ark. 1, 103 S. W. 609. In that case, which involved this question, Mr. Justice Riddick, speaking for the court, said: "Chatfield held under a patent from the state, and those who purchased from him could, in the absence of actual notice, rest upon the presumption that the officers of the state had done their duty and issued the patent to the person entitled to receive it." The same view is expressed by the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. C. & O. Land Co., 148 U. S. 31, 13 Sup. Ct. 458, 37 L. Ed. 354.

My attention is now directed to the fact that Mr. Justice BATTLE and myself are noted as dissenting in the case of Osceola Land Co. v. Chicago M. & L. Co., supra. This is an error. We both concurred in the result reached by the court in that case, but differed with the other judges, who held that the tax confirmation decree in favor of Boynton had the effect of transferring any equitable right or title which Rozell may have had. We thought that the decree did not have such effect, and that for this additional reason the decree of the chancellor was erroneous, and should be reversed. We should have been noted as concurring in the result, but not in the opinion, instead of dissenting.

But it is contended by counsel for appellants that, conceding that appellee was not chargeable with constructive notice of the prior certificate of entry issued to James H. Thompson and the equitable title which passed thereunder, the recitals of the patent to Ann Thompson were sufficient to put him upon actual notice of the prior certificate. The patent recites that it was issued upon a certificate issued from the land department "in favor of Ann Thompson, widow of James H. Thompson." It is argued that this recital was sufficient to indicate that Ann Thompson took the title as widow of James H. Thompson, and by virtue of her right as widow, and that it was notice to appellee that Ann Thompson held the title in trust for the heirs of James H. Thompson. Appellee was, of course, chargeable with notice of all recitals in the conveyance in the chain of his title; but we do not think this recital was sufficient to indicate that the conveyance was to Ann Thompson as widow, or by virtue of her rights as widow. The employment of the words "widow of James H. Thompson" can only be regarded as descriptive of the person, and not as limiting the estate taken under the patent. 13 Cyc. 625; Jackson v. Roberts, 95 Ky. 410, 25 S. JEFFERY et al. v. JEFFERY et al.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 12, 1908.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 113*)—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In ejectment, where plaintiffs claimed under adverse possession of themselves and ancestors, evidence that plaintiffs' father had told them that the land belonged to their mother was not admissible to establish adverse possession, but only to show the character and extent of his possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 670; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 13*)—REQUISITES—OPEN AND NOTORIOUS POSSESSION.

To acquire title by adverse possession, there must be open, notorious, peaceable, continuous, and adverse possession of the land for more than seven years.

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 114*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Admissions by defendant, holding the paper title to land, held not sufficient to establish title in others by adverse possession.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Izard County; J. W. Meeks, Judge.

Ejectment by M. E. Jeffery and others against P. H. Jeffery and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

J. B. Baker, for appellants. McCaleb & Reeder, for appellees.

HART, J. This is an action of ejectment brought in the Izard circuit court by the plaintiffs, M. E. Jeffery, W. W. Jeffery, and R. M. Jeffery against the defendants, P. H. Jeffery and the Mt. Olive Stove Company, for the possession of the lands described in the complaint. Plaintiffs allege that their mother, Mary A. Jeffery, departed this life intestate on the 19th day of August, 1892, leaving them as her children and only heirs at law, and that at the date of her death she was seised and possessed of the lands described in the complaint; that the plaintiffs became tenants in common of said lands, subject to the curtesy of their father, Asa Jeffery, who held possession of the lands until his death, which occurred in June, 1906; that the plaintiffs and their said ancestors have held the open, notorious, peaceable, continuous, and adverse possession of said lands for more than seven years continuously prior to the year 1904, claiming it as their own; and that they became the owners thereof by virtue of the statute of limitations. Defendants answered, denying the allegations of the complaint, and affirmatively set up title in themselves by virtue of a commissioner's deed, executed pursuant to the judgment and order of the probate court of Izard county. The evidence is sufficiently stated in the opinion in discussing the effect of it. There was a jury trial, and a verdict for the plaintiffs, and defendants have appealed.

Defendants contend that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence. In this they are correct. It is not disputed that the paper title is in the defendant P. H. Jeffery. In 1873, Asa Jeffery, the father of the plaintiffs, and Ambrose Jeffery, while they were partners in business, bought the land in controversy at a guardian's sale in the probate court, and executed their note for the purchase money. They were indebted to the defendant P. H. Jeffery for service rendered the firm, and assigned to him their certificate of purchase in payment therefor, and for the further consideration that he pay the balance due by them on the purchase money. This he did, and by order of the probate court the deed was executed to him, reciting the above facts. Plaintiffs claim title by the adverse possession of themselves and of their ancestors. In support of their claim they testified that their father, Asa Jeffery, had told them that the land in controversy belonged to their mother. These declarations were not admissible for the purpose of establishing adverse possession, but were only admissible to show the character and extent of his possession. Seawell v. Young, 77 Ark. 309, 91 S. W. 544.

The only other evidence is that of witnesses who testify that P. H. Jeffery had admitted to them that the land in controversy belonged to Asa Jeffery, and that he had paid a mare at one time and some cotton at another to Asa Jeffery, which witness M. E. Jeffery understood was for rent of the land. P. H. Jeffery explains that he had sold to Asa Jeffery a mare and took his notes for same, and that he sent M. E. Jeffery after them. He stated that block 6, which belonged to Asa Jeffery, and block 7, the land in controversy, were under a common inclosure by agreement, and that he rented both pieces to the same tenant in 1888; that he collected the rent, and sent half of it to Asa Jeffery by M. E. Jeffery.

Plaintiffs and their ancestors must have held the open, notorious, peaceable, continuous, and adverse possession of the lands for more than seven years, to amount to an investiture of title. Jacks v. Chaffin, 34 Ark.

534; Logan et al. v. Jelks, 34 Ark. 547; Crease v. Lawrence, 48 Ark. 812, 3 S. W. 196; Nicklace v. Dickerson, 65 Ark. 422, 46 S. W. 945. We do not think that the admissions testified to as having been made by P. H. Jeffery are sufficient to establish title by adverse possession.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

KNAUFF v. NATIONAL COOPERAGE & WOODENWARE CO.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 12, 1908.)

1. QUIETING TITLE (§ 14*)—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—PAYMENT OF TAXES.

Kirby's Dig. §§ 661-675, authorizing confirmation of tax titles and other titles under involuntary sales, provided petitioner shall have "paid taxes on the lands for at least two years after the expiration of the right of redemption," does not apply to an adversary suit to litigate conflicting titles and quiet the superior one, so as to require plaintiff to allege payment of such taxes, as the jurisdiction of chancery over such subjects is exercised independently of statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 809*)—CONFIRMATION OF TAX TITLE—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint alleging that plaintiff was the owner of lands, claiming under a tax deed, that the lands were not occupied by an adverse claimant, and that defendant was asserting title thereto and paying taxes, states a cause of action to quiet title under the general equity jurisdiction of the court, irrespective of whether plaintiff was entitled to a general decree for confirmation of the tax sale, under Kirby's Dig. §§ 661-675.

Appeal from Prairie Chancery Court; Jno. M. Elliott, Chancellor.

Suit by O. O. Knauff against the National Cooperage & Woodenware Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

W. A. Leach, for appellant. Thomas & Lee, for appellee.

McCULLOCH, J. Appellant filed his complaint or petition in chancery, alleging that he is the owner of certain lands in Prairie county, claiming title thereto under a clerk's deed executed July 21, 1905, pursuant to sale by the collector for delinquent taxes, and praying that his title to said lands be quieted. He also alleged that appellee is setting up a claim to said lands and has been paying taxes thereon from year to year, and he asked that appellee be made a party defendant in the suit. Appellee was brought in by service of summons, and filed its demurrer to the complaint, which the court sustained.

Appellee defends this ruling of the court on the ground that appellant fails to allege in his complaint that he had "paid taxes on the lands for at least two years after the expiration of the right of redemption," in compliance with the requirements of the statute authorizing confirmation of tax titles and other titles under involuntary sales. Kirby's Dig. §§ 661-675. It is contended that a title under a tax sale or other involuntary sale mentioned in the statute cannot be quieted unless the terms of the statute be fully complied with. The vice of this contention is that it seeks to apply the requirements of the statute to adversary suits, such as this one, between parties for the purpose of litigating conflicting titles and quieting the superior one. The statute does not control in such suits, as the jurisdiction of chancery courts over such subjects is exercised independently of statute. The statute, in so far as it confers jurisdiction in such cases over which courts of equity formerly exercised jurisdiction, is to that extent merely declaratory of existing powers, and not a grant of additional powers. Hempstead v. Watkins, 6 Ark. 317, 42 Am. Dec. 696; Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet. 210, 7 L. Ed. 655.

The complaint alleges that the land is unoccupied by an adverse claimant and that appellee is asserting title thereto and paying taxes on the land. This states a cause of action in an adversary suit, and, if sustained by proof, is sufficient to entitle appellant to relief. The court should, under that state of the case, grant the relief prayed for by removing the alleged cloud and quieting appellant's title. Even if appellant is not entitled under the statute to a general decree for confirmation of the tax sale, the complaint states a case for relief in this adversary suit against appellee, and it was error to sustain a demurrer to the complaint, which is at least good to the extent that it states grounds for equitable relief against appellee.

Reversed and remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

KITCHENS, Public Adm'r, v. JONES et al. (Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 12, 1908.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 181*)—WIDOW'S ALLOWANCE—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

A widow's allowance authorized by Kirby's Dig. § 3, to the extent of $300, can only be granted out of the decedent's personal estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 681; Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

2. CONVERSION (§ 6*)—EQUITABLE CONVERSION—SURPLUS ON FORECLOSURE.

An equity of redemption in mortgage property being an estate subject to all the incidents of ownership, a surplus arising on a foreclosure sale of land belonging to a decedent's estate is not thereby converted into personalty, but partakes of all the incidents of real estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conversion, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 181*)—MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE—SURPLUS—WIDOW'S ALLOWANCE.

The status of a decedent's estate being fixed as of the date of his death, a surplus arising on a subsequent sale of his land on mortgage foreclosure was not available for the payment of an allowance to the widow, but was distributable to the widow and children as realty, according to the statute of descent and distribution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 681; Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Phillips County; Hance N. Hutton, Judge.

Petition by Charity Jones and others against F. F. Kitchens, public administrator. Judgment for petitioners, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Campbell & Stevenson and J. M. Vineyard, for appellant. M. L. Stephenson, for appellee.

HILL, C. J. John Jones died in April, 1906, leaving a widow and children, some of whom were minors. At the time of his death he was the owner of certain real estate in the city of Helena, which was incumbered by a deed of trust. Default had occurred in the performance of the conditions of the deed of trust before his death, and, after his death, the deed was foreclosed in the chancery court, and the property sold by a commissioner of the court to satisfy the mortgage debt. The proceeds of the sale paid off the mortgage and left a surplus of $554.57, which was turned over by the commissioner in chancery to Kitchens, public administrator, who was administering the estate of Jones. The land was not the homestead of the deceased. The dower rights of the widow had been released in the trust deed. This surplus was the only asset of the estate, which was insolvent. Charity Jones filed a petition in the probate court of Phillips county, representing that she was the widow, and that there were minor children, of the said John Jones, deceased; that the estate of her husband exceeded $300 in value; and she prayed that the sum of $300 be paid to her out of said fund for the use of herself and minor children. Trial was had in the probate court, and, on appeal, in the circuit court, upon an agreed statement of facts. The circuit judge granted the petition, and the administrator has appealed.

This appeal involves a construction of section 3 of Kirby's Digest, which reads as follows: "When any person shall die leaving a widow and minor children, or widow or minor children, and it shall be made to appear to the court that the personal estate of such deceased person does not exceed in value the sum of three hundred dollars, the court shall make an order vesting such personal property absolutely in the widow and minor children, or widow or minor children, as the case may be, when the court is satisfied that reasonable funeral expenses of such persons not to exceed twenty-five dollars have been paid or secured; and in all cases where the personal estate exceeds in value the sum of three hundred dollars, the widow and minor children, or widow or minor children, as the case may be, may retain the amount of three hundred dollars out of such personal property at its appraised valuation." In Wilson v. Massie, 70 Ark. 25, 65 S. W. 942, it was held that this statute repealed the pre-existing statutes upon this subject, and effected a change in the law from an estimate of the whole mass of the decedent's property to an estimate of the personal property alone in making this allowance to the widow and minor children. This case, therefore, turns upon the character of the estate of Jones in the mortgaged property. In State for the Use of Ashley & Watkins v. Lawson et al., 6 Ark. 269, the court said: "The equity of redemption is considered to be the real and beneficial estate, tantamount to the fee at law, and is accordingly held to be descendible by inheritance, devisable by will and alienable by deed, precisely as if it were an estate of inheritance at law." The nature of the equity of redemption is thus stated in the encyclopedia: "An equity of redemption is an estate in the mortgaged property, and is subject to all the incidents of ownership. It may be conveyed or devised. It descends to the owner's heirs or personal representatives according to the nature of the mortgaged property, and is subject to curtesy and homestead." 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. 209, 210. The text is well supported by authority, including several Arkansas cases cited in the note. It is clear, therefore, that the equity of redemption left by Jones at his death was real property, and descended as real property descends.

The question remains whether its conversion into cash through the foreclosure of the mortgage changed its character within the meaning of this statute. The argument is made that the power of conversion is well established, and that the chancery court had the right to convert the realty into personalty; and, having that right, that it changed the character of the property. A consideration of the cases cited may be useful. Coolidge v. Burke, 69 Ark. 237, 62 S. W. 583, and Lenow v. Fones, 48 Ark. 557, 4 S. W. 56, were cases where the surviving partner converted partnership assets from one class of property to another, and it was held that the property passed in its converted state. The same principle was recently recognized in French v. Vanatta, 83 Ark. 306, 104 S. W. 141. There is a radical difference between those cases and this. The estate of a partner does not take a share of the partnership assets until the partnership is wound up; and a surviving partner, or a court, in order to wind it up, may convert it, and naturally the asset coming from the partnership should descend in the form in which it falls into the estate. But in the case at bar the right of the widow and minor heirs accrued, under the plain terms of the statute, at the time of the death of the husband and father, and not at a later time when, in the course of the administration of his estate, his property has been changed from realty to personalty. In Loftis v. Glass, 15 Ark. 680, and Turner v. Davis, 41 Ark. 270, the interest under consideration was the proceeds of a sale of real estate, and not the real estate itself; and it was held that the interest was personalty. That is not true here, for the inheritance was not of the proceeds, but of the land itself, subject to the mortgage, which could have been discharged at any time by the payment of the mortgage debt. In Re Simmons, 55 Ark. 485, 18 S. W. 933, after stating the rule that where a conversion is rightfully made, whether by court or trustee, all the consequences of conversion must follow, the court, through Chief Justice Cockrill, said: "It may be that this statement of the rule is subject to the explanation or qualification that the conversion takes effect only to the extent of the purpose for which conversion was required, where, for example, a surplus remains from the proceeds of land sold to satisfy a decree of foreclosure. In such a case the conversion to raise a surplus over the decree and costs was not required, and was probably not intended by the court; and the rights of the parties in interest, it is held, remain the same as if no conversion had taken place, although the sale was rightful." This statement of the principle is absolutely conclusive here, and is in accord with the authorities, as will be seen by those cited in the opinion.

Mr. Woerner thus states the same principle: "By the sale the real estate is converted into money. But the conversion is complete and effectual only to the extent and for the purposes for which the sale was authorized, whether by the will or by the order of the court. So far as these purposes do not extend, and in so far as any of them do not take effect in fact or in law, the property retains its former character in respect of the rights of its owner, and passes accordingly. The surplus of the proceeds of a sale ordered for the payment of debts remaining after the debts and expenses of administration have been discharged retains the character of real estate for the purpose of determining who is entitled to receive it, and goes to the persons to whom the real estate would have gone but for the conversion." 2 Woerner on Am. Law of Administration, § 481. The status of the decedent's estate is fixed under this statute when he dies, and the allowance contemplated by it must be made out of the personal property as it then existed, and not from the proceeds of realty which may thereafter assume personal form. In this case his equity of redemption descended at his death to his widow and children, according to the statute of descents and distribution, as realty. Its subsequent conversion to pay the debt against it does not let them in to share in it as personal property, for the only purpose of the conversion was to pay the mortgage debt, and not to change the status of the property.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a judgment in conformity to this opinion.

ST. LOUIS, I. M. & S. RY. CO. v. HARDIE.
(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 5, 1908.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 72*)—ROADBEDS—DRAINS—COMPANY'S DUTY—DEED CONSTRUED.

A railway right of way deed providing that all drains should be so bridged or protected by culverts that the flow of water should not be impeded requires the company to maintain its bridges or culverts so that the natural flow of the water is not obstructed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 118*)—RAILROADS—DRAINS—COMPANY'S DUTY.

Irrespective of any contract, a railway company must maintain culverts so as to allow free passage of surface water from adjoining lands.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 126*)—OBSTRUCTION OF DRAINS—RAILROADS—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY.

Allegations that defendant built a railway across plaintiff's land; that he conveyed a right of way on condition that all drains be so protected by culverts that the flow of water should not be impeded; that the natural drainage for surface water on lands held by him on one side of the road was across the road; that, before the road was built, plaintiff constructed ditches to assist the drainage; that defendant threw a dump or levee across drains and negligently failed to provide sufficient openings to admit the flow of surface water; that the surface water was dammed up over certain lands, retarding the growth of the crops and increasing the cost of cultivating and gathering them, etc.—sustain an action for damages aside from the liability imposed by the deed.

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 125*)—CONSTRUCTION OF DRAINS—RAILROADS—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

The measure of damages against a railway company for obstructing drains is the same, whether founded upon an express contract requiring it to keep the drains unobstructed or upon the company's liability independent of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 140; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 126*)—OBSTRUCTION OF DRAINS—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for obstructing drains, an instruction that in fixing plaintiff's damages the jury could consider the loss of the rental value of the cleared land that he was unable to cultivate, the extra cost of planting and working his crop, less the cost of gathering so much of the yield as was lost, and the cost of reclearing land, was not erroneous as authorizing recovery of the rental value of the cleared land and also the extra cost of planting and working it, especially in the absence of a request for a more specific instruction, where the case was tried on the theory that the measure of the damages to the crop was its actual value when destroyed, and that, on the cleared land which could not be cultivated, the damages were limited to its rental value.

6. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—OPINION EVIDENCE.

In an action for obstructing drains resulting in injury to crops and to land, it was not error to allow a question asked a witness "Did you have a similar piece of land, similarly situated, similarly cultivated, similar area, that you cultivated?" on the theory that it called for witness' opinion as to what the damaged land would have produced, and as to what tracts were similar, where he had testified what crops the damaged land produced, and he merely testified what an equal area of adjoining land, similar quality, produced the same year when cultivated by him in the same manner as the overflowed land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2149; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 126*)—OBSTRUCTION OF DRAINS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for damages caused by the obstruction of drains, it was not error to instruct that if the persons working the land claimed to have been damaged were share hands, working for a proportion of the crop, and no part of it belonged to them but to plaintiff, he could recover the entire damage where the evidence showed that plaintiff did not intend to rent the land, that he had control of it, and that such persons were merely hired to make the crop.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Chicot County;
H. W. Wells, Judge.

Action by William T. Hardie against the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is a suit by Wm. T. Hardie against the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company. The substance of the complaint is as follows: That the defendant company constructed an additional line of railway in Chicot county in 1903 over certain lands of plaintiff (giving course and direction of said line) for a distance of 3¼ miles, more or less. That plaintiff, by deed, conveyed the right of way to defendant over said lands on consideration that said railway should be constructed in such manner that all drains, natural or artificial, should be so bridged or protected by culverts that the flow of water from said lands and the lands adjacent thereto should in no way be impeded or restricted. (A copy of said land is filed as "Exhibit A" to the complaint.) That during the years 1904, 1905, and 1906 he was in possession of certain lands in Chicot county (described in detail), known as the "Macon Lake Plantation," consisting of 6,000 acres, and four other plantations, containing, respectively, 400, 400, 200, and 480 acres. That by the topography of said lands the natural drainage for surface water on all of said land east of the defendant's railroad is westward from the bank of Bayou Macon on the north and Macon Lake on the east, across the line of said railway, into the natural bayous on the west, thence into Bayou Macon on the south. That the natural drainage from certain other described lands is east across said railroad, with other waters from the east of same. That prior to the building of said railroad defendant (plaintiff) had constructed artificial drainage to assist said natural drainage by a complete system of ditches connecting with a "mother ditch" (describing same). That in building said additional line of railroad defendant caused to be thrown up a dump or levee the entire distance over the land of plaintiff, before described, and down the channel and across the "mother ditch" and five other ditches, and across the natural drainings of said lands, and had negligently failed to provide sufficient openings through said dump or levee to admit the flow of surface water through same from 16 acres of the lands (describing same) of plaintiff's lying east of said railroad and 200 acres lying west of said railroad, which are dependent for drainage on said "mother ditch." That during the years 1904, 1905, and 1906 the defendant, over the protest of plaintiff, carelessly, negligently, and willfully maintained its roadbed, so carelessly and negligently constructed as aforesaid, so as to cut off the drainage of said lands, though often promising plaintiff to make such openings as were necessary. That same would have been easily made, and at small expense. That by reason of said failure the defendant caused the surface water during the years 1904, 1905, and 1906 to back and dam up for a great portion of the year over said lands (describing them), and over 300 acres thereof, and thereby retarded the growth and increased the cost of cultivation and gathering and lowered the yield of a large cotton crop, to wit, 500 acres (describing same), 100 acres (describing same), and 200 acres (describing same), to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $12,000. Prayer for judgment in said amount. The defendant filed its answer, denying all the material allegations of the complaint. Testimony was adduced by the plaintiff to sustain the allegations of his complaint, and by the defendant to sustain its defense. The questions involved render it unnecessary to further state the evidence except such comments as may be made in the opinion. There was a jury trial and a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $22,000, and defendant has appealed.

T. M. Mehaffy, J. E. Williams, and Campbell & Stevenson, for appellant. Baldy Vinson, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). The following special propositions are urged to reverse the judgment:

First. That the damage to plaintiff's crops was caused by the obstructed condition of the drains and culverts; that, by the terms of its right of way deed from the plaintiff, defendant was not bound to maintain the drains and culverts across its right of way free from obstruction, but that it was plaintiff's duty to keep them open. The clause of the deed referred to is as follows: "It is further expressly understood and agreed * * * that all drains, both natural and artificial, shall be so bridged or protected by culverts that the flow of water from said lands and lands adjacent shall be in no wise impeded or restricted." Clearly the language of the deed contemplates that the railroad company should maintain its bridges or culverts so that the natural flow of the water should not be obstructed or impeded. Obviously the railroad company never intended to give up any part of its control over its roadbed, for such a course would not only tend to hinder it in the operation of its trains, but would endanger the lives of its employes and passengers. Moreover, independent of any contract, the duty of maintaining its culverts so as not to impede the free passage of the surface water was cast upon the defendant. The drains and culverts were allowed to fill up and become obstructed by the falling of dirt when the defendant was raising its roadbed, and they could have been cleaned out at a reasonable expense. This rule was announced in the case of Little Rock & Ft. Smith Ry. Co. v. Chapman, 39 Ark. 463, 43 Am. Rep. 280, and has been followed by the court ever since. A citation of only a few of the later cases is necessary. Baker v. Allen, 66 Ark. 271, 50 S. W. 511, 74 Am. St. Rep. 104; Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co. v. McCutchen, 80 Ark. 235, 96 S. W. 1054; L. R. & Ft. Smith Ry. Co. v. Wallis, 82 Ark. 447, 102 S. W. 390. The allegations of the complaint are sufficient to sustain an action for damages aside from the liability imposed by the contract, and the measure of damages would be the same whether the action is founded on the contract or on the liability of the railroad independent as announced in the Chapman and other cases supra.

Second. That the court did not correctly instruct the jury as to the measure of damages. The instruction given by the court on that point at the request of the plaintiff is as follows: "You are further instructed that if you find from a preponderance of the evidence that defendant was guilty of negligence in maintaining its roadbed, and thereby obstructed the natural drainage of the surface water from plaintiff's lands, and caused them to dam up against said roadbed and flow back over plaintiff's lands, and damages or prevents making crops thereon, your verdict will be for plaintiff for such actual damages as the evidence shows he sustained during the years 1904, 1905, and 1906 as was the result and solely due to the negligence of the defendant, with interest thereon from the time such damage occurred; and, in arriving at the amount of damages from the evidence, you will take into consideration the loss of rental value of the cleared land that he was unable to cultivate, the extra cost of planting and working his crop, less the extra cost he would have been to in gathering and working so much of the yield as was lost, the cost of reclearing land caused to have grown up by being forced to lie out as the result of such negligence, and, after finding the sum of such losses for the years 1904, 1905, and 1906 as the evidence convinces you that plaintiff has sustained, and the interest on the same from the time such losses occurred at six per cent. per annum, you will return into court written on the complaint a verdict for plaintiff, and assess his damages at that sum." At the request of the defendant, the court gave the following instruction on the measure of damages: "(15) If you should find for the plaintiff, you should assess such amount of damages as you find he has actually sustained as the necessary result of defendant's negligence, and the measure of his damages would be the cash value of the crops at the time they were destroyed, provided you find such destruction as alleged. And, in arriving at the measure of the value of his crop alleged to have been destroyed, you may take into consideration the fertility of the soil upon which they were growing, the state of their cultivation, their condition at the time of destruction, the favorable or unfavorable season following for the maturity of the crop with their probable yield. You will also take into consideration further expense of cultivation, if any further cultivation was needed, the additional expense of gathering and marketing them, and also the impending hazard or peril of weather and storms between the times they were destroyed or injured and the close of the season for maturing and gathering the same." Appellant railway company urges that the instruction given by the court at the instance of the plaintiff allows double damages. In other words that it directs the jury to find for the damages of the cleared land that appellee was unable to cultivate, its rental value, and also the extra cost of planting and working it. The different elements of damages were correctly stated in the instruction of which complaint is made. It is true that the naming of all of the elements of damage in one instruction may have caused confusion in the minds of the jury, and thus have influenced it to apply an element of damage to a class of lands to which it was not applicable, but we do not think such was the result. The testimony introduced, the instruction given on the measure of damages at the instance of the defendant, now appellant, and the whole conduct of the trial as disclosed by the record, show that the case was tried on the theory that the damages to the crop were its actual value, where it had matured sufficiently to have a market value at the time of its destruction, and that on the cleared land which could not be cultivated the damages were limited to its rental value. There was an evident intention to follow the rule laid down in the case of Railway Company v. Yarbrough, 56 Ark. 612, 20 S. W. 515, and the later case of St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. v. Morris, 76 Ark. 542, 89 S. W. 846, Little Rock & Ft. Smith Ry. Co. v. Wallis, 82 Ark. 447, 102 S. W. 390, and St. Louis, I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Saunders, 85 Ark. 111, 107 S. W. 194. Appellant's counsel must have known the meaning the court intended to convey by the instruction, and, instead of making a general objection, should have requested a specific instruction which would have eliminated the fault instead of making a general objection to it. St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Hoshall, 82 Ark. 387, 102 S. W. 207; St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Barnett, 65 Ark. 255, 45 S. W. 550.

Third. Counsel for appellant asks for a reversal of the judgment because in ascertaining the value of the damaged crop Daniel, the manager of the plantation, was permitted to answer the following question: "Did you have a similar piece of land, similarly situated, similarly cultivated, similar area, that you cultivated in 1905?" It is claimed that this was permitting Daniel to give his opinion to the jury as to what the damaged lands would have produced, and as to what tracts were similar. Daniel had already testified what amount of cotton and of cotton seed the damaged land produced. His answer to the question and to those of similar import shows that he simply stated to the jury what an equal area of adjoining land of similar quality of soil produced the same year when cultivated by him in the same manner as the overflowed land. The jury were left free to determine whether the negligence of the railroad caused the difference in production, and how much of it was caused thereby. The facts were stated to the jury, and under the instructions of the court they were left to draw their own inferences.

Fourth. Counsel for appellant also asks a reversal on account of the second instruction, which is as follows: "No. 2. The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the parties working the land claimed to have been damaged were share hands, working for a proportion of the crop, and no part of it belonged to the parties working the land, but to the plaintiff, then he is entitled to recover the entire damage and not the share hand, that the share hands were not the owners." Daniels was the only witness who testified on that point, and we quote from his testimony as follows: "Q. I want you to explain just what kind of a contract you have with your hands—whether or not you actually rent any land. A. I don't rent any land at all. I furnish the hands to make the crop. When the crop is gathered and ginned, I get one-fourth, and their provision and supplies come out of their part. Q. Have you any other kind? A. Some work on the halves under the same contract." This testimony shows that the owner did not intend to rent the land, and, taken in connection with his other testimony, shows that the owner had control of the land, and that the other parties were merely hired to make the crop. Hammock v. Creekman, 48 Ark. 264, 3 S. W. 180; Tinsley v. Craig, 54 Ark. 346, 15 S. W. 897, 16 S. W. 570. The witness Daniel made a detailed statement of the amount of damage suffered, and it is sufficient to say that his testimony warranted the verdict.

Finding no reversible error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

PHOENIX ASSUR. CO., Limited, v. LUDWIG, Secretary of State.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 12, 1908.)

CORPORATIONS (§ 643*)—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—LIABILITY FOR FILING FEES.

A foreign corporation, which ceased indefinitely to transact business within the state and to comply with the laws with reference thereto (Kirby's Dig. §§ 4337-4339, 4363), is liable, on again seeking to do business in the state, for the filing fee imposed by Act May 13, 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 746) § 3, and is not relieved therefrom on the ground that, though it suspended active business operations, there had been no complete extinction of its legal existence in the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 643.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County; Edward W. Winfield, Judge.

Mandamus by the Phoenix Assurance Company, Limited, to compel C. C. Ludwig, Secretary of State, to accept and file a copy of its charter and certificates, etc., tendered him, without requiring payment of the filing fee prescribed by Act May 13, 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 744), known as the "Wingo Act." Judgment for defendant, and the assurance company appeals. Affirmed.

Campbell & Stevenson, for appellant. Wm. F. Kirby, Atty. Gen., and Daniel Taylor, Asst. Atty. Gen., for appellee.

McCULLOCH, J. Appellant is a foreign insurance corporation, and prior to March 23, 1905, entered this state for the purpose of operating its insurance business herein. It fully complied with the laws of the state, established agencies throughout the state, and continued the operation of its business up to the above-mentioned date, when it ceased to transact business. On that date its manager in the city of New York notified the Auditor of the state of Arkansas in writing that its agents had been instructed "to cease at once from transacting business in the state," and the Auditor immediately made an indorsement on his records to the effect that appellant company had ceased to do business in the state. The General Assembly enacted a statute, approved May 13, 1907 (Acts 1907, p. 744), known as the "Wingo Act," requiring that every foreign corporation, including railroad and insurance companies, before doing business in the state, shall file in the office of the Secretary of State a copy of its charter or articles of incorporation, etc., together with a statement of its assets, liabilities, capital stock, etc., and a certificate designating its place of business in the state and an agent upon whom process may be served. The third section of the act also provides that "all corporations hereafter incorporated in this state and all foreign corporations seeking to do business in this state shall pay into the treasury of this state for the filing of articles a fee of $25.00 where the capital stock is $50,000, or under; $75.00 where the capital stock is over $50,000 and not more than $100,000; and $25.00 additional for each $100,000 of capital stock." Subsequently appellant company made tender to the Secretary of State of compliance with all the provisions of the Wingo act, except that of payment of the fee, and claimed the right to resume business in the state without paying the fee. This claim was denied by the Secretary of State, and this action was instituted in the circuit court of Pulaski county to compel him by mandamus to accept and file the copy of charter and certificates, etc., tendered to him by appellant, without requiring payment of said fee, and to issue to appellant a certificate thereof.

The position assumed by appellant's counsel in support of the claim of their client's exemption from payment of the fee is (1) that a foreign corporation, which was admitted into the state prior to the passage of the Wingo act, and whose domestic rights have not been legally terminated, cannot be required to pay the prescribed fee; and (2) that appellant's corporate rights and legal existence in the state had never been terminated, but that its legal existence in the state was still preserved. We do not deem it necessary to express an opinion as to the first contention of counsel, for we have reached the conclusion that appellant had, prior to the passage of the Wingo act, voluntarily withdrawn from the state, relinquished whatever domestic rights it possessed, so far as its right to transact business was concerned, and that in order to come into the state again for the purpose of doing business it is amenable to all the requirements of the new statute, including a payment of the prescribed fee.

It is argued by counsel with much earnestness that there is a difference between suspension of active business operations in the state by a foreign corporation and the complete extinction of its legal existence here. This difference is, we think, more theoretical than real, for a foreign corporation is admitted into the state only to transact business. Article 12, § 11, Const. 1874. It does not, by such admission, become a domestic corporation, nor acquire a permanent domicile in the state, like a domestic corporation. 19 Cyc. p. 1206; Liverpool Ins. Co. v. Board of Assessors, 44 La. Ann. 760, 11 South. 91, 16 L. R. A. 56; St. L. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. James, 161 U. S. 545, 16 Sup. Ct. 621, 40 L. Ed. 802; Wilson v. Railway Co., 64 S. C. 162, 36 S. E. 701, 41 S. E. 971. It has no other tangible existence, except in the maintenance of its place of business and the transaction of business, and when it ceases to perform those functions it has ceased to exist in the state. In this respect it is easily distinguishable from a domestic corporation, and the same rules for determining its continued existence do not apply. We do not mean to say that a mere temporary cessation of business would necessarily operate as a complete withdrawal from the state; but we hold that where a foreign corporation ceases indefinitely to maintain its place or places of business and its agents in the state and to transact business here, its legal existence here is terminated.

Moreover, there are certain annual duties required of foreign insurance corporations by the statutes of this state in order to continue their legal existence in the state after having been duly admitted, which appellant failed to do. These statutes were in force when appellant originally came into the state, and it is not contended that it has complied with them after it ceased to do business in 1905. These omissions of annual duties are set forth in the agreed statement of facts, as follows: "(b) That it did not transmit to the Auditor of State the statement required by section 4337 of Kirby's Digest. (c) That it did not file with the Auditor of State the statement required by section 4338 of Kirby's Digest, and did not pay into the state treasury the tax therein stipulated on its net receipts, except for the year 1905. (d) That it did not give the bond required by section 4339 of Kirby's Digest. (e) That it did not certify to the Auditor of State the names of agents appointed by it to solicit risks and insurance policies, or receive applications therefor, as required by section 4363 of Kirby's Digest." These omissions manifest in the most unequivocal manner an intention to completely withdraw from the state and from reach of its laws.

We are again met with the argument that these statutory requirements relate only to the transacting of business in the state and not to the right of continued existence in the state: that, notwithstanding the failure of appellant to comply with the law and its discontinuance of business in the state, it maintained an opaque existence here, which preserved its right to resume active operations at any time, with immunity from payment of an entrance fee. We do not, however, concur in this view; for, as already shown, when the foreign corporation wholly withdraws its business from the state, and ceases to do business, and ceases to comply with the laws of the state with reference thereto, it withdraws itself from the state and loses its legal identity here, except in so far as the statute restrains its departure while outstanding contracts made here remain unperformed.

The circuit court was right in refusing to issue the writ of mandamus, and his judgment is therefore affirmed.

PINKERTON v. HUDSON.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 12, 1908.)

1. BROKERS (§ 63*)—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—PERFORMANCE—RIGHT TO COMMISSION.

Where a broker furnished a purchaser, to whom defendant contracted to sell land, defendant thereby accepted the purchaser as satisfactory; and, having thereafter elected not to enforce the contract, plaintiff was entitled to recover commissions, though it was understood that plaintiff was not to have commissions until the deal was closed and the purchase money paid, when the commissions were payable therefrom.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 95; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

2. BROKERS (§ 52*)—PAYMENT OF PURCHASE PRICE.

Though a broker's contract of employment provided that he should not receive commissions unless the deal was closed, and that the commissions were payable from the proceeds of the sale, the broker, in the absence of a contract to that effect, was not required to see that the purchase price was paid before he could receive commissions, as the duty to collect the price devolved on the seller, and not on the broker.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 73; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

3. CONTRACTS (§ 65*)—CONSIDERATION.

A broker being under no obligation to see that the purchaser complied with his contract, there was no consideration for the broker's promise to pay half of the costs of a suit by the seller, to enforce the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

4. BROKERS (§ 80*)—RIGHT TO COMMISSIONS—DEFENSES.

Where a broker bound a purchaser by an enforceable contract, the broker's refusal to fulfill a promise to pay half of the costs of the seller's suit to enforce the contract was no defense to the broker's right to commissions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

5. BROKERS (§ 63*)—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION—ENFORCEMENT.

Where a broker's contract postponed his right to receive commissions until the purchase money was paid, and provided for payment therefrom, the seller, having dismissed a suit to enforce the contract, and refused to collect the purchase money, became immediately liable to the broker for commissions.

Insurance Company, and in the Standard Fire Insurance Company, to an amount, at par value, of $210,900; and that said companies are insurance companies, organized under the laws of the state of Arkansas; and that said stock was not given in and assessed to him by the assessor of this county; and that the raise complained of here was the addition of the amount complained of, in the petition by the said equalization board, to cover the taxable value of the stock of said Banks in said insurance companies. That said stock was of the value of $212,900, and was added to the assessment list of said A. B. Banks at the amount of $105,000. That said A. B. Banks was a resident at assessment time of Dallas county; and that said insurance companies had their domicile in said county." The court declared the law to be that the petitioner, "A. B. Banks, was not required to list his stock in the insurance companies for taxation, and that the equalization board should not have added the same to his assessment. That the said insurance companies are required under the law to list for taxation their capital and property." The appellant duly excepted, and asked the court to declare the law to be: "That the petitioner, A. B. Banks, was required to list his stock in the insurance companies for taxation, and that the equalization board should have added the same to his assessment; that the said insurance companies are not required to list their capital stock for taxation"—which the court refused. Appellant duly prosecutes this appeal from a judgment in favor of appellee.

Wm. F. Kirby, Atty. Gen. (T. B. Morton of counsel), for appellant. Gaughan & Sifford, and Rose, Hemingway, Cantrell & Loughborough, for appellee.

WOOD, J. (after stating the facts as above). Under section 7004, Kirby's Dig., the county boards of equalization, "may add to or take from the valuation of the personal property of any person returned by the assessor, or which may have been omitted by him, or add other items to it upon such evidence as is satisfactory, whether such return is made upon the oath of such person or upon the valuation of the assessor." Under the above section the equalization board had the authority to add the stock of the appellee in the insurance companies to his personal assessment, if such stock was liable to taxation as against him. Section 6902, Kirby's Dig., provides that "no person shall be required to include in his statement as a part of the personal property, moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies or otherwise which he is required to list, any share or portion of the capital stock or property of any company or corporation which is required to list or return its capital and property for taxation in this state." And section 6910 does not require the individual to list all his corporate stock, but only those "which such person is required to list." Under article 16, §§ 5, 6, 7, Const. Ark., all property in the state is subject to taxation, except certain specified exemptions, and stock in corporations and the property of corporations are not exempt. On the contrary, by the express provision of section 6873 of Kirby's Dig., "all property whether real or personal, in this state, all moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stocks, joint-stock companies, or otherwise of persons residing therein, the property of corporations now existing or hereafter created * * * shall be subject to taxation," etc. But while the stock in controversy is subject to taxation, it is clear from the language of section 6902 of the Digest, supra, that it was the intention of the Legislature that such stock should not be taxed both as the property of the corporation and of the stockholder; in other words, that it should not be subject to double taxation. So the question is, under our statutes, are insurance companies required to list or return their capital and property for taxation? For if they are, then by the express language of section 6902, supra, appellee was not required to list for taxation "any of his shares of the capital stock or property" of the insurance companies named. Section 6906 of Kirby's Digest provides that "each person required to list property shall make out and deliver to the assessor a statement, verified by his oath or affirmation, of all personal property, moneys, credits, investments in bonds, stock, joint-stock companies or otherwise, in his possession or under his control on the first Monday in June of each year," etc. Under the definition of "words and phrases" of the revenue laws (section 6872, Kirby's Dig.) the word "person" as used in the act shall be held to mean and include firm, company, and corporation. The word "person," therefore, as used in 6906, supra, by express definition includes companies and corporations. The statement required by the above section "shall truly and distinctly set forth * * * the total value of all other articles of personal property which such person by this act is required to list." Section 6910, subd. 15. "The term 'personal property' wherever used in the act shall be held to mean and include: First. Every tangible thing being the subject of ownership, whether animate or inanimate, other than money, and not forming a part of any parcel of real property as hereinbefore defined. Second. The capital stock, undivided profits, and all other means not forming a part of the capital stock of every company, whether incorporated or unincorporated, and every share, portion or interest in such stock, profits or means, by whatsoever name the same may be designated." Section 6872, supra. We think it clear from a consideration of these various provisions of the revenue law that the in-insurance companies whose stock appellee held were required to list the stock for taxation.

But it is argued by the Attorney General that other provisions of the revenue laws require all other companies and corporations, except insurance companies, to file a list or schedule by which their capital stock and tangible property may be assessed for taxation, which differs from the list required by sections 6906 and 6910, and that therefore the latter sections cannot be held to apply to any of these corporations without double taxation, and he contends that when these various sections (6920, 6929, and 6936) having reference to other corporations are construed in connection with sections 6906 and 6910, the conclusion must be that the latter sections apply only to the assessment by individuals, or, if to companies and corporations at all, then only as to other property than their capital stock. Conceding, without deciding (for the question is not before us), that the sections requiring other designated companies and corporations to file a different schedule from that demanded by section 6906, supra, are not merely cumulative provisions, and conceding that the companies and corporations named are exempt by these specific provisions from the requirement of the general provision contained in section 6906, it does not follow that insurance companies are also exempt from the operation of the latter section. On the contrary, the fact that insurance companies are exempt from the requirements of section 6936, as to other corporations, by the express language thereof, leads to the inevitable conclusion that the Legislature intended that they should file the schedule required by sections 6906 and 6910. The contention that these sections refer only to the assessment by individuals ignores the provision contained in section 6872, above quoted, that "the word 'person,' as used in this act shall be held to mean and include 'firm, company and corporation.'" We find no provision in our revenue laws exempting the capital stock and property of insurance companies from taxation, and as they are required to list, appellee, under section 6902, supra, was not.

The judgment of the Dallas circuit court is correct, and it is affirmed.

HARROD v. STOUT-GREER LUMBER CO.
(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 12, 1908.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 286*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONCEALED DEFECTS—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Plaintiff was assigned to instruct a boy in the use of a lath trimmer. The machine embraced saws which were shielded by boxes to prevent injury to the operator. Plaintiff rested his arm on one of the boxes, which tilted, and the saw cut through the wood and amputated his arm. He did not know that the box would tilt. Held, that the master, having covered the saw with a box apparently secure, was not as a matter of law free from negligence respecting the hidden defect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1017, 1028; Dec. Dig. § 286.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Calhoun County; Geo. W. Hays, Judge.

Personal injury action by W. M. Harrod against the Stout-Greer Lumber Company. There was a directed verdict for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

This action was brought by W. M. Harrod against the Stout-Greer Lumber Company to recover damages for injuries sustained by him while in its employ by reason of its alleged negligence. The plaintiff was injured on the 13th day of July, 1906, and at that time was 81 years old. The particular duties which he was performing when he was injured were that of tying, sizing, and removing laths from a lath machine. The machine which trims off the end of the laths is called the "trimmer." The machine is set on two boxes about 4½ feet long, with two saws and a pulley about 4 feet apart. In front of the opening between the two saws is a clamping machine, fastened to a frame supporting the saws. When the bundles of lath are put between these, there is a lever which causes the jaws to shut and clamp them, and the clamping machine goes forward, and the saws trim the two ends of the bundles at the same time. A box was placed over the trimmer or cut-off saws to protect the employees from the saws and to prevent the sawdust from flying in their eyes while the machine is in operation. The box was about 4 inches from the top of the saws. The plaintiff's duties were to tie, trim, and remove the laths, and also to instruct a boy, who was working at the adjoining machine, how to perform his duties. On the third day after he began this work, the boy went to cut some strings. Plaintiff looked at him, and went over to give him directions about cutting the string. While doing so, he rested his arm on the box which covered the trimmer saw. This caused the box to tilt, and to strike the trimmer saw. It was revolving rapidly at the time, came up through the wood, and cut off the plaintiff's arm. The fact that the box would tilt when a weight was placed on it was not known to the plaintiff. The court directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, and plaintiff has appealed.

Nixon & Shaw and Taylor & Jones, for appellant. Gaughan & Sifford and T. D. Wynne, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). In the case of Hazen v. West Superior Lumber Co., 91 Wis. 208, 64 N. W. 857, where the employé was accidentally injured while operating precisely the same kind of a machine, the court held as a matter of law that the master was not liable. There the saw was partially covered with loose boards to prevent the sawdust from flying in the face of the operator. The court said: "The rapidly revolving saws were there, in plain sight, where the plaintiff could not but see them, and he knew perfectly well, without any instruction or information, that if he fell upon them, or came in contact with them, he would certainly be seriously, and perhaps fatally, injured. There was no possible chance of his being deceived, or for misjudgment on his part in that respect. The result would be inevitable, and in no sense a matter of judgment or opinion." Continuing, the court said: "It was just as plain to him as to his employer that such an accident might occur in the course of his employment." In the present case, the saw was entirely covered with a wooden box, which, if properly secured to the machine, would have afforded protection to the operator in leaning his arm upon it. The danger was hidden, and there was nothing to warn plaintiff that it was not securely fastened.

For the reason that the alleged defect was hidden or secret, the present case may be also differentiated from the case of Schiefelbein v. Badger Paper Co., 101 Wis. 402, 77 N. W. 742. There was nothing to deceive the operator in that case. The machine in question was used for the manufacture of paper. The operator was directed to clean a screen at the bottom of a hopper through which was fed pulp by means of suction. There was a revolving fan in a drum, which carried off the air sucked from the machine, and an opening in the top of the drum allowed the air to escape. It was several feet higher than the top of the hopper, and a foot distant. The opening was ordinarily covered with a wire screen. The servant had to stand in the hopper to do his work, and rested his hand on the edge of the opening, and when he arose to an erect position his fingers were torn off by the fan. There the opening was in plain sight. It was obvious to a person of ordinary intelligence that a slight weight would cause the wire screen to sag, and that the instant it came in contact with the rapidly revolving fan it would be cut, and thus expose his hand to the danger. There the element of hiddenness or deceptiveness of the danger was wanting, and in the case at bar it is present.

It is not a question of whether or not the master owed the servant the duty of guarding the saws with a covering; but, having elected to do so, can it be said as a matter of law that there was no negligence in furnishing a covering apparently secure, but in fact with a hidden defect? We think not.

The fact that the saw was covered with a wooden box, apparently secure, might have had a tendency to lead plaintiff to believe that the guard would protect him, and thus cause him to pay less attention to the real danger. At least it should have been left to the jury to say whether, from all the attendant circumstances, negligence was not inferable.

For the error in giving a peremptory instruction for defendant, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

HIGHT v. OATES.

1. REPLEVIN (§ 22*)—PARTIES.

Where, in an action for possession of a cow purchased by H. with money advanced by plaintiff, and later sold by H. to defendant, plaintiff claimed that the cow was to remain his property until paid for under his agreement with H., and the latter made no claim to the cow, the court properly refused to make him a party to the action.

2. ACTION (§ 57*)—CONSOLIDATION.

In an action for possession of a cow purchased by H. with money advanced by plaintiff, and later sold by H. to defendant, the court properly refused to consolidate it with a suit pending between plaintiff and H. concerning a settlement of the accounts between them.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Washington County; J. S. Maples, Judge.

Action by J. P. Hight against J. N. Oates. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. B. Wall and McGill & Lindsey, for appellant. R. J. Wilson, McDaniel & Dinsmore and Walker & Walker, for appellee.

MCCULLOCH, J. This is an action for recovery of possession of a cow. One Harding was engaged in the dairy business near the city of Fayetteville, and mortgaged his outfit to appellant, Hight, to secure an indebtedness to the latter amounting to $1,850, and "all other indebtedness" which he might thereafter owe. After the execution of the mortgage a lot of cows, including the one in controversy, was purchased from one Shelton for use in the dairy business, and appellant furnished the money to pay for them. Appellant claims that he purchased these cows, and caused them to be delivered to Harding pursuant to an oral agreement with the latter that the cows should remain the property of appellant until paid for, and that a memorandum to that effect was indorsed on appellant's account books and signed by Harding. Harding testified that he purchased the cows from Shelton, and that appellant advanced the money to pay for same, but that there was no agreement that the title should pass to and remain in appellant as security for the debt. He denied that he signed any memorandum showing reservation of title in appellant, and claimed that the mortgage was security for the money advanced. Harding sold one of the cows to appellee Oates, and this action at law resulted. There was a sharp conflict between the testimony of appellant and Harding concerning the reservation of title, and the jury settled the issue against appellant's claim of ownership. There was evidence legally sufficient to sustain the finding.

The instructions given to the jury at the request of the respective parties were quite numerous, and the court refused to give several instructions requested by appellant. We think the issues were correctly put before the jury, and that there was no error in the proceedings.

Appellant requested that Harding be made a party, and that the action be transferred to the chancery court and consolidated with a suit pending between appellant and Harding concerning a settlement of the accounts between them. The court denied the request, and this ruling is assigned as error. Harding claimed no interest in the property in controversy, and therefore was not a proper party to the action. There was no reason either for making him a party or for consolidating the two causes.

Judgment affirmed.

ST. LOUIS, I. M. & S. RY. CO. v. JAMISON.
(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 12, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 213*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISKS.

One entering another's employ assumes the ordinary risks incident thereto, is presumed to have contracted with reference to them, and cannot recover for injuries therefrom, and hence, where plaintiff was employed as a railroad section hand principally to remove old rails, the common method being to break the bolts holding them together, he assumed the risk of injury incurred by the breaking, and could not recover therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 559-564; Dec. Dig. § 213.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 149*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS—INJURY RESULTING FROM ORDER OF FOREMAN.

The fact that a foreman of railroad section hands ordered one of them to break the bolt by which another of them was injured did not render the master liable, where he did not direct the manner of breaking it, and the order was not negligently or improperly given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 291; Dec. Dig. § 149.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 149*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—DIRECTION OF WORK—DUTY OF FOREMAN.

Railroad section hands whose principal duty was to remove old rails, often necessitating the breaking of the bolts joining them, were presumed to know how to do the breaking, and it was not the duty of the foreman in ordering a bolt broken to direct the method.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 291-295; Dec. Dig. § 149.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 198*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS—SECTION HANDS.

Railroad section hands engaged in removing an old track are fellow servants, and the master is not liable for an injury to one of them if caused by the negligence of another.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 493; Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

Wood and McCulloch, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Green County; Frank Smith, Judge.

Action by W. E. Jamison against the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant's appeals. Reversed and dismissed.

T. M. Mehaffy, J. E. Williams, and Campbell & Stevenson, for appellant. W. W. Bandy, for appellee.

BATTLE, J. W. E. Jamison was in the employment of the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company. He had been 10 or 11 years at the time he was injured as hereinafter stated. He was employed as a section hand, the principal part of whose work was to take up old ties and rails, and replace them with new. In doing this work, the bolts which held the old rails together were sometimes broken. This was not an uncommon occurrence on defendant's road, and was well known by Jamison, and had been done by himself, and was attended by danger of injury to employes at the time engaged in the work. It was necessary to be done when nut attached could not be unscrewed. In the month of December, 1906, Jamison and others in the employment of the railroad company, in the course of their employment, were engaged in removing the old track on the Knobel-Helena Branch of the company's road between Lefe and Gainesville in Green county, and replacing it with new and larger steel rails. While so engaged many bolts were broken before the 17th day of December, 1906, when the foreman of such employes ordered one of them to break a certain bolt, which he (the employe) did by striking it so as to make a part of it fly in the direction of Jamison, and hit and severely injure him. He brought this action against the railroad company to recover damages on account of the injuries received, and recovered judgment. Was he entitled to recover?

"When a servant enters into the service of another, he assumes all the ordinary and usual risks and hazards incident to his employment. He is presumed to have these risks in contemplation, and to contract in reference thereto when he enters into the employ of the master, and consequently cannot recover for injuries resulting to him therefrom." S. W. Telephone Co. v. Woughter, 56 Ark. 208, 19 S. W. 575.

In this case the plaintiff had been in the service of the defendant for 10 or 11 years at the time of the accident, and in that time bolts were broken in removing old rails in the railroad track of the company for the purpose of replacing them with new. While they were not in all such cases broken, yet it was a means employed in removing them. Plaintiff knew this, and, when he entered into or continued in the service of defendant, assumed the risks of dangers incurred by the breaking of bolts in such removal as an ordinary incident, and the railroad company was not liable to him for the damages caused by the breaking. Railway Company v. Davis, 54 Ark. 389, 15 S. W. 895; Kuhns v. Wisconsin, etc., R. Co., 70 Iowa, 561, 31 N. W. 868; Abbot v. McCadden, 81 Wis. 563, 51 N. W. 1079, 29 Am. St. Rep. 910; 3 Ellott on Railroads (2d Ed.) § 1289, and cases cited. And the order of the foreman in this case did not make it liable. The evidence does not show that there was any negligence in making the order or that it was improper. The foreman did not direct how the bolt should be broken, neither was it his duty to do so; the presumption being the servant who did the breaking knew how. It was one of the duties he had undertaken to perform when he was employed. If the injury received from the breaking was caused by the negligence of any one, it was of the servant in driving a part of the bolt in the direction of plaintiff. If it was, the defendant is not liable for damages; the plaintiff and the servant at that time being fellow servants.

Judgment reversed, and action dismissed.

McCULLOCH, J. (dissenting). I cannot agree to the conclusion reached by the majority of the Judges as expressed by Mr. Justice BATTLE. Giving the evidence its strongest probative force, which we should do in testing its legal sufficiency, there was abundant evidence to sustain the verdict.

Appellee was working under the orders of Harris, foreman, and the Greek, who knocked the bolt, was working under the orders of Jourdan, foreman of another gang. Harris ordered appellee to take a lining bar and remove an old rail, and, while he was standing on the track, absorbed in doing this work in accordance with his foreman's orders, Jourdan ordered the Greek to break a bolt at the other end of the rail. The Greek struck the end of the bolt with a maul, striking and knocking it in the direction of appellee. Jourdan was standing there watching the Greek strike the bolt, and could see that he was striking in the direction of appellee, and could see that the latter was absorbed in his work and unconscious of danger. The jury must have found that Jourdan, who was not a fellow servant with appellee, but a vice principal of appellant, saw what was going on, and could have avoided the injury either by warning appellee of the danger or by directing the Greek to strike in another direction. Conceding that the Greek was a fellow servant with appellee, the negligence of the master concurred in causing the injury, and that rendered the master liable. It is a familiar principle in the law of master and servant that the latter does not assume the risk of danger caused by the negligent act of the former. Authorities are too numerous to require citation. The evidence shows, it is true, that it was customary for the workmen engaged in this work to break the bolts with a hammer or maul when they could not unscrew the nut from a bolt with a wrench, and, as appellee is presumed to have known of that custom, he must be held to have assumed the risk of any danger resulting from negligence of a fellow servant in breaking the bolts, but not that resulting from the negligence of the master. He had the right to proceed upon the presumption that the master would commit no negligent act to his injury, and he is not, therefore, deemed to have assumed the risk of any such danger.

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 542*)—INSOLVENCY—LEASE—FAIRNESS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

4. CORPORATIONS (§ 547*)—INSOLVENCY—REMEDIES OF CREDITORS.

Where, in actions to replevin stone levied upon under executions against an insolvent corporation, which leased its quarry to plaintiff, its president and general manager, the answer alleged the fraudulent character of the transaction and the evidence sustained it, the court without transferring the case to equity had jurisdiction to grant relief to defendant creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 547.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Johnson County; Hugh Basham, Judge.

Consolidated replevin suits by Zeb Ward against W. H. McPherson, sheriff, and others. From judgments on the replevin ponds, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Atkinson & Patterson, for appellant. Cravens & Covington, for appellees.

HILL, C. J. W. H. McPherson, sheriff of Johnson county, levied two executions upon a lot of stone, which was replevied from him by Ward. One of the executions was in favor of Ord Morgan and the other in favor of the Indiana Road Machine Company, and each was against the Mississippi Valley Construction Company. The replevin suits were consolidated in the circuit court, and on the trial the court directed verdicts in favor of the defendant. Judgments were rendered against the plaintiff Ward and the sureties upon his replevin bonds for the value of the stone taken under the writs of replevin, and he has appealed therefrom.

The hearing has heretofore been continued in order to enable the appellant to get the bill of exceptions into the record, as it is not in the transcript; the original bill having been lost for a time. It has now been found and brought here by certiorari since the submission of the cause, but the record fails to show that the bill of exceptions was filed within the time fixed by the court for it to be filed. Appellant says that this is a clerical error, and can be corrected by nunc pro tunc order, and asks for a further continuance for the purpose of having the correction made, and having the bill of exceptions copied into and made part of the transcript. The case has been fully abstracted and briefed on the merits. If the court was satisfied that error was committed, then it would consider whether due diligence had been exercised in having the record perfected and whether it would grant a continuance; but the court is satisfied that no error has been committed, even if the record presented by the appellant be taken as properly authenticated and filed within time. Hence it would be idle to continue it for the purpose of getting the record in reviewable shape.

This is the case: The Mississippi Valley Construction Company owned a quarry at Cabin creek, in Johnson county. Zeb Ward was the president and general manager, and the members of his family were the principal stockholders. It became insolvent, and judgments were obtained against it at various places, and it was unable to obtain the means to carry on its business of quarrying rock. In August, 1906, when it was in this condition, Ward obtained a contract for furnishing stone to contractors in New Orleans, and he took over the quarry under what he called a "verbal lease," and proceeded to take out stone in his own name in the fulfillment of this contract. The verbal lease of August was authorized by the treasurer, Ward's brother-in-law, and one other director, with the consent of the German National Bank, the principal creditor of the company. There was no meeting of the board of directors, and no minute made of it. The consideration was to be $300 per year for two years. Subsequently, on January 2, 1907, there was a formal meeting of the board of directors, and this verbal lease was ratified and a written lease executed covering the period intended to be covered by the oral lease. Prior to the execution of this written lease in December, 1906, Ord Morgan and the Indiana Road Machine Company recovered judgments in the Johnson circuit court against the construction company. Stone quarried by Ward was levied upon January 18, 1907, in favor of the Indiana Road Machine Company, and the 27th of February in favor of Ord Morgan. The case was tried on the testimony of Ward, and the facts are undisputed.

Passing all questions of the form, duration, and manner of the execution of said oral lease, it was a fraud upon the creditors of the corporation. The corporation was then hopelessly insolvent, and was at that time indebted to the Indiana Road Machine Company and to Ord Morgan for matters upon which they subsequently obtained judgments. It operated to withdraw from the reach of creditors the stone in the quarry, which was being taken out by Ward, its president, general manager, director, and stockholder, in fulfillment of an individual contract. Some authorities hold such contracts to be absolutely void, but the weight of American authority is that contracts between corporations and their directors, dealing with the corporate assets, are not void, but voidable. Where they are held voidable, however, all agree that they are more closely scrutinized than ordinary contracts; and the burden is upon those claiming under them to prove that they are made in good faith and fair to the corporation. 2 Thompson on Corporations, 4040-4049, 4060-4064; 3 Clark & Marshall on Corporations, p. 2302-2307 (section 761); Helliwell's Supp. to Clark & Marshall, § 76; Jones, McDowell & Co. v. Ark. Mech., etc., Co., 38 Ark. 17; Town of Searcy v. Yarnell, 47 Ark. 269, 1 S. W. 319. The burden was upon Ward to show the fairness to the corporation of this lease, and this he has wholly failed to do. The relief of creditors is usually worked out in equity. But where the creditors are not simple contract creditors, but, as in this case, have a lien upon the property from the date of their judgment, a different rule may prevail. 3 Clark & Marshall on Corporations, 2330. However, that is not important here, for the answer set forth the fraudulent character of the transactions and the evidence sustained it, and this court has held that "courts of equity and law have jurisdiction to relieve against frauds upon creditors. And, where no motion is made to correct an error in the adoption of the proceedings, the court may either transfer upon its own motion, or may proceed to a trial upon the merits." Catchings v. Harcrow, 49 Ark. 20, 3 S. W. 884. That principle is applicable here.

The judgment is affirmed.

LIABILITY.

A railroad company is not liable for the arrest of plaintiffs, who, on insisting on being entitled to pass through a station gate, were arrested by a policeman, who was directed by the gatekeeper and station master to take charge of them, where the policeman was not under the company's control, though it paid one-half of his salary; he being stationed at the depot to arrest offenders, etc., as an ordinary policeman, and receiving his instructions from the chief of police.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lonoke County; Eugene Lankford, Judge.

Consolidated actions by Homer N. Nelson and by E. W. Buchanan against the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company. From judgments for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed and actions dismissed.

Buzbee & Hicks, for appellant. Trimble, Robinson & Trimble, J. W. Blackwood, and J. G. Dunaway, for appellees.

BATTLE, J. These two cases are based and were tried upon the same facts, and the transcripts therein are the same in every material respect.

On May 17, 1906, Homer N. Nelson and E. W. Buchanan purchased of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company tickets for transportation from Hot Springs to Little Rock, Ark., and return. They used that portion of the tickets which entitled them to transportation from Hot Springs to Little Rock. The other portion of the ticket showed that it was to hold good until the 17th day of June, 1906, and that it had been repeatedly used to gain entrance through the gate of the railroad company at the depot at Little Rock, but not on the train. On the 6th day of June, 1906, they appeared in a line of 25 or 30 persons before the gate to the depot at Little Rock, again seeking entrance thereby by going through a narrow passageway leading to the same. They were among the first in the line, and were among the first to present their tickets to the gatekeeper and demand entrance. He refused to allow them to enter because their tickets had before that time been punched by him or his predecessor, and requested them to get out of the passageway and allow others in their rear to come forward, and, they insisting on entrance, he called A. E. Bourland, a policeman at the depot, to take "charge" of them, who requested them to step aside, which they did, and so remained until nearly all of those standing in front of the gate had passed in, when they again presented their tickets, with the same result as before; and, expressing a desire to go upon the passenger train then at the depot, and insisting that they had the right to do so, the gatekeeper asked the policeman to "take charge of them," which he did, and confined them in the city prison of Little Rock, where they were compelled to remain about 30 minutes. On the next morning, the 7th of June, they were tried in the police court and discharged. After that each one of them brought an action against the railroad company for damages on account of the arrest and imprisonment, and recovered judgment for $500 for compensatory damages, and $200 for punitive damages.

Bourland was an ordinary policeman, appointed and sworn as such and in the same manner. The railroad company paid one half of his salary, and the city the other half, yet he was not employed by the company, nor under its control. Hawkins, the chief of police, testified that he considered that it had some control over him because it paid one half of his salary, but there is no evidence that it had, or exercised any. No such act was shown. It had no power to remove him, and was not responsible for his acts. He was stationed at the depot to arrest offenders and protect life and property, as an ordinary policeman, and received his instructions from the chief of police, reported every day to police headquarters, and exercised powers vested in him by law, and not by employment of the railroad company. The only reasonable inference is that it paid one-half of his salary to induce the city of Little Rock to station a policeman at its depot, with the same effect had it not paid any part of the salary.

Gallagher, the gatekeeper, was a station master. Bourland, the policeman, not being a station employé of the railroad company, was not subject to his control, and he had no authority to direct him to arrest. His powers and duties were defined by a rule of the company as follows:

"702. The station master reports to the superintendent, and must obey the orders of the trainmaster and chief dispatcher. He has charge of the passenger station and the station employés where he is located. It is his duty to see that the station is kept in proper condition, preserve order about the station,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes prevent confusion and delay in seating the passengers and receiving and delivering baggage, and attend courteously to the comfort and wants of passengers and see that the employes do the same. He must see that the cars in the train starting from his station are inspected, cleaned, and properly equipped, that the trainmen are ready for duty at the appointed time, with the necessary signal and other appliances, and that the trains are properly made up, and leave on time."

The defendant is not liable in damages for the arrests of plaintiffs.

Judgments in the two cases reversed, and actions dismissed.

HORTON v. JACKSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 19, 1908.)

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 74*)—LIABILITY—PUBLICATION—RATIFICATION.

Where defendant requested the publication of a notice that plaintiff was expelled from a secret order for violating his obligations, but it was never published, and another notice was published in its stead, signed by defendant's name, to the effect that plaintiff was thereby denounced as a traitor to the order, and unworthy of the respect of its members, but which defendant did not cause to be published, he was not liable for the publication of the second notice; and hence an instruction was properly refused that, if defendant discovered and read the notice above his signature, and did not correct it in the same public manner in which it originally appeared, he would be liable as having ratified it.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pope County; Hugh Basham, Judge.

Action by J. E. Horton against I. C. Jackson and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.

U. L. Meade, for appellant. Brooks, Hays & Martin, for appellees.

BATTLE, J. J. E. Horton sued I. C. Jackson, A. C. Thompson, and Milton Bridges for libeling him by the publication in a newspaper of the following notice:

"Notice is hereby given that by order of Zion Hill Local No. 680, John F. Whorton is hereby denounced as a traitor to the order, and that he is not worthy of the confidence or respect of any member of the order.

"Done by order of the Zion Hill Local No. 680, April, 28, 1906. Other papers please copy. I. C. Jackson, Pres.

"Attest: A. C. Thompson, Sec.-Treas."

The defendants denied that they published or caused to be published the foregoing notice. The undisputed evidence in the case shows that they did not publish such notice, or cause it to be published. But they did request the publication of the following notice:

"This is to certify that John E. Horton is expelled from Zion Hill Local Union No. 680 for violation of his obligations and divulging secrets of the order. By order of Zion Hill Union No. 680, April 2, 1906.

"I. C. Jackson, Pres.

"Attest: A. C. Thompson, Sec.-Treas."

And in lieu thereof the first-mentioned notice was published. In the last-mentioned notice they stated that plaintiff had been expelled from a certain society for violation of his obligations and divulging secrets of the order. This was true.

There was only one publication of the first notice, and none of the last.

The court refused to instruct the jury in the trial in the case, at the request of the plaintiff, as follows:

"You are instructed that a notice published in a paper is presumed to have been authorized by those whose names appear as subscribing to said notice. And if the defendants Thompson and Jackson discovered and read said notice above their respective signatures, and did not correct the same in that same public way and manner as it originally appeared, they (the said Thompson and Jackson) will be held as ratifying the same, and are therefore as liable, if liable at all, as if they had authorized said notice to have been printed in the first instance."

The defendants recovered judgment, and the plaintiff appealed.

The two notices are entirely different and clearly distinct. To the publication of the first the defendants were not parties. When it was published the wrong was complete, and the defendants inflicted no injury thereby, and did not thereafter add to the injury already done, and the last, being so entirely different, furnished no excuse for its publication. They had done no wrong by its publication. Why should they repair the wrong done thereby? That should be done by the parties responsible for its existence. The court properly refused to instruct as the plaintiff requested. But appellant says if it was not correct, the court should have given one upon the same subject which was, and cites Bruce v. State, 71 Ark. 475, 75 S. W. 1080, to support his contention. But that case, so far as it supports such contention, has been impliedly, and is now expressly, overruled. See Snyder v. State (Ark.) 111 S. W. 465; Allison v. State, 74 Ark. 444, 86 S. W. 409; Mabry v. State, 80 Ark. 349, 97 S. W. 285.

Judgment affirmed.

A verdict for $10,000 for injuries sustained by a man 23 years old, in good health, a plumber by trade, and earning about $2 per day, is not excessive, where the injuries necessitated the amputation of a limb about four inches above the ankle, and where the injuries caused him to suffer greatly.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hempstead County; Jacob M. Carter, Judge.

Action by Silas Hobbs against the Louisiana & Arkansas Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is a suit by appellee against appellant to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by appellee through the negligence of appellant. The complaint, so far as it is necessary to set it out, alleged "that on October 13, 1906, while he [appellee] was engaged in loading a car of lumber on a side track, defendant's [appellant's] engine was switching cars to and from same, and pulled the car he was loading onto the main line, and, after said engine had gone several hundred yards north of the side track, plaintiff started to return to the place where he was loading said car, and, as he stepped on rail of main line, a brakeman of said company negligently and carelessly threw the switch, catching heel of plaintiff's foot between switch rail and rail of main track, and held him so firmly fastened that he could not release himself, and that said brakeman negligently and carelessly failed to open the switch and release him, and, while in this condition, a train of cars and engine at a speed of 20 miles per hour, without signal or lookout for danger or warning, was carelessly and wantonly driven by the employes of said company against plaintiff, knocking him down and running over his foot, and cutting off same while he was being held fast by the rail, causing plaintiff great physical pain and mental suffering." Appellee laid his damages at $25,000, for which he prayed judgment. The appellant answered, denying all the material allegations, and setting up the contributory negligence of appellee in going about and in front of a moving train, and in attempting to get on one of its cars, as an affirmative defense.

The case was submitted to a jury upon substantially the following facts (stated by appellee's counsel), as they may be considered from a view point most favorable to appellee: "On the 13th of October, 1906, the appellee was engaged in loading a car of lumber at Patmos on the line of the appellant's road. The train that caused the injury arrived about 2 o'clock p. m., going north towards the town of Hope, Ark. Appellee was in the car when the train went in on the side track and remained until the train pulled the car out, as he had a plank partly in the car. The train pulled the car out on the main line, and he got out on the platform as soon as he got the lumber he had hold of placed. The train pulled the car he was in and also a loaded car behind it out from the spur onto the main line for the purpose of taking the loaded car back to the detached section of the train, which was down on the main line. Appellee alighted from the train on the platform and the train ran up the main line about 120 feet from the switch, going towards the town of Hope, which is north from the switch. Appellee started back to the lumber pile, to be ready to go to work when the car returned. He followed a path across the track used by the public, and started across, while the train was still going north or away from him. As he stepped upon the rail, the brakeman threw the switch to let the engine and cars go down on the main line to place the loaded car in the train, and the switch rail caught his foot and held him until the train, which could have been stopped within eight or ten feet, came back and cut his foot off. The fireman saw appellee while he was on the track. Appellee hallooed when he was caught. The brakeman ran from the switch nearly to him, then back to the switch, as though to open it and release him, but failed to do so. Then, turning once more, he ran to appellee, and was trying to pull him out of the switch, when the train ran over his foot, and cut it off." Appellee was a tinner and plumber by trade, and was earning at the time of his injury about $2 per day. The injury rendered him less efficient for that work. His foot and ankle were so severely mashed that amputation of the limb was necessary. The limb was amputated about four inches above the ankle. Appellee was 23 years of age and in good health. His expectancy was about 40 years. He suffered greatly.

The jury returned a verdict in favor of appellee for $10,000. Judgment was entered accordingly, and this appeal was duly prosecuted.

WOOD, J. (after stating the facts as above). The issues of the negligence of appellant and the contributory negligence of appellee were submitted to the jury under proper instructions. The principles announced as applicable to the facts of this record have been so often declared by this court we deem it unnecessary to set out the requests for instructions and discuss the rulings upon which error is predicated. It is sufficient to say that the court's rulings were in conformity with the law. On the issues of the negligence of appellant, and the contributory negligence of appellee, there is a sharp conflict in the evidence, and the preponderance, we think, is in favor of appellant. But we cannot say there is no evidence to support the verdict here. On the contrary, the evidence was legally sufficient to warrant the court in submitting these issues to the jury, and its verdict under familiar rules will not be disturbed here when such is the case.

The verdict was not excessive. This court in recent cases has affirmed judgments for as large, and even larger, amounts where the physical injury and mental anguish was no greater than in the case at bar. Railroad Company v. Sparks, 81 Ark. 187, 99 S. W. 73; Railroad Company v. Moody, 82 Ark. 603, 102 S. W. 375.

HIGHT v. HARDING.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 19, 1908.)

TRIAL (§ 120*)—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—DISCRETION OF COURT.

There was an abuse of discretion, requiring reversal, where in an action involving the ownership of a cow, and depending mainly on the credibility of the parties, plaintiff's counsel in his closing argument was allowed to discuss defendant's failure to have the cow assessed for taxes as bearing on his credibility, the court having instructed that the question of assessment could not be considered, plaintiff's counsel having said nothing of it in his opening argument, and defendant's counsel in his argument having merely read the instruction, and stated that it was useless to discuss the matter; a new matter being thus injected into the case by the permission, when defendant had closed his argument, and so could not reply to it.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Washington County; J. S. Maples, Judge.

Petition by W. A. Harding against J. P. Hight. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

E. B. Wall and McGill & Lindsey, for appellant. R. J. Wilson, McDaniel & Dinsmore, and Walker & Walker, for appellee.

HART, J. This is an action of malicious prosecution brought in Washington circuit court by W. A. Harding against J. P. Hight. The complaint alleges, in substance, that the defendant Hight had falsely, maliciously, and without probable cause procured the grand jury of Washington county to find an indictment against the plaintiff, Harding, charging him with the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses, which indictment was returned November 4, 1905. The false pretense charged consisted in selling a cow in his possession to one J. N. Oates for $45, which he represented to be his own property, and which in reality was alleged to be the property of the defendant, Hight. Harding was at the October term, 1906, of said court duly acquitted of said charge by a jury, whereupon he was by the court discharged and the prosecution thereby terminated. The complaint further alleged that Hight had maliciously and without probable cause caused Harding to be imprisoned in the county jail of Washington county on said charge for 72 days, and had afterwards caused him to be prosecuted in said circuit court on said charge until his acquittal and discharge; that prior to the beginning of said 72 days' imprisonment Harding had given bail for his appearance in said court to answer said charge, but that Hight had gone to one Charles Vance and other sureties on his bail bond, and falsely and maliciously represented to them that, by remaining on his bond, they would be compelled to pay the amount thereof, and would be otherwise injured, and did thereby cause them to surrender Harding into custody, whereby he was imprisoned in the county jail for 72 days; that after said imprisonment Hight absented himself from a term of said court, and caused Harding to be deprived of his right of a speedy trial, by which he was greatly humiliated. Hight answered, making a general denial. The case was tried before a jury at the fall term, 1907, of said court. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $1,800 damages, and the defendant has appealed.

Harding had been in the dairy business near Fayetteville, Ark., and J. A. Ferguson had held his notes for $1,850 and a mortgage on the property used in his dairy business to secure the same. Hight bought the notes and mortgage about May 1, 1905. Harding executed to Hight a new note and mortgage. Shortly afterwards seven cows, one of which was called "Dandy," were purchased from Hugh Shelton for $180 or $190, and delivered to Harding. Here is where the conflict of testimony begins. Harding claims that he bought the cows from Shelton for $190, and paid him by giving him $10 in money and a check on Hight for the balance. On the other hand, Hight contends that he bought the cows from Shelton, paying him therefor $180, and then sold them to Harding for the same price, retaining the title in the cattle until they were paid for. It is not disputed that the cow called "Dandy" was sold to Oates by Harding for $45, and that Harding at the time represented that she was his property, and was free from any lien or other incumbrance. Hight produced a memorandum in writing showing a sale of the Shelton cattle, together with others by him to Harding. The memorandum purports to have been signed by Harding, and shows that the title to the cattle was retained by Hight until they were paid for. Harding says this memorandum is a forgery. Other evidence was adduced by each party tending to show his ownership in the cattle, but it consisted chiefly of circumstances from which ownership might be inferred by the jury.

Over the objections of Hight, Harding was permitted to prove that Hight had never assessed these cattle for taxation; the court at the time stating in the presence of the jury that he would permit the assessment list of Hight to go to the jury for what it was worth, and would fix it with proper instructions. Defendant saved his exceptions. On that point the court instructed the jury as follows: "As to whether Dr. Hight should have or should not have assessed the cow or cattle in controversy is not a question for the jury. And the jury will not consider that fact in determining this cause." Counsel for plaintiff in making his opening argument before the jury did not discuss the matter of assessment. Counsel for defendant read the above instruction on the subject of the assessment of the cattle to the jury, then stated that it was useless to discuss that matter, and thereafter did not refer to it. Counsel for plaintiff in his closing argument to the jury referred to the fact that Dr. Hight had not had said cow assessed to him for taxation for the years 1905 and 1906. Thereupon counsel for defendant made objection to the court to any argument against defendant in the matter of the assessment for the reason that the court had excluded that matter from the jury, and that the counsel for the defendant had not presented it to the jury for that reason. Counsel for plaintiff replied that he only wanted to argue it as a circumstance affecting the credibility of the defendant as a witness, and the court replied that he might argue it to the jury for that purpose. Counsel for the defendant saved their exceptions. Thereupon counsel for the plaintiff proceeded to argue the matter before the jury as affecting the credibility of the defendant as a witness.

After the argument was closed, and as soon as the jury had retired, counsel for defendant again called the attention of the court to the fact that the matter of the assessment had been excluded from the jury by the court's instructions, and that they had not argued the matter for that reason, and had had no opportunity to argue it since counsel for plaintiff had presented it to the jury. Counsel was then informed by the court and by counsel for plaintiff that Mr. J. W. Walker had gone to the court after the instructions had been read to the jury, and the argument had commenced, and had stated to the court in the absence of the counsel for the defendant, and without their knowledge, that he intended to argue the fact of the failure of Hight to assess the property as a circumstance affecting his credibility as a witness; that he stated to the court that he did not intend to do so if the court considered it would be in conflict with the instructions, and had been informed by the court that for that purpose such argument would be proper. Mr. Thompson in his work on Trials, at paragraph 969 of volume 1, says that it is reversible error for the trial judge to permit counsel in argument before the jury to comment upon evidence which has been excluded. The testimony in regard to the assessment list had been excluded from the jury, and for that reason had not been discussed by counsel for plaintiff in their opening argument, and counsel for the defendant had stated to the jury that they did not discuss it because the court had excluded it from their consideration. While it may be said that the permission by the court to plaintiff's counsel to argue it to the jury was to admit it again as evidence, still it was, in effect, to permit evidence to be given to the jury after the defendant had closed his argument to permit plaintiff to comment on its effect and to deny defendant the right of a reply. This could be hardly less prejudicial than commenting on evidence which has been excluded in a case like the present, where the chief reliance of either party for a verdict rested upon the credence which the jury should place upon his own testimony. His credibility as a witness, then, became of vital moment to him in the trial. Mr. Thompson says that the true office of counsel is that of aids or helps to the court and jury in the administration of justice.

Defendant's credibility as a witness was a matter that vitally affected his interests. After his counsel had closed their arguments before the jury, new matter was injected into the case which materially affected his rights. The aid of his counsel in arriving at the truth of the case should not have been denied him. The defendant had a right to know what arguments were to be urged against him, and he could only learn this from the opening argument and inferentially from the instructions of the court. While in cases of this sort the appellate court will not reverse a judgment unless an abuse of the discretion of the trial court is shown, we think such abuse clearly appears in this case where the credibility of the parties to the suit was one of the main issues to be decided by the jury, and where a new subject and a new argument was permitted the plaintiff in his closing argument to which the defendant was denied an opportunity of reply.

For this error, the judgment is reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 19, 1908.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1133*)—CONSOLIDATED CASES—DEFECTIVE RECORD—EFFECT.

A suit for injury to a son was consolidated with one by his mother for her damage, and judgments were rendered in their favor. In disposing of the son's case on defendant's appeal, nothing was done about the mother's case; the abstract and brief failing to show that appeal was prayed therein. The record fails to show any motion for new trial in her case or bill of exceptions, and the case is not referred to in the motion or bill in the son's case. There are two motions for new trial in the record, each bearing the caption of the son's case, and the bill of exceptions bears the two captions. Held, that it is too late to correct any mistake in preparing the papers in the mother's case, since the Supreme Court was not asked to consider the appeal therein, and treated it as abandoned, and that the judgment must be affirmed for noncompliance with Supreme Court rule 9, and because the record does not contain either a motion for new trial or bill of exceptions.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monroe County; Eugene Lankford, Judge.

Action by Minnie Wells against the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Sam H. West and J. C. Hawthorne, for appellants. Geo. F. Chapline, for appellee.

MCCULLOCH, J. This is a companion suit with that of Silas Adams, by next friend, against the St. Louis & Southwestern Railway Company and Otto Smith, 112 S. W. 186, which was determined by this court July 6, 1908, and reversed and remanded, with directions to remove the case to the federal court. Minnie Wells is the mother of Silas Adams, and sued to recover for damages sustained by herself, as mother, by reason of the personal injuries inflicted on her son. She laid her damages in the sum of $500. The cases were consolidated and tried together, and the jury returned a verdict against the defendant railway company in each case, assessing damages at the sum of $350 in the boy's case, and at $50 in the mother's case. There was no effort to remove the mother's case to the federal court, as the complaint did not pray for amount of damages up to the jurisdictional amount of that court. We disposed of the Silas Adams Case solely on the ground that the petition for removal should have been granted, though there were assignments of numerous other errors of the trial court. In disposing of the case we said nothing about the Minnie Wells Case, as the abstract and brief failed to call our attention to the fact that any appeal had been prayed in the latter case. Upon our attention being now called to that fact, we find, after exploring the record, that a separate judgment was rendered in this branch of the case, and an appeal prayed and granted. The record does not, however, set forth any motion for new trial in the case, nor bill of exceptions. This case is not referred to, either in the motion for new trial or bill of exceptions. There are two motions for new trial in the record, but each bears the caption, "Silas Adams, by Next Friend, v. St. Louis Southwestern Railway Co. and Otto Smith." The bill of exceptions also bears the two captions. It may be that this is an error made in the haste of preparing those papers; but, if so, it is too late now to correct them, as we were not asked to consider the appeal in the Minnie Wells Case, and we took it for granted that the appeal in that case had been abandoned.

However, since our attention is called to the fact that the appeal is still pending, the case should be affirmed, because rule 9 of the court has not been complied with, and because the record does not contain either a motion for new trial or bill of exceptions.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Crawford County; Jephtha H. Evans, Judge.

Action by Leonard Dyer against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

W. F. Evans and B. R. Davidson, for appellant. Sam R. Chew, for appellee.

MCCULLOCH, J. Appellee owned a traction engine, and attempted to propel it across appellant's railroad track at a public road crossing, when it was overturned and injured. He sues the company to recover damages, and alleges negligence on the part of the company in failing to properly construct the crossing and keep it in repair. He recovered $200 damages, and the company appealed.

When appellee's employes in charge of the engine got to the railroad crossing, they found that the planks, which are usually placed next to rails at the crossings to enable vehicles to pass over the rails, were missing, thus leaving the rails exposed, and they procured fence rails, and placed them next to the steel rail, in an effort to temporarily repair the defective crossing. They attempted to propel the engine over the crossing, but the drive wheels failed to climb the steel rail, and slid along until the engine was overturned and thrown down the embankment. The testimony is conflicting as to the precise condition of the crossing. Some of the witnesses say that the dirt was worn away where the planks were missing next to the rails, so that the rails were exposed to a height of 5 or 6 inches; but one of appellant's witnesses says that the dirt was banked against the rail so that it was not exposed more than 2½ or 3 inches. We think there was evidence sufficient to sustain a finding either way on the question of negligence in maintaining the crossing in good repair. Aside from the conflict in the testimony as to the height of the exposed rails, the facts were such that different minds might reach different conclusions as to whether or not ordinary care had been exercised to make the crossing reasonably safe for travel. The court gave the following instruction which is found to be a correct general statement of the law applicable to the case: "The law requires the defendant to use ordinary care to keep the crossing of the public highway over its tracks in a reasonably safe condition for travel and crossing. If it used such care as that it is not guilty of negligence, but if it did not use such care as that to keep the crossing in a reasonably safe condition for crossing, the defendant is guilty of negligence." The court refused, however, to give the following instruction requested by appellant: "I charge you that, if the crossing was in such condition that an ordinary vehicle in passing upon the highway could cross in perfect safety, then the company was not negligent in maintaining the crossing in such condition." It was error to refuse this instruction. Railroads in constructing and maintaining highway crossings are not required to anticipate and provide against extraordinary dangers, and are not required to provide facilities for the passing over of vehicles other than those in common use in the locality. Travelers along the highway, when they encounter railroad crossings, are entitled to facilities which are reasonably safe and convenient for vehicles in common use; but, when they attempt to use crossings for other purposes, they have no right to demand extraordinary facilities to meet the necessities of the special use. If a traveler attempts to cross with some kind of a vehicle not in common use, he must take the crossing as he finds it constructed for use of ordinary vehicles. Railway Co. v. Aven, 61 Ark. 141, 32 S. W. 500; 3 Elliott on Railways, p. 383; Terre Haute, etc., R. Co. v. Clem, 123 Ind. 15, 23 N. E. 965, 7 L. R. A. 583, 18 Am. St. Rep. 303; Railway Co. v. Johnson (Tex. Civ. App.) 85 S. W. 476. Appellant was entitled to have this particular question submitted to the jury, as it narrowed the inquiry to the precise issue of the case; and it is no answer to the demand to say that the court gave a correct instruction in general terms on the subject. Railway Co. v. Crabtree, 69 Ark. 134, 62 S. W. 64; Hamilton Brown Shoe Co. v. Choctaw Mer. Co., 80 Ark. 438, 97 S. W. 284.

Other errors of the court are assigned, but we find the proceedings in other respects free from error.

It is urged that the undisputed testimony shows appellee's servants to have been guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to cross with the engine under the circumstances. We do not think so. The testimony made a question for the jury to determine whether or not it was negligent on the part of those servants to attempt to cross, notwithstanding the defects. They were not bound to abandon the only crossing reasonably accessible, unless the danger from using it was so apparent that a person of ordinary care would not have attempted to use it. St. L., I. M. & Sou. R. Co. v. Box, 52 Ark. 368, 12 S. W. 757.

Miller & Ward, F. J. Eversole, E. E. Hogg, and P. T. Wheeler, for appellants. Bailey P. Wootton and Jesse Morgan, for appellees.

CLAY, C. This is an action of trespass to try title, and involves the ownership of a small tract of land situated in Perry county, Ky. Appellants pleaded title to the property in question; appellees denied their title, and pleaded adverse possession. Upon the hearing of the case appellants introduced their deeds and a certain patent to Archibald Cornett for 400 acres of land, dated December 18, 1848, also a copy of the original survey and the plat. Upon the conclusion of the testimony the court gave a peremptory instruction in favor of appellees. It is admitted that the land in question is not covered by the deeds or by the patent; but counsel for appellants insist that the plat does cover the land, and that it shows what land appellants actually purchased. A careful examination of the conveyances, however, shows that there is nothing in any of them to indicate that the grantor intended to convey the Archibald Cornett 400-acre patent. As the deeds do not embrace the land in question, and, as the patent and plat do not throw any light upon the subject, we are of opinion that the trial court properly instructed the jury to find for appellees.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bullitt County. "To be officially reported."

Action by T. J. Trunnell against T. J. Daniel. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chapeze & Zimmerman, for appellant. J. F. Combs, for appellee.

NUNN, J. This appeal is from a judgment of the Bullitt circuit court adjudging appellee to be the owner of a lot in Bardstown Junction and restraining appellant from trespassing thereon. The lot in controversy contains about three-fourths of an acre and is situated between the storehouse lot devised to and owned by appellee and the lot belonging to one Willie Herr. Appellee's father owned considerable property and had several children. By his will he made special bequests of real estate to each of his children. The special devise to appellee was this "storehouse and lot and scales and scales lot." By the residuary clause of the will he devised all of the remainder of his real estate, consisting of a hotel and some lots, to all of his children equally. Appellee purchased and received conveyances from all of his brothers and sisters of this property included in the residuary clause of the will.

Appellant claims that appellee sold him all this property. Appellee contends that he obtained the lot in controversy under the special devise made to him by his father; that the scales lot included all between the Willie Herr lot and the storehouse lot. Appellant controverted this, and there was much proof, which was very conflicting, taken upon this question. It is unnecessary, however, to consider this question, for the reason that the deed made by appellee, of date October 5, 1899, conveying the property to appellant, contains this clause: "Out of the above boundary is excluded the right of way of the L. & N. R. Co. and the storehouse lot devised to T. J. Trunnell by Henry Trunnell; also a lot between the said storehouse lot and a lot belonging to Willie Herr." It is contended by appellant that this language does not exclude the lot in controversy, and that his deed covers and includes it. It is evident that the deed excludes all of the lot between the Willie Herr property and the storehouse lot. It appears from the evidence that appellant refused to accept this deed, because of this exclusion, when it was first tendered to him; but it also appears, without contradiction, that he did accept it when he made the third and final payment of the purchase money, and had it recorded in the county court clerk's office. We are therefore of the opinion that the lot in question is the property of appellee.

Appellant further contends that this was an action to quiet title under section 11 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903, and that the petition is defective, in that it failed to allege that plaintiff had possession of the land when suit was brought. It is true the petition contains all the allegations essential in an action to quiet title, except that it was not alleged that he had possession of the lot of land described; but it was alleged that he was the owner of it, and that appellant was removing a part of the fence around it and digging holes and putting posts therein, that his fencing marked the boundary line of the lot, and by removing it he was destroying the evidence of the boundary line, and asked that appellant be restrained from committing this trespass. Appellant answered, denying appellee's ownership, and alleged that the property was his. The court adjudged appellee to be the owner of the lot, and restrained appellant from committing further trespass thereon. This proceeding was authorized by section 2361 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903, which provides: "The owner of land may maintain the appropriate action to recover damages for any trespass or injury committed thereon, or to prevent or restrain any trespasses or other injury thereto or thereon, notwithstanding such owner may not have the actual possession of the land at the time of the commission of the trespass." Under this section the court, after finding that appellee was the owner of the property, had the right to make an order to prevent and restrain further trespass by appellant upon the lot.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Oct. 27, 1908.)
JUDGMENT (§ 866*)—REVIVAL—DEATH OF PARTY—LIMITATION.

Where 10 years passed after death of surety, and the qualification of his administrator without execution being issued on a judgment against decedent or attempt made to revive the judgment against the administrator or heirs, a motion to revive is barred by Ky. St. 1903, § 2548, providing that a surety shall be discharged from liability under a judgment after seven years without execution issued and prosecuted in good faith.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Knox County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by John A. Steele against John Dishman and another. From a judgment overruling plaintiff's motion to revive his judgment against defendant Dishman's administrator and heirs, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James M. Hayes, for appellant. Dishman & Dishman, for appellees.

NUNN, J. At the November term, 1880, of the Knox common pleas court, appellant, John A. Steele, recovered a judgment against John Dishman and one C. C. Comstock, as surety of W. H. Brafford, for $1,300, with interest from February 22, 1875, subject to credits of $700 paid February 22, 1885, $600 paid June 6, 1890, and $227 paid October 27, 1890. John Dishman died April 4, 1894, intestate, domiciled in Knox county, Ky. S. B. Dishman, one of the appellees, qualified as administrator of the decedent May 8, 1894. No steps were taken to revive the judgment against John Dishman's administrator or his heirs until March 30, 1905. The administrator made a settlement of his accounts with the Knox county court March 27, 1905, which settlement shows a distribution of all assets that came to his hands. Under these facts, the court at the August term, 1905, overruled appellant's motion to revive the judgment of 1880 against the administrator and heirs of John Dishman, and from this judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

It is agreed by the parties that John Dishman was only a surety of Brafford. Section 2548, Ky. St. 1903, provides: "A surety shall be discharged from all liability under any judgment or decree, after the lapse of seven years without any execution issued thereon, and prosecuted in good faith for the collection thereof." The facts, as conceded, show that the judgment attempted to be revived against appellees was rendered in November, 1880, against John Dishman as surety of W. H. Brafford, and that as many as 10 years elapsed after the death of John Dishman and the qualification of his administrator without any execution being issued on the judgment, and that no attempt was made to revive the judgment against his administrator or heirs. Under these admitted facts section 2548 presents a barrier to the motion of appellant, and the collection of the judgment from appellee. See Milliken v. Dinning, 6 Bush, 646, and Columbia Bldg. Loan & Savings Ass'n's Assignee v. Gregory, 112 S. W. 608, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 1011.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

O'NEAL v. SOVEREIGN WOODMEN OF THE WORLD.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Oct. 22, 1908.)
1. INSURANCE (§ 724*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT SOCIETY—INITIATION—REGULARITY—ESTOPPEL.

Decedent's certificate of membership having been received by the local camp of defendant society, decedent was directed to appear for required initiation, when a mistake in the number of the local camp in the certificate was discovered. It was then decided to proceed with the initiation, which was done, the certificate being returned by the clerk for correction. Decedent paid all the required fees and dues, was accepted and recognized as a member of the order until his death, before the corrected certificate had been returned and delivered to him, and was buried by the order as a regular member in full fellowship and good standing. Held, that the order was estopped to question the regularity of the initiation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1866; Dec. Dig. § 724.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 720*)—CONSTITUTION—CONSTRUCTION—"IN PERSON."

The words "in person," used in the constitution of a mutual benefit society directing that there shall be no liability until the insured shall have had delivered to him "in person" his beneficiary certificate while in good health, was not synonymous with "manual possession," so as to require that the certificate be actually placed in insured's hands to constitute a legal delivery, but was merely intended to require a delivery to insured himself, and not to another for him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1856; Dec. Dig. § 720.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 720*) — MUTUAL BENEFIT CERTIFICATE—DELIVERY—EVIDENCE.

A certificate issued to insured on his application was received by the clerk of insured's local camp, when a mistake in the number of the camp was discovered. Insured was directed to appear for initiation, and was regularly initiated, and paid all the dues and assessments, but the clerk returned the certificate to the sovereign camp for correction, and, before a corrected certificate was returned and delivered to insured, he was killed. Held that, when insured was initiated and had paid the dues, the clerk held the original certificate, which was a valid instrument notwithstanding the error, for him and that such acts constituted a delivery of the original certificate to assured personally as required by the society's constitution in order to initiate defendant's liability.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ballard County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by Gertie O'Neal against the Sovereign Woodmen of the World. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed. New trial ordered.

Robbins & Thomas and J. E. Bridgwater, for appellant. Reeves & Tharp, for appellee.

BARKER, J. This action was instituted in the Ballard circuit court by the appellant, as the widow of J. P. O'Neal, on the 15th day of December, 1904, seeking to recover from the appellee, Sovereign Woodmen of the World, the sum of $500 which she claims is due her as beneficiary in a certificate of life insurance alleged to have been issued by the appellee through its local camp at Bandana, Ky., upon the life of her deceased husband. The sum named in the certificate is $1,000, but by its terms, where the insured dies within a year from the date of the policy, the sum to which the beneficiary is entitled is one-half the amount named in the certificate, or $500. There were several amendments, but we may pass the question of the allegations of the petition by saying that, as a whole, it states a cause of action in the plaintiff against the defendant. The defendant, by its answer, denied all the material allegations of the petition, and especially that he was a member of the lodge, or that any certificate had ever been delivered to him; and there is no question but what its allegations, if true, interposed a valid defense to a recovery by plaintiff. When the case came on for trial, after the plaintiff's evidence was all in, the defendant moved the court to award it a peremptory instruction to the jury to find a verdict in its favor. This motion was sustained, and, under the peremptory instruction of the court, the jury awarded a verdict in favor of the defendant. From the judgment dismissing her petition, the plaintiff now appeals.

The appellee, Sovereign Woodmen of the World, is a fraternal order authorized to issue policies of insurance on the lives of its members. The insurance feature is not substantially different in principle from the ordinary fraternal insurance. On August 14 1904, Joseph P. O'Neal made application for membership and participation in the beneficiary fund of the Woodmen of the World. This application was in writing, and was obtained by a properly authorized officer of the order, one J. N. Helsley, to whom the applicant paid all of the necessary dues in order to obtain an insurance policy of $1,000 on his life. The application was duly forwarded to the Sovereign Camp, where it was approved and a policy issued, by which the appellee agreed to pay to the wife of the applicant $500 should his death occur during the first year of his membership, $750 should his death occur during the second year of his membership, and $1,000 should his death occur after the second year of his membership. This beneficiary certificate was forwarded to Bandana Camp No. 32, located at Bandana, Ky., for delivery to the applicant whenever he should become a member by being regularly initiated into the order and have paid all dues necessary to his proper initiation.

We do not feel it is necessary to set forth with any greater particularity the contents of the application for insurance, or the certificate which was issued in pursuance of the application. The real defense to liability is based upon the alleged fact that the certificate was never delivered personally to the applicant during his lifetime. After the certificate was issued and forwarded to the clerk of Bandana Camp No. 32, the applicant was notified to be on hand for initiation into the order, and at the proper time he was present and was initiated, thereby becoming a member. At this time the certificate which had been duly and legally issued was in the hands of the clerk of the local camp for the purpose of delivery to the applicant when he should be lawfully obligated as a Sovereign Woodman of the World. Just prior to the initiation of the applicant, the clerk, who had the policy, observed that the number of the local camp was not stated correctly in the certificate, it being stated as No. 31, when it should have been No. 32, and he was of opinion that the policy would have to be returned to the Sovereign Camp for correction of this minute error, and the question was then raised in the lodge as to whether or not, under these circumstances, it would be lawful to initiate the applicant. The regular presiding officer was of opinion that it would not be lawful, but the district deputy, Helsley, took the position that the certificate had been issued and the applicant was present, ready for initiation, and therefore he should be initiated. After some debate the lodge acquiesced in this view, the regular officer left the chair, and Helsley presided, and from this point on it is not denied that the initiation was in all respects regular and in accordance with the constitution and by-laws of the order. Although the clerk was of opinion that he should return the certificate to the Sovereign Camp for the correction of the error in the number of Bandana Camp, still he required and the applicant did pay over to him all dues which were necessary to be paid in order to entitle him to the possession and ownership of the certificate. And then, with the acquiescence (at least) of the insured, the policy was returned by the clerk for the correction of the error above mentioned. Before it was returned, corrected, to the clerk, O'Neal had been killed by the falling of a tree upon him.

The appellee's defense is based upon the following stipulation contained in the application for membership and insurance in the order: "I agree to pay all assessments and dues for which I may become liable while a member of the order, as required by its constitution and laws, and that the liability of the Sovereign Camp for the payment of benefits shall not begin until after this application shall have been accepted by a Sovereign physician, a beneficiary certificate issued thereon and personally delivered to me by an authorized person while I am in good health, until I shall have been obligated in due form and all the requirements of section 58 of the constitution and laws of said order have been complied with." Section 58, above referred to, is as follows: "The liability of the Sovereign Camp for the payment of benefits on the death of a member shall not begin until after his application shall have been accepted by a Sovereign Physician, his certificate issued, and he shall have: First. Paid all entrance fees. Second. Paid one or more advance monthly payments of assessments and dues known as 'Sovereign Camp Fund.' Third. Paid the physician for medical examination. Fourth. Been obligated or introduced by a camp or by an authorized deputy in due form. Fifth. Had delivered to him, in person, his beneficiary certificate while in good health. The foregoing are hereby made a part of the consideration for, and are conditions precedent to, the liability for the payment of benefits in case of death." It is not disputed (and, if it is, the evidence abundantly establishes it) that the applicant complied with all the provisions of section 58, except Nos. 4 and 5. The fourth, it seems to us, may be very readily disposed of. Whatever may be said as to the technical regularity of the initiation, there can be no dispute that it took place, and that the members of the lodge accepted it as regular and recognized the insured as a member of the order from that time on until his death; and, when he was killed, he was buried by the order in due form as a regular member in full fellowship and good standing. It seems to us entirely too late, after all of this was done, to question the regularity of the initiation. We think it was regular.

This leaves remaining only the question as to whether or not the certificate was delivered to the insured while in good health; and it may be conceded (for the purposes of this case only) that, unless the certificate was delivered to the insured in person, appellant, as beneficiary, has no cause of action against appellee. Was the certificate delivered to the insured in person while in good health? Because the constitution of the order requires that the delivery of the certificate shall be made to the insured in person while in good health, counsel for appellee have assumed that the words "in person" are synonymous with "manual possession," and that, therefore, the certificate was required actually to be placed in the hands of the insured before there could be a legal delivery. We cannot subscribe to this construction. There is no hard and fast rule as to what constitutes a legal delivery of a writing. We think the words "in person" were placed in the constitution in order that the delivery should be to the insured himself, and not to another for him. It is a well-settled rule that the delivery of a deed to A. for B. is a valid delivery; and it has often been held that the placing of insurance policies or deeds in the mail, directed to those for whom intended, was a valid delivery, and therefore the words "in person" were inserted after the word "delivered" to cut off such delivery as that of which we are speaking, and confine it to the insured in person. But it does not follow from this that it was intended to require that the certificate should be placed in the hands or actual physical possession of the insured. Such a possession has never been required as to deeds or other instruments which require delivery in order to be effective. The contrary of this is well settled in Kentucky. In the case of Bunnell, etc., v. Bunnell, 111 Ky.

566, 64 S. W. 424, we said on this subject: "So far, we have considered this question as if an actual manual delivery of the deeds was necessary. But such is not the law. No particular form of procedure is required to effect a delivery. It is not essential that the paper be actually transferred. If the grantor, when executing it, intends it as a delivery, and this is known to and understood by the grantee, and they treat the estate as having actually passed thereby, it will have that effect, though the instrument be left in the possession of the bargainor. [Authorities omitted.] Delivery may be shown by acts without words, or words without acts, or by both combined." And in Shoptaw, etc., v. Ridgway's Adm'r, 60 S. W. 723, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 1495, it was said: "But a manual delivery of the deed is not required, nor is the acceptance of the bodily possession of the paper itself. This delivery may be shown by acts without words, or words without acts, or by both combined. And possession by the grantee of the thing conveyed is persuasive evidence of such previous delivery. Hughes v. Easten, 4 J. J. Marsh. 572, 20 Am. Dec. 230." To the same effect is Hudson v. Redford, 67 S. W. 35, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 2347. It follows from this that whether or not there has been a legal delivery of an instrument is a question of intent, and we think that it cannot be asserted as a principle of law that what took place between the officers and members of Bandana Camp and the insured in regard to the certificate under discussion did not amount to a delivery of the certificate herein sued on within the meaning of the constitution of the order. It may be assumed that the insured did not take manual possession of the certificate, but he had done everything that was required of him to entitle him to a delivery of it, and the camp had regularly initiated him in order that it could be delivered to him. He had paid all that was required, and the money has never been returned. The mere fact that the clerk was of opinion that the insignificant error in regard to the number of the lodge being corrected required that the certificate should be sent back to the Sovereign Camp for this purpose did not militate against the delivery being completed prior to its return for the correction. No one would assert that the correction was necessary to the validity of the certificate. If the error had not been discovered, and the certificate had been taken away by the insured, no one would for a moment contend that this slight error would in any degree invalidate the instrument as an insurance policy. The certificate for all legal purposes was a valid instrument; and, if it was intended by the lodge by what was done that it should be delivered to the insured, then the latter was entitled to possession, and the mere fact that he permitted the clerk to return the certificate to the Sovereign Camp for correction of the number of the subordinate camp cannot be said as a matter of law to show that there was not a personal delivery. When the insured had paid all dues and had been initiated into the order, the clerk held the certificate for him. He had by his conduct accepted it personally, and the clerk in returning it for the correction of the number of the camp returned it for him. It was his certificate, just as fully as it would have been if nothing had been said about the error in the number of the camp.

We think the trial court erred in awarding a peremptory instruction to the jury to find for the defendant under the circumstances and facts herein detailed, and the judgment is therefore reversed for a new trial under principles consistent with this opinion.

LEE v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 5, 1908.)

TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 68*)—FAILURE TO DELIVER MESSAGES—DAMAGES—RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN PARTIES.

Damages for mental anguish for failure of a telegraph company to send or deliver a telegram announcing the sickness or death of a relative cannot be recovered, unless the relationship between the parties is that of parent and child, husband and wife, sister and brother, or grandparent and grandchild.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County. "To be officially reported."

Action by Columbus Lee against the Western Union Telegraph Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Virgil P. Smith, for appellant. O. H. Waddle & Son and Geo. H. Fearons, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. This action was brought by the appellant to recover damages from the appellee company, growing out of its failure to deliver within a reasonable time a message notifying him that his aunt was dead. A demurrer was sustained to the petition upon the ground that the relationship between the deceased and the addressee in the telegram was not within the degree that entitled him to recover damages for mental anguish in being prevented by the negligence of the company from attending the burial and funeral of his aunt.

The question involved in this case has heretofore been considered by this court. In Denham v. Western Union Tel. Co., 87 S. W. 788, 27 Ky. Law Rep. 999, a recovery was sought by an aunt because of the failure of the company to deliver a telegram to the parents of her nephew, notifying them of his injury and death, by reason of which she was compelled to keep the body two days and nights, during which time she suffered great mental anguish. In rejecting her right to maintain the action, the court said: "Even if such an action could have been maintained for mental anguish by a near-degree relative on the averments of the petition, still the appellant is not entitled to recover, because she did not sustain that relationship." In Robinson v. Western Union Tel. Co., 68 S. W. 656, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 452, 57 L. R. A. 611, it is said: "This court is committed to the doctrine that a telegraph company is answerable in damages for mental suffering caused by its failure to deliver a social message, by reason of which the sender or person addressed is prevented from attending at the bedside, at the death, or at the funeral of a near relative. We have not applied the doctrine further than to the class of cases referred to, and then the liability has been restricted to those of the first degree of relationship." In Western Union Telegraph Company v. Steenbergen, 107 Ky. 469, 54 S. W. 829, the delayed telegram was sent by the father-in-law, Steenbergen, announcing the death of the addressee's mother-in-law; but the court held that the degree of relationship was too remote to authorize a recovery, saying: "It is insisted for the company that, even in the courts of those states where mental anguish can be made the basis of a recovery, the rule has never been extended beyond the nearest degrees of blood relationship. This contention seems to be supported by the authorities. Certainly no legal presumption of such affection arises as will warrant a recovery for mental anguish, except in cases of such relationship." In Western Union Telegraph Company v. Van Cleave, 107 Ky. 464, 54 S. W. 827, 92 Am. St. Rep. 366, a recovery was held allowable where the relationship of brothers existed, and so in Western Union Telegraph Company v. Lacer, 122 Ky. 839, 93 S. W. 34, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 751, 121 Am. St. Rep. 502, and Western Union Telegraph Company v. Caldwell, 102 S. W. 840, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 497, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 748. In Western Union Telegraph Company v. Fisher, 107 Ky. 830, 54 S. W. 830, a father was held entitled to recover for the delay in sending a telegram announcing the illness of his child. To the same effect is Thomas v. Western Union Telegraph Company, 120 Ky. 194, 85 S. W. 760, and Taylor v. Western Union Telegraph Company, 101 S. W. 969, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 240.

In the recent case of Randall v. Western Union Tel. Co., 107 S. W. 235, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 859, the principle announced in the foregoing cases was approved. So that it may be considered as the settled doctrine in this state that in cases of this character, where damages are sought for the failure to send or deliver a telegram announcing the sickness or death of a relative, a recovery can not be had unless the relationship between the parties is that of parent and child, husband and wife, sister and brother, or grandparent and grandchild. This rule may be considered, and indeed it is, arbitrary; but the peculiar and speculative nature of the doctrine upon which the right of recovery rests in cases of this character makes it necessary that there should be limitations placed upon it. It must be conceded that the restrictions we have placed on the right of recovery are not satisfactory. Often persons farther removed in kinship and relationship than those we have enumerated would suffer greater mental anguish at being prevented from attending the bedside of a sick or burial of a deceased friend or relative than would a sister or brother. But, as the line must be drawn somewhere, it seems appropriate to put it at the point where the parties are united by close blood relation or marriage ties.

Wherefore the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

IRELAND et al. v. BOWMAN & COCKRELL. (Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Oct. 29, 1908.)

1. TRUSTS (§ 235*)—TORTS OF TRUSTEE—PUBLIC NUISANCE.

Trustees are answerable as such for any damage due to the maintenance of a public nuisance by them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 343; Dec. Dig. § 235.*]

2. ESTOPPEL (§ 93*)—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL—SILENCE.

That parties knew that another was negotiating for property, and knew that a dam, above which they were operating a mill, was a material inducement to the purchase, and made no objection to the maintenance of the dam before he had purchased the property, did not estop them, on thereafter operating another mill below the dam, to complain that it was an unlawful obstruction of the stream and interfered with the floating of logs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 267; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

3. NUISANCE (§ 72*)—PUBLIC NUISANCE—SPECIAL DAMAGE.

Where logs are caught and held by a dam until they rot, or the owners, at special expense and labor, get them over the dam, such owners sustain a special damage, not common to the public, for which they may sue, notwithstanding the dam may be a common nuisance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. §§ 164-169; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

4. NUISANCE (§ 66*)—PRIVATE NUISANCE—PRESCRIPTIVE RIGHT TO MAINTAIN DAM.

The right to maintain a dam may be acquired, as against another private owner, by prescription, notwithstanding the dam may be a public nuisance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. § 139; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

5. JUDGMENT (§ 251*)—CONFORMITY TO ISSUES RAISED BY PLEADINGS.

Judgment cannot be entered on an issue not made by the pleadings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 437; Dec. Dig. § 251.*]

6. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 22*)—PRESCRIPTIVE RIGHT TO MAINTAIN DAM—HEIGHT.

The right to maintain a dam by prescription extends only to the height at which it has been maintained for the prescriptive period, and no right to raise it above that height is acquired.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 112; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

7. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 22*)—PRESCRIPTIVE RIGHT TO MAINTAIN DAM.

No right to maintain a dam which materially interferes with the floating of timber can be acquired by the maintenance of a dam which does not constitute such an interference.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. § 112; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

8. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 1*) — FLOATING TIMBER.

A stream may be navigable for the purpose of floating timber, though not navigable for boats.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Rockcastle County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Bowman & Cockrell against Mary T. Ireland and others. Judgment for plaintiffs for nominal damages, and defendants appeal, and plaintiffs prosecute a cross-appeal. Reversed on appeal and on the cross-appeal.

T. E. Moore, Jr., Jno. W. Brown, Eli H. Brown, J. W. Alcorn, and L. A. Nuckol, for appellants. T. Z. Morrow and C. C. Williams, for appellees.

HOBSON, J. Bowman & Cockrell have a steam sawmill on Rockcastle river about a mile below a sawmill owned by Mary T. Ireland, etc., who hold it under the will of J. M. Thomas, the former owner, and own land on both sides of the stream. In the year 1888 one Sam Brooks, who then owned this sawmill, built across Rockcastle river a dam, which he maintained until about the year 1894, when he sold out to W. R. Dillon, who raised the dam higher, and afterwards sold the property to Thomas. Thomas operated the mill as long as he lived, and at his death devised it to Mary T. Ireland and others, who have since operated the mill and maintained the dam. At the time Thomas bought the property, Bowman & Cockrell were operating a mill above this one, and afterwards, being required to take out a boom which they had maintained, they ceased operating that mill, and started one about a mile below Thomas' mill, which they have since operated. On July 12, 1906, they brought this suit against the devisees of Thomas, alleging that Rockcastle river is a navigable stream; that the dam obstructs the navigation of the stream, and prevents them from floating logs down the stream to their mill; that the stream is navigable for floating logs, and has for many years been used for this purpose, but that logs coming down the stream to their mill are caught by the dam, and detained until they are injured; and that by reason of this obstruction of the stream they had been damaged in the sum of $2,000. They prayed that the defendants be required to remove the dam from the stream, and for judgment for the damages sustained. In the first paragraph of their answer, the defendants set up the will of Thomas, and charged, among other things, that they held the property, and operated it, only as trustees under the will. In the second paragraph of the answer they denied the allegations of the petition. In the third paragraph they alleged that Thomas and those under whom he claimed had maintained the dam for over 15 years, and had acquired by prescription a right to maintain it, pleading the statute of limitation in bar of the action. By the fourth paragraph they pleaded that Bowman & Cockrell knew that Thomas was negotiating for the purchase of the property, and knew that the dam was a material inducement to him to make the purchase, and that with this knowledge they stood by and made no objection to the existence or maintenance of the dam before he had purchased and paid for the property. These facts they pleaded as an estoppel. The plaintiff filed a demurrer to all of the answer except that which controverted the allegations of the petition. The circuit court sustained the demurrer, and, the case having been prepared on the questions of fact raised by the answer, the circuit court entered a judgment, adjudging that the defendants remove the dam, and that the plaintiffs recover one cent in damages. From this judgment the defendants have appealed, and the plaintiffs have prosecuted a cross-appeal because they were not allowed substantial damages.

1. The court did not err in sustaining the demurrer of the plaintiffs to the first paragraph of the answer. The trustees and devisees were both made defendants to the petition. If the dam was a public nuisance, J. M. Thomas could not by his will confer upon the defendants authority to maintain it, and the trustees are answerable as trustees for any damage which they may have done by the maintenance of the nuisance. They are sued here as trustees. The trustees and devisees simply stand in the shoes of J. M. Thomas. The suit is against them as the representatives of his estate.

2. The court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to so much of the answer as pleaded the estoppel. Bowman & Cockrell were not then operating a mill below the dam. They had at that time no cause of complaint about it, it was not in their way. They were not under the circumstances called upon to hunt up Thomas and make known to him that the dam was an unlawful obstruction in a navigable stream. He knew the facts as well as they did. They were not called upon then to complain of a dam that was not injuring them in any way, as they were above it, and it in no wise interfered with their floating logs down the river to their mill, which was then located above the dam.

3. The plaintiffs show a right to maintain the action. While the dam in the stream may be a common nuisance if it is an unlawful obstruction of the stream, and causes a special damage to the plaintiffs, they may sue. If the plaintiffs' logs are caught and held by the dam until they rot, or until the plaintiffs, at special expense and labor, get them over the dam, they have sustained a special damage, not common to the rest of the public. Where property is destroyed or injured by a public nuisance, the owner of the property may have an action for redress. Wood on Nuisances, § 787; 30 Am. and Eng. Cyc. 377.

4. The question of limitation is of more difficulty. It is insisted that prescription does not run in favor of a public nuisance, and that each continuance of the nuisance is a fresh wrong. This was the common-law rule, and it was perhaps based on the maxim that time does not run against the king. But in Kentucky time runs against the commonwealth. Ky. St. 1903, § 2523; Rowan v. Portland, 8 B. Mon. 232; Cornwell v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 87 Ky. 72, 7 S. W. 553. In Wood on Limitation, §§ 180, 181, the rule is thus stated: "The rule in reference to acts amounting to a nuisance is that every continuance is a new nuisance, for which a fresh action will lie, so that, although an action for the damage from the original nuisance may be barred, damages are recoverable for the six years preceding the bringing of the action, provided such a period of time has not elapsed that the person maintaining it has acquired a presumptive right to do so. Thus, in the case first cited in the last note, in an action brought to recover damages for injuries sustained by reason of the erection of a dam, which set back the water of a stream and overflowed the plaintiff's land, it was held that, while the plaintiff was barred from recovering damages arising from the erection of the dam, he might recover for its continuance." Section 180. "While, as we have stated, each continuance of a nuisance is treated as a new nuisance, and furnishes a new ground of action which affords a good ground of recovery, although the statute may have run upon former injuries from the same nuisance, yet this proposition only holds good when the action is brought before the person erecting or maintaining the nuisance has acquired a prescriptive right to do so, by the lapse of such a period as bars an entry upon lands adversely held by another, that being the period universally adopted in this country for the acquisition of prescriptive rights." Section 181

The rule thus laid down was followed by this court in Manier v. Meyers, 4 B. Mon. 514, in which the defendant's dam on the stream below the plaintiff's mill caused the water to flow back on the plaintiff's wheel, and the court recognized the rule that a right to maintain a dam may be acquired by prescription as well as by grant. We do not find it necessary to consider how far the rights of the public in a navigable stream may be affected by prescription in the maintenance of a nuisance. This is an action by one owner of land against another owner. Undoubtedly limitation runs against private persons, and if the defendants have acquired a prescriptive right to maintain their dam as against the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs cannot maintain their action. We see no reason why the plaintiffs in a case like this may not be cut off by the 15-year statute of limitation, simply because the nuisance of which they complain is also a public nuisance. If the defendants have acquired the right to maintain their dam by prescription, as against the plaintiffs, then as to the plaintiffs the dam is not unlawful. The person injured in the case of a public nuisance may lose his right of action or right to complain of the nuisance in precisely the same time that he may lose his right to complain of a private nuisance; for the thing for which the action is brought in either case is the wrong to his rights. We are aware that in other jurisdictions the rule usually is that there is no such thing as a prescriptive right to maintain a public nuisance, and that hence prescription is no defense to a proceeding to abate the nuisance, either by the public authorities or by a private individual. 29 Cyc. 1207; Note, 53 L. R. A. 903; Wood on Nuisances, § 727. But in Kentucky, in land cases where there has been an adverse holding of the soil for the prescriptive period, a different rule has been written, and it is so well settled that we cannot depart from it. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Smith, 101 S. W. 317, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 1. We, therefore, conclude that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the plea of limitation.

It is insisted however, that it is shown by the proof that the dam, as it was maintained up to the year 1894, did not interfere with the navigation of the river for the purposes for which it was navigable, and that the trouble in this case arises from the fact that since the year 1894 the dam has been raised. It is true that the evidence before us sustains this conclusion, but as a demurrer to the defendant's answer had been sustained, they were not called upon to present their proof on this issue; and judgment cannot be entered now on an issue not made by the pleadings. The defendants would acquire no right by prescription to maintain the dam except at the height at which it was maintained for 15 years continuously, and if the dam within 15 years before the bringing of the action has been raised, the court may require the addition put upon the dam to be taken off, so as to restore it to the height at which it then was; for the defendants by maintaining a dam at a lower height could acquire no prescriptive right to raise the dam above that height. It has been held that, if the dam does not materially interfere with the character of navigation for which the stream is suited, it is not a public nuisance, and a riparian owner has a right to place it in the stream without permission. There is proof in the record that the dam, as originally constructed, did not materially affect the floating of timber down the stream, and the defendants by maintaining such a dam could acquire no right to maintain one which did materially affect the navigation of the stream for the purpose for which it was suited, the floating out of timber. 29 Cyc. 319.

5. Rockcastle river is a navigable stream for the purpose of floating logs and timber to market. A stream may be navigable for such purposes as this, although it is not navigable for boats at ordinary stages of the river.

6. On the return of the case to the circuit court an order will be entered overruling the plaintiffs' demurrer to the third paragraph of the answer. The plaintiffs will then be allowed to file a reply, and when the issues are completed, time will be given to either party to take additional proof if desired; and on the question of the damages sustained by the plaintiffs by reason of the dam, the court will, if either party desires it, order a jury trial. As the case is now presented, it is not proper for us to pass upon the question of the damages to which the plaintiffs are entitled; for on final hearing the proof may be materially different from that now before us.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed on the appeal and on the cross-appeal. Each party will pay his own cost in this court, the cost of the transcript to be paid one-half by each.

HATFIELD et al. v. HATFIELD et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Oct. 28, 1908.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 114*)—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to warrant a finding that defendants and their predecessors in title had been in continuous, open, and adverse possession of the land in controversy holding the same for a period sufficiently long to give them title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 682-690; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 71*)—DEEDS—DEFECTS.

That a deed in defendant's chain of title was so defective as not to pass title and embraced more land than was intended to be conveyed would not preclude the original grantee thereunder from claiming the whole of the land into the possession of which he entered adversely against his grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 417; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pike County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by John W. Hatfield and others against Greeley Hatfield and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

York & Johnson and J. M. Roberson, for appellants. Roscoe Vanover, for appellees.

CARROLL, J. The appellants, who are the children and heirs at law of Valentine Hatfield, brought this action against the appellee Greeley Hatfield and others, who claim title through Richard Hatfield, to recover damages for alleged trespass upon and removal of timber from land alleged to have been owned by them. The defendants in the action, who are the appellees here, after traversing the petition, affirmatively set up that they were the owners of the land in controversy, which contained some 45 acres; that they derived title to the land from Richard Hatfield, a brother of Valentine Hatfield, under whom appellants claim. They further averred that Valentine Hatfield in 1867 conveyed the land in controversy to their ancestor Richard Hatfield, and that after the conveyance Richard Hatfield, and after his death some 10 years ago, these appellees had been continuously in the adverse possession of the land for more than 30 years before the institution of this action. In a reply, the appellants denied that Valentine Hatfield had conveyed the land to Richard Hatfield or that Richard Hatfield and appellees had ever been in the adverse possession of it. Appellants further set up in an amended petition that the deed of Valentine Hatfield to Richard Hatfield, which was executed in 1867, but not recorded until 1905, was not a valid instrument, because insufficiently acknowledged or proven; and, second, because said deed only purported to and did convey the interest of Smith Hatfield. The pleading admits that the land in controversy is embraced in this deed, but avers that it was the intention of Valentine Hatfield and the other grantors therein to only convey to Richard Hatfield whatever interest Smith Hatfield, their deceased brother, who died intestate, owned in the land, and that, by mistake or fraud, the deed, in addition to conveying the land of Smith Hatfield, embraced land owned individually by Valentine Hatfield, which land so individually owned Valentine Hatfield did not intend to convey. The affirmative matter in this petition was controverted by answer. Valentine Hatfield and Richard Hatfield were brothers, and sons of Joseph Hatfield. Many years ago Joseph Hatfield and Valentine Hatfield obtained patents for adjoining tracts of land. After the death of Joseph Hatfield, the land owned by him descended to his children, Valentine, Richard, Smith, and others. His son Smith Hatfield having died intestate, without leaving surviving him widow or children, his interest in his father's estate which had been partitioned descended to his brothers and sisters, including Valentine and Richard. The deed in question, although made in 1867, was not put to record until 1905. We think it clear that it was only intended by this deed to convey the interest of Smith Hatfield, although it seems the boundary described in the deed includes the land in controversy.

Appellants insist that neither appellees nor their ancestor Richard Hatfield were ever in possession of the land in controversy, and that the deed is not sufficient to convey title; but that, if it is, the conveyance of more land than was owned by Smith Hatfield was a manifest mistake, and, as the deed was not put to record until 1905, the statute of limitation applicable to the correction of mistakes did not begin to run until that time. The appellees insist that there was no mistake in the deed; but that, if there was, it is too late now to correct it; that Valentine Hatfield during his life recognized Richard Hatfield as the owner of the land; that Richard Hatfield was in possession of it at his death; and that appellees have been in its possession since his death, making the time of the adverse holding by Richard Hatfield and appellees more than 30 years. Having reached the conclusion that, upon the issue of adverse possession by appellees, the appellants must fail, it is not necessary to discuss the legal questions involving the validity of the deed.

It appears from the evidence that a ridge lies between Coon branch and Meadow branch, and that Valentine Hatfield lived on the Coon branch side of this ridge and claimed to the top of it; that Richard lived on the Meadow branch side of the ridge, and claimed to the top of it. In other words, the top of the ridge was the dividing line between the land claimed by Richard and Valentine Hatfield during their respective lives. It is also clear that the land in controversy lies on the Meadow branch side of the ridge, and the great weight of the evidence supports the contention of the appellees that they and their ancestor Richard Hatfield have resided on and been in the continuous adverse possession of the land in controversy for more than 30 years, cultivating and cutting timber from it, and claiming to own it. The appellant J. W. Hatfield testified that Richard Hatfield had a few acres of the land in controversy fenced some years before his death. Another witness for appellant, Alvin Hatfield, said that Richard Hatfield cut timber from the land in controversy, and that appellees, after the death of Richard Hatfield, claimed to own it. W. A. Hatfield, a witness 61 years of age, and a son of Richard Hatfield, said that his father had possession of the land in controversy for about 40 years; that he obtained it from the heirs of Joseph Hatfield about the year 1855. Lewis Hatfield testified that he was employed by Richard Hatfield to, and did, cut and haul timber from the land in controversy some 40 years ago, and that at the time it was in the possession of Richard Hatfield. The appellee Greeley Hatfield testifies that he is and has been living on the land in controversy and paying taxes thereon for more than 13 years, or since he married Richard Hatfield's daughter, and that Richard Hatfield had lived on the land for many years before his death, cultivating and cutting timber from it, and that it was generally known that Richard Hatfield claimed to own it in his life and his heirs at law after his death. Talbott Hatfield testifies that the deed embraced the land in controversy, and that Richard Hatfield lived upon the land, fenced it, and cultivated it, and cut timber on it; that Richard Hatfield and his heirs had been in possession of the land, claiming it as their own for more than 30 years. This witness also testified that he heard Valentine Hatfield 40 years ago say that he owned to the top of the ridge on the Coon branch side, and that Richard owned to the top of the ridge on the Meadow branch side. It also appears that Valentine conveyed to J. W. Hatfield and his sister, Ester Followay, separate tracts of land on the Coon branch side of the ridge, the boundary running with the top of the ridge, but not including any land on the Meadow branch side of it. W. A. Hatfield, a son of Richard Hatfield, testified that he was acquainted with the boundary of land described in the deed made in 1867, and that his father lived on and claimed all the land within the boundary of this deed and all the land to the top of the ridge on the Meadow branch side of it.

A careful consideration of the facts satisfies us that Valentine Hatfield during his life only claimed to own the land on the Coon branch side of the ridge, and that he recognized the top of the ridge as the dividing line between his land and that of Richard Hatfield; that he never claimed to own or exercise any acts of ownership on the land on the Meadow branch side of this ridge; that the land in controversy which lies on the Meadow branch side of the ridge was in the continuous, open, and adverse possession of Richard Hatfield for many years before his death, and this with the knowledge of Valentine Hatfield. There is no evidence whatever of any mistake or fraud in the execution of the deed, nor does the evidence show whether or not it embraces more land than the interest of Smith Hatfield in Joseph Hatfield's estate. In fact, the deed does not play an important part in the controversy. If we should hold as a matter of law that the deed was so defectively executed as not to be a valid instrument to pass title, and further hold as a matter of fact that it embraced more land than was intended to be conveyed, yet it would not deny the vendee who took possession under it from claiming the whole of the land, into the possession of which he entered adversely to the grantors. And, if his adverse holding continued a sufficient length of time, it would ripen into a possessory title that would enable him to defeat an attempt on the part of the grantors to recover a part of the land. It is probable that under or by color of the deed Richard Hatfield took possession of the land in controversy in 1867 or soon thereafter, but the strength of the case for appellees rests not on the deed or the entry under it, but their adverse holding of the land. Upon this issue, although it may have had its origin in the deed, they must succeed.

The judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

BOOTH'S EX'R v. COMMONWEALTH ex rel. JEFFERSON COUNTY ATTORNEY.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Oct. 27, 1908.)

1. TAXATION (§ 856*)—INHERITANCE TAX—POWER TO IMPOSE.

The power to tax is incident to the legislative power, so that it is necessary, not that the Constitution have a provision authorizing the imposition of an inheritance tax, but that it does not prohibit it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1673; Dec. Dig. § 856.*]

2. TAXATION (§ 856*)—INHERITANCE TAX—POWER TO IMPOSE.

The right to take property by inheritance or bequest is but a creature of the law, and not an absolute right of property, and hence it may be regulated by the state and subjected to a tax as an incident of such regulation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1673; Dec. Dig. § 856.*]

3. TAXATION (§ 859*)—UNIFORMITY—INHERITANCE TAX—"TAX ON PROPERTY."

An inheritance tax is not a "tax on property," within Const. § 171, requiring uniformity and equality of taxes on all property subject to taxation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1674; Dec. Dig. § 859.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2475-2488; vol. 8, pp. 7653, 7654.]

4. TAXATION (§ 859*)—INHERITANCE TAX—UNIFORMITY.

Even if the inheritance tax be a "special or excise" tax, authorized by Const. § 181, and the rule as to uniformity of taxation applies to a special or excise tax, Revenue Act 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 240, c. 22) art. 19, § 1, imposing a collateral inheritance tax of $5 on every $100 of every legacy of the class taxed in excess of $500, to the extent of the excess, satisfied the rule as to uniformity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1674; Dec. Dig. § 859.*]

5. TAXATION (§ 873*)—INHERITANCE TAX—EXEMPTION—"ESTATE."

The "estate" meant by the provision of Revenue Act 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 240, c. 22) art. 19, § 1, that the first $500 of every estate shall not be subject to the tax thereby imposed on legacies to strangers and collateral heirs and inheritances by collateral heirs, is not the estate of deceased, but that passing to a stranger or collateral heir, so that each legacy is entitled to the exemption; and this, though the executor or administrator is required to pay it in the first instance, he being also required to deduct it from the estate passing to the legatee or collateral heir.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1689; Dec. Dig. § 873.*]

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 50*)—"LEGISLATIVE POWER"—NATURE AND SCOPE.

The words "legislative power," used in Const. § 29, providing that the legislative power shall be vested in a House of Representatives, etc., is a comprehensive phrase, meaning all powers that appertain to or are usually exercised by a legislative body.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4088, 4089.]

7. WORDS AND PHRASES—"EXCISE."

The word "excise" is a term of very general signification, and means tribute, custom tax, tollage, or assessment.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

"To be officially reported."

Proceeding between the commonwealth, on the relation of the county attorney of Jefferson county, and Armilda U. Booth's executor, relative to an inheritance tax. From a judgment of the circuit court, affirming a judgment of the county court, the executor appeals. Affirmed.

Trabue, Doolan & Cox, Grubbs & Grubbs, Chas. M. Lindsay, Percy N. Booth, Isaac T. Woodson, and Geo. L. Everbach, for appellant. Jas. Breathitt, Atty. Gen., Jno. F. Lockett, Asst. Atty. Gen., Geo. R. Hunt, Isaac Morrison, and Joseph Selligman, for appellee.

SETTLE, J. Mrs. Armilda U. Booth, a childless widow and resident of Jefferson county, Ky., died in December, 1906, leaving a will by which legacies of various amounts were bequeathed to her collateral kindred and to strangers. The executor appointed by the will on December 24, 1906, duly qualified as such and has since had charge of the estate. Shortly thereafter, and before the payment of any of the legacies bequeathed by the will, the commonwealth of Kentucky, on relation of the county attorney of Jefferson county, filed in the Jefferson county court a statement against the executor of the will of Mrs. Booth, claiming for the commonwealth an inheritance tax of 5 per cent. upon the face value of each legacy in excess of $500 bequeathed by her will; the demand for its payment being based upon the provisions of article 19 of the revenue act of 1906 (Acts 1906, p. 240, c. 22). The executor filed a demurrer to the statement mainly upon the ground that the act was unconstitutional; but in argument upon the demurrer certain questions of construction were also raised. The county court overruled the de-murrer, thereby upholding the constitutionality of the act, but construed it to impose a tax of 5 per cent. upon the net value of each legacy passing to each legatee over the sum of $500.

An appeal was taken to the circuit court by both the executor and the commonwealth, and that court, concurring in the construction given the statute by the county court, entered judgment imposing the tax as that court had done; and from the latter judgment the executor has appealed, thereby bringing the case to this court for final adjudication. The questions upon which the decision of this court is asked are: First, does the act in question violate any provision of the state Constitution? Secondly, if the act is not unconstitutional, does the exemption in the first section refer to the entire estate of the decedent, or to each legacy? Thirdly, is the tax upon the net amount actually received by each legatee or upon the face of his legacy?

The first section of the act in question imposes the tax and specifies its objects. The remaining sections indicate the means by which the provisions of the first section are to be carried into effect. The first section reads as follows: "All property which shall pass, by will or by the intestate laws of this state, from any person who may die seised or possessed of the same while a resident of this state, or if such decedent was not a resident of this state at the time of death, which property, or any part thereof, shall be within this state, or any interest therein, or income therefrom, which shall be transferred by deed, grant, sale or gift, made in contemplation of the death of the grantor or bargainor, or intended to take effect in possession or enjoyment after such death, to any person or persons, or to any body politic or corporate, in trust or otherwise, or by reason whereof any person or body politic or corporate shall become beneficially entitled, in possession or expectancy, to any property, or to the income thereof, other than to or for the use of his or her father, mother, husband, wife, lawful issue, the wife or widow of a son, or the husband of a daughter, or any child or children adopted as such in conformity with the laws of the commonwealth of Kentucky, and any lineal descendant of such decedent born in lawful wedlock, shall be, and is, subject to a tax of five dollars on every one hundred dollars of the fair cash value of such property, and at a proportionate rate for any less amount, to be paid to the sheriff or collector of the proper county, as hereinafter defined for the general use of the commonwealth; and all administrators, executors and trustees shall be liable for any and all taxes until the same shall have been paid as hereinafter directed: Provided, that the first five hundred dollars of every estate shall not be subject to such duty or tax." Counsel for appellant insist that the act is violative of the state Constitution, because of the alleged absence from that instrument of a provision authorizing the imposition of an inheritance tax; that the act is in conflict with that provision of the Constitution which requires that all taxes shall be uniform; and, finally, that its operation will result in discrimination, as well as inequality, which, it is claimed, makes it obnoxious to the provisions of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

The present Constitution of the state declares that the Legislature may by general laws provide (1) for the levy and collection, for state, county, and municipal purposes, of an annual ad valorem tax on all property (sections 171, 172); (2) a tax on incomes, licenses, or franchises (section 174); (3) license fees on franchises, stock used for breeding purposes, the various trades, occupations, and professions; and (4) "a special or excise tax" (section 181). It may also be remarked that section 171 of the Constitution declares that: "Taxes shall be levied and collected for public purposes only. They shall be uniform upon all property subject to taxation within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax; and all taxes shall be levied and collected by general laws."

But, after all, the power of the Legislature to tax is an inherent, rather than a conferred, power, although the legislative department of our state government, like the executive department and judicial department, is a creature of the Constitution. Thus, in section 29 of that instrument, it is said: "The legislative power shall be vested in a House of Representatives and a Senate, which together shall be styled the General Assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky." The words "the legislative power," as here employed, are a comprehensive phrase, meaning all powers that appertain to or are usually exercised by a legislative body. Perhaps it would more accurately express our meaning to say that the power to tax is incident to, or arises from, the "legislative power" with which section 29 of the Constitution clothed the General Assembly in creating that department of the state government. It cannot, therefore, be successfully maintained that the authority of the Legislature to impose taxes is wholly derived from sections 169 to 182, inclusive, of the Constitution, which relate to revenue and taxation. On the contrary, we think the provisions of those sections are, in the main, limitations upon the power of the Legislature, making mandatory the imposition of certain taxes and forbidding or regulating the imposition of others.

We are told by Mr. Cooley, in his work on Taxation (chapter 1), that: "The power of taxation is an incident of sovereignty, and is possessed by the government without being expressly conferred by the people. It is a legislative power, and when the people, by their Constitution, create a department of government upon which they confer the power to make laws, the power of taxation is conferred as part of the more general power. * * * Everything to which the legislative power extends may be the subject of taxation, whether it be person or property, or possession, franchise, or privilege, or occupation or right. Nothing but express constitutional limitation upon legislative authority can exclude anything to which the authority extends from the grasp of the taxing power, if the Legislature in its discretion shall at any time select it for revenue purposes; and not only is the power unlimited in its reach as to subjects, but in its very nature it acknowledges no limits, and may be carried even to the extent of exhaustion and destruction, thus becoming in its exercise a power to destroy. If the power be threatened with abuse, security must be found in the responsibility of the Legislature that imposes the tax to the constituency which must pay it. The judiciary can afford no redress against oppressive taxation, so long as the Legislature, in imposing it, violate no express provision of the Constitution. The necessity for imposing it addresses itself to the legislative discretion, and it is or may be an urgent necessity, which will admit of no property or other conflicting right in the citizen while it remains unsatisfied." Cooley on Taxation, cc. 1, 2.

We fail to find in that part of our Constitution respecting revenue and taxation any declaration that the power of the Legislature to impose taxes is expressly limited to such taxes as are therein mentioned. We do, however, find that section 181, in explicit terms, authorizes the imposition of a "special or excise tax"; but the Legislature, without this express authority, could have imposed such a tax under the general legislative power before mentioned; there being no provision of the Constitution forbidding it. State v. Ferris, 53 Ohio St. 314, 41 N. E. 579, 30 L. R. A. 218; State v. Guilbert, 70 Ohio St. 229, 71 N. E. 636. As the privilege or right to take property by inheritance or devise is not a natural or inherent right of persons, but is a creature of the law, it is subject to regulation by statute; and the imposition of a tax as incident to the right is authorized under our governmental system, when not expressly forbidden by the state Constitution. Many authorities might be cited in support of this proposition, and our attention has been called to but one case that questions its correctness, viz., Nunne-macher v. State, 129 Wis. 190, 108 N. W. 627, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 121. Yet in that case the tax upon an inheritance was held to be valid upon the sole ground that it could not be considered an unreasonable interference with that right. The right of property, however, is an inherent or inalienable right of the citizen, and "consists in the free use, enjoyment, and disposal of his acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only of the laws of the land." Blackstone's Com. vol. 1, p. 138. But we venture to say that among the absolute rights of individuals enumerated by Blackstone no mention is made of a right to inherit property from another. All estates derived upon the death of another have been created by law, and are for that reason always subject to regulation by statute; indeed, frequent changes by legislative enactment have been and will doubtless yet be made in the law of descent and distribution. It is patent, therefore, that the guaranty in the Bill of Rights, and other provisions of the Constitution, with respect to the right of acquiring and protecting property, does not include the mere privilege, right, or expectancy of inheritance.

While express constitutional authority for the enactment by the Legislature of the act under which the tax in question is sought to be collected was unnecessary, if the tax comes within the meaning of the words "special or excise tax" appearing in section 181 of the Constitution, it may then be said that instrument expressly authorized its imposition by the Legislature. Although the state of Kentucky has had an existence of more than a century as a commonwealth, no effort, prior to the enactment of the present statute, has ever been made by her Legislature to impose an inheritance tax upon her people. Therefore the novelty of the questions raised by the objections made to the statute and the total absence of judicial light from previous decisions of this court compel us to look for guidance to those of the courts of other states, and of the federal courts, in which such laws have been construed and enforced. Perhaps a majority of the states of the Union impose an inheritance tax in one form or another. In some of these states the tax falls upon all persons, whether lineal descendants, collaterals, or strangers. In other states the tax is paid by collaterals alone, or by collaterals and strangers; the latter, of course, taking the estate by devise. In some states the tax rate is uniform; in others estates of less than a given value are exempt from the tax; in still others the tax is imposed according to a graded rate, without regard to uniformity. We have been cited to no case in which there was a failure by the court to uphold an inheritance tax like that imposed in this state. The Constitutions of many of the states in which an inheritance tax is imposed are, in respect to questions of taxation, in meaning, if not in terms, closely akin to the Constitution of this state, and even a closer resemblance will be found to exist between the inheritance tax statutes of these states and that of this state; indeed, two or more of them are almost identical with ours, and all these statutes provide, as does ours, that the inheritance tax shall be paid by the persons or class designated upon all property passing to them by will or otherwise, and in every instance the courts, in construing the statutes, have held that the tax was not a tax upon property, but a "privilege," "special," or "excise tax."

In State v. Hamlin, 86 Me. 495, 30 Atl. 76, 25 L. R. A. 632, 41 Am. St. Rep. 569, a statute practically identical with that of this state, was attacked upon the same constitutional grounds here urged; but it was held by the Supreme Court of that state that it did not violate a provision of the Constitution of that state, which required all taxes assessed upon personal and real estate to be apportioned and assessed equally according to the just value thereof. With respect to the character of the Maine inheritance tax the court said: "The tax provided for in the statute under consideration is clearly an excise tax. Scholey v. Rew, 23 Wall. 346, 23 L. Ed. 99. The whole tenor and scope of the act is one of excise, and not a 'tax upon property,' as that term is used in the Constitution. It is not laid according to any rule of proportion, but is laid upon the interests specified in the act, without any reference to the whole amount required to be raised for public purposes, or to the whole amount of property in the state liable to be assessed for public purposes. It is true that the act contains some language indicating a tax upon property; but it should be construed according to its essential principle, object, and effect. Substance, and not form or phrase, is the important thing. * * *

The tax under this statute is, once for all, an excise or duty upon the right or privilege of taking property by will or by descent under the law of the state. It is uniform in its rate as to the entire class of collaterals and strangers, which satisfies the constitutional requirement of uniformity. The Constitution guarantees to the citizen the right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property (article 1, § 1), which includes also the right of disposal. But the guaranty ceases to operate at the death of the possessor. There is no provision of our Constitution, or that of the United States, which secures the right to any one to contract or dispose of his property after his death, nor the right to any one, whether kindred or not, to take it by inheritance. Descent is a creature of statute, and not a natural right. 2 Blk. Com. 10, 11; Strode v. Com., 52 Pa. 181."

In Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 18 Sup. Ct. 594, 42 L. Ed. 1037, the constitutionality of the Illinois statute, which is worded precisely as the Kentucky statute, was upheld. In that case substantially every objection was made to the statute that is urged in the instant case; but, after an exhaustive consideration of these objections and a critical review of the decisions of various state courts, the Supreme Court announced the following conclusions: First: "An inheritance tax is not one on property by devise or descent. It is the creature of the law, and not a natural right or privilege; and therefore the authority which confers it may impose conditions upon it. From these principles it is deduced that the states may tax the privilege, discriminate between relatives, and between these and strangers, and grant exemptions, and are not precluded from this power by the provisions of the respective state Constitutions requiring uniformity and equality of taxation."

The conclusions expressed in Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Savings Bank and State v. Hamlin, supra, are approved by the following cases: United States v. Perkins, 163 U. S. 625, 16 Sup. Ct. 1073, 41 L. Ed. 287; Strode v. Commonwealth, 52 Pa. 181; Eyre v. Jacob, 14 Grat. (Va.) 422, 73 Am. Dec. 367; Schoolfield v. Lynchburg, 78 Va. 368; State v. Dalrymple, 70 Md. 298, 17 Atl. 82, 3 L. R. A. 372; Clapp v. Mason, 94 U. S. 589, 24 L. Ed. 212; Re Merriam's Estate, 141 N. Y. 479, 36 N. E. 505; State v. Alston, 94 Tenn. 674, 30 S. A. 170; Scholey v. Rew, 90 U. S. 331, 23 L. Ed. 99; Mager v. Grima, 8 How. 490, 12 L. Ed. 1168; United States v. Fox, 94 U. S. 315, 24 L. Ed. 192; Plummer v. Coler, 178 U. S. 117, 20 Sup. Ct. 829, 44 L. Ed. 998; Knowlton v. Moore, 178 U. S. 41, 20 Sup. Ct. 747, 44 L. Ed. 969; State ex rel. Garth v. Switzler, 143 Mo. 287, 45 S. W. 245, 40 L. R. A. 288, 65 Am. St. Rep. 653; 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 337. We think the numerous authorities, supra, answer every substantial objection made to the inheritance tax statute under consideration. For they clearly present the theory on which taxation on the devolution of estates at the death of their owners is based, and clearly uphold the validity of the statute, by demonstrating that the tax thereby imposed is not one on property, but one on the privilege or right of succession thereto, and that it is not obnoxious to any provision of the state or federal Constitutions requiring uniformity or equality of taxation, or because its enforcement may result in discrimination between relations, or between relations and strangers.

It is, however, insisted for appellant that as the tax is a certain percentum of the value of the estate, and the property pays it, it is therefore a tax on the property itself. This argument is answered by the opinion in Eyre v. Jacob, supra, as follows: "But this is by no means a necessary logical conclusion. The intention of the Legislature was plainly to tax the transmission of property by devise or descent to collateral kindred, and to require that a party then taking the benefit of a civil right accrued to him under the law should pay a certain premium for its enjoyment; and, as it was thought just and reasonable that the amount of the premium should bear a certain proportion to the value of the subject enjoyed, it is fixed at a certain percentum upon the value of the whole estate transmitted." The provisions with respect to equality and uniformity in taxation found in section 171 of the Constitution apply to a direct tax on property. They do not limit the power of the Legislature as to the objects of taxation, but are more especially intended to prevent an arbitrary taxation of property according to kind or quality, without regard to value. We are, however, unable to see that the inequality and want of uniformity complained of by appellant exist in the statute under consideration, for every person not of the class exempted by the act from the payment of the tax, who takes from the estate of a decedent by succession or devise, pays a tax for the privilege, and this tax is proportioned to the value of the interest which he acquires. Nor does the exemption, where the estate is of the value of $500 or less, constitute inequality or unjust discrimination. Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, 178 U. S. 288, 18 Sup. Ct. 594, 42 L. Ed. 1087; Eyre v. Jacob, 14 Grat. (Va.) 422, 73 Am. Dec. 375.

In Minot v. Winthrop, 162 Mass. 113, 38 N. E. 512, 26 L. R. A. 264, it is said in reference to a complaint of inequality urged against an inheritance tax statute: "The tax imposed by the statute we are considering is said to be unequal because it is not imposed upon all estates and upon all heirs, devisees, legatees, and distributees. To make a distinction between collateral kindred or strangers in blood and kindred in the direct line in reference to the assessment of such a tax, either by exempting the kindred in the direct line or by imposing on collaterals and strangers a higher rate of taxation, has the sanction of nearly all states which have levied taxes of this kind. It has a sanction in reason, for the moral claim of collaterals and strangers is less than that of kindred in the direct line, and the privileges therefore greater. The tax imposed by this statute is uniformly imposed upon all estates and all persons within the description contained in it, and the tax is not plainly and grossly oppressive in amount." In State v. Hamlin, 86 Me. 495, 30 Atl. 76, 25 L. R. A. 632, 41 Am. St. Rep. 569, it is said: "The constitutional requirement of uniformity is satisfied by a tax on the transmission of property by will or descent to strangers and collaterals, where it is uniform as to the entire class affected, although other classes of persons are exempt from the tax." So, if the rule as to uniformity should be applied to the statute under consideration, we should say that it conforms to the rule; for it only requires the same means and methods to be applied impartially to all the constituents of a class, to the end that the law shall operate equally and uniformly upon all persons in similar circumstances, both in the privilege conferred and the liabilities imposed.

In other words, the tax is uniform on what it is laid—the value of the succession, after deducting the exemption on which no tax is laid. It is upon so much of the legacy received as exceeds $500. No legacy of $500 or less is taxed at all, and each legacy over $500 is taxed equally as to the excess.

It is insisted for appellee that, as the inheritance tax in question is a "special or excise tax," the rule as to uniformity does not apply to it. On the other hand, appellant contends that the tax is not an "excise tax," in the meaning of that term as defined by Phien on Public Finance and other text-writers. While it is true that "excise" has been defined to be an inland duty or impost levied upon articles of manufacture or sale, and also upon licenses to pursue certain trades or to deal in certain commodities, it is nevertheless a term of very general signification, meaning tribute, custom tax, tollage, or assessment, and in recent years the courts have so enlarged its meaning as to declare that an inheritance tax is an excise tax; indeed, it is so denominated in practically every case included in the list previously cited. While not more conclusive than similar statements in many of these cases, the following excerpt from State ex rel. Garth v. Switzler, 143 Mo. 287, 45 S. W. 245, 40 L. R. A. 288, 65 Am. St. Rep. 653, aptly supports the proposition last stated: "As already remarked, no doubt longer exists that it is competent for the Legislature to levy a tax upon the succession of estates. It is quite universally held that such a tax is not a tax upon property, in the ordinary sense, but is in the nature of an excise or bonus, exacted by the state upon the privilege or right to inherit or succeed to an estate." But, in view of our conclusion that the act imposing the tax does not violate the provisions of the Constitution with respect to uniformity of taxation, it is not necessary to decide whether or not the rule as to uniformity applies to a special or excise tax such as this. Therefore that question is not decided.

It is further contended by appellant that the effect of the act is to tax property otherwise exempt from taxation; and as an instance in point it is said that in a companion case submitted with this a religious institution of learning receiving a devise is sought to be taxed thereon, although its property is by law exempt from taxation. The answer to this complaint must be a restatement of the proposition that the tax is not imposed upon the property, but on the right of succession. Bonds of the United States are by act of Congress exempt from taxation; but in the cases of Plummer v. Coler, 178 U. S. 115, 20 Sup. Ct. 829, 44 L. Ed. 998, and Wallace v. Myers (C. C.) 38 Fed. 184, 4 L. R. A. 171, a state inheritance tax upon legacies of such bonds was sustained upon the principle above stated.

We think the county and circuit courts gave correct answers to the questions of construction raised by appellants. Manifestly the provision of the act declaring "that the first five hundred dollars of every estate shall not be subject to such duty or tax" refers to the estate passing by will to the collateral relative or stranger, or under the statute of descent and distribution to the collateral relative, and not to the estate of the testator or decedent, or, in other words, that an estate passing by will to the collateral or stranger, or under the statute to the collateral, which is valued at $500 or less, shall not be subject to the tax. The tax is upon the individual, and can be imposed only when the particular interest in the decedent's estate passing to him exceeds $500. The tax is not, therefore, imposed on the estate of the decedent, but upon the beneficiaries' right of succession to his property. Nor does the fact that the executor or administrator is required by the act to pay the tax make it a tax against the estate of the testator or decedent, for it also requires him to deduct it from the estate passing to the legatee or collateral heir. In re Hoffman, 143 N. Y. 327, 38 N. E. 311; In re Howe's Estate, 112 N. Y. 103, 19 N. E. 513, 2 L. R. A. 825; In re Cagers' Will, 111 N. Y. 443, 18 N. E. 906. In the case at bar the exemption in the first section of the act should be allowed each legacy; and, as held by the court below and said in State v. Switzler, 143 Mo. 287, 45 S. W. 245, 40 L. R. A. 288, 65 Am. St. Rep. 669: "Where it is that the tax is upon the succession, it is computed, not on the aggregate valuation of the whole estate of the decedent considered as the unit for taxation, but on the value of the separate units into which it is divided. * * *"

We do not find that the cases of Schuster v. City of Louisville, 89 S. W. 689, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 588, and Hager, Auditor, v. Walker, 107 S. W. 254, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 748, militate against the conclusions expressed in this opinion. In the Schuster Case the court had under consideration the amendment to the Constitution providing a system of assessment of personal property differing from the ad valorem system provided by section 171, and held, in substance, that it was not the object of the amendment to allow any exemption of personal property from taxation imposed upon all property uniformly by section 171, and, further, that the amendment, in authorizing a different mode of assessment of personal property from that theretofore provided for, did not, either expressly or by implication, permit a disregard of the rule imposed by section 171 requiring uniformity in taxes upon all property. In the case of Hager, Auditor, v. Walker it was held by the court that a certain section of the revenue act of 1906 imposing a license tax upon agents of real estate was invalid, because it graded the license according to the class of the city in which the licensee lived, exempting altogether real estate agents residing outside of an incorporated city. The license tax was declared invalid, not because it lacked uniformity, but upon the ground of unreasonable and unconstitutional discrimination between citizens, based upon no valid reason, and because the tax was not imposed by "general law," as required by the Constitution. The court, however, expressly held that the provision in section 171 of the Constitution requiring that the tax rate upon property be uniform does not directly and specifically apply to license taxes authorized by section 181 of the Constitution. The act was obnoxious to the Constitution because, in imposing a license tax upon a particular occupation, it attempted to exempt from its provisions and burdens certain persons engaged in the occupation for no other reason than that they did not live in incorporated cities. The exemption was manifestly an unreasonable discrimination against the persons taxed, and in violation of section 3 of the Bill of Rights, which declares that "no grant of exclusive, separate, public emoluments, or privilege shall be made to any man or set of men, except in consideration of public service."

It follows from what we have said that in our opinion the act imposing the inheritance tax is not unconstitutional or otherwise invalid. Therefore it is not our province to question the policy of the Legislature in enacting it, or to refuse to sanction its enforcement.

Wherefore the judgment is affirmed.

CRAIN et al. v. MALLONE et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Oct. 28, 1908.)

1. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 98*)—ADVANCEMENTS—INTENT OF INTESTATE—EFFECT.

A parent's intention in making an advancement cannot defeat Ky. St. 1903, § 1407, requiring property given a descendant to be charged against him on a distribution of the undivided estate.

2. PARENT AND CHILD (§ 3*)—ADULT—CHILD'S SUPPORT—PARENT'S DUTY.

One's duty to care for his child does not necessarily terminate when the child becomes an adult, and the parent must support a helpless adult child, if able to do so.

3. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 98*)—ADVANCEMENTS—HELPLESS ADULT CHILDREN.

Ky. St. 1903, § 1407, requiring property given a descendant to be charged against him on a distribution of the undivided estate, does not authorize a charge against a helpless adult child for the value of his support by his parent.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hart County.
"To be officially reported."

Action to settle Susan Mallone's estate. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to her answer, defendant Annie Lee Crain and another appeal adversely to J. C. Mallone and others. Affirmed.

McCandless & Larimore, for appellants.
C. B. Dowling, for appellees.

CARROLL, J. Mrs. Susan Mallone died intestate, leaving surviving her three children—the appellant Annie Lee Crain, wife of L. F. Crain, and J. C. and W. S. Mallone. This action was brought to settle her estate and distribute the proceeds between her children. J. C. Mallone was a person of unsound mind, and the guardian ad litem appointed to defend for him sought to charge Mrs. Crain and W. S. Mallone with advancements made to them by Mrs. Mallone. Mrs. Crain and W. S. Mallone admitted in a pleading that they had received from their mother advancements in land and money, amounting to the value of about $2,000 each; but they denied that they should be charged with these advancements for the benefit of J. C. Mallone, because, as they averred, he was some 45 years of age when his mother died, and had been destitute of mind since his infancy, and an idiot, and was supported and cared for all of his life by his mother; and that this care and attention for the years after he reached his majority was worth at least $200 per year, and that their mother, recognizing that she had in this way advanced to J. C. Mallone largely more than $2,000, for the purpose of making her other children equal with him, advanced to them $2,000 each. After this pleading was filed, W. S. Mallone not desiring to further contest the fact that he should be charged with $2,000, advanced to him, his name was stricken from the pleading denying that J. C. Mallone was not entitled to charge the other children with the advancements. Thereupon the demurrer filed by the guardian ad litem of J. C. Mallone to the answer of Mrs. Crain, setting up the reasons why she should not be charged in the settlement of the estate with the $2,000 advanced to her, was sustained; and, declining to amend, she prosecutes this appeal. So that the only question in the case is whether or not her answer presented a good defense.

Ky. St. 1903, § 1407, provides that: "Any real or personal property or money, given or devised by a parent or grandparent to a descendant, shall be charged to the descendant of those claiming through him in the division and distribution of the undivided estate of the parent or grandparent; and such party shall receive nothing further therefrom until the other descendants are made proportionately equal with him, according to his descendible and distributable share of the whole estate, real and personal, devised and undivided. The advancement shall be estimated according to the value of the property when given. The maintaining or educating, or the giving of money to a child or grandchild, without any view to a portion or settlement in life, shall not be deemed an advancement." Therefore, unless the value of the services, attention, and care rendered by his mother to the idiot, J. C. Mallone, after he arrived at the age of 21 years, should be charged to him as an advancement, there is no escape from the conclusion that, under the statute, the appellant Mrs. Crain must in the settlement of the estate, as between herself and J. C. Mallone, be charged with the $2,000 advanced to her. The intention of Mrs. Mallone in making the advancements will not be allowed to defeat the statute, or to relieve the children who received the advancements from accounting for them. Bowles v. Winchester, 13 Bush, 1. Indeed, counsel for the appellant concede that, unless the answer of Mrs. Crain presented a defense, she must be charged with this sum. Their only contention is that, admitting as true the averments of their pleading, J. C. Mallone received in the way of advancements more than Mrs. Crain, and hence no account as between them should be taken of advancements in the settlement and distribution of the estate. In other words, their argument is that an idiotic and helpless adult child who is taken care of by his parents must in the settlement of the parent's estate be charged as an advancement with the value of the services, attention, and care rendered to him by the parent. It does not appear that J. C. Mallone had any estate aside from that received from his mother, so that whether or not his mother might under any circumstances have charged him with and collected from his estate a reasonable sum for caring for him is not before us. Hence it is not necessary to particularly consider section 2178 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903, providing that "any person other than the keeper of a tavern or house of private entertainment, who shall entertain in his house, or furnish him with diet or storage for his goods, not making an agreement for compensation therefor, shall not recover anything against the person so entertained or furnished with diet or storage, or against his estate, but the person so furnishing another shall be considered as doing the same of courtesy," or the cases construing it, that hold that this statute does not apply to boarding, lodging, and attention bestowed upon an idiot or a person incapable of entering into a contract. Combs v. Beatty, 3 Bush, 613. The effort here is not to require a helpless adult child to contribute to or pay for his maintenance, but to permit the parent to charge the cost of maintaining as an advancement, and have the same deducted from the child's part of the estate. It is conceded that it is the duty of a parent to care for its infant child, and admitted that, except in rare cases, he will not be permitted to charge for such services (Hedges v. Hedges, 73 S. W. 1112, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 2229); but insisted that, when the child arrives at the age of 21, the obligation and duty of the parent ends, and thereafter the child may be charged for the care and attention necessarily bestowed upon him. Based upon this premise is the argument of counsel that Mrs. Mallone had the right to charge J. C. Mallone as an advancement with the value of the services rendered him by her; but the premise is not sound. The duty and obligation of a parent to care for his offspring does not necessarily terminate when the child arrives at age or becomes an adult; nor is it limited to infants and children of tender years. An adult child may from accident or disease be as helpless and incapable of making his support as an infant, and we see no difference in principle between the duty imposed upon the parent to support the infant and the obligation to care for the adult, who is equally, if not more, dependent upon the parent. In either case the natural as well as the legal obligation is the same. If the parent is financially able to furnish the necessary assistance. If the parent has no estate, or is indigent or otherwise unable to support his infant child, who is possessed with ample means, the chancellor when appealed to might make an allowance out of the child's estate; and, in the case of an unfortunate adult, the court under similar circumstances would grant relief. But this is not the case we are considering. Here the mother had ample estate. The adult child had none. The charge was not made by the mother to enable her to support her son, or because she was unable to render him freely and without charge the services performed. But her other children for their own benefit are seeking to have the interest inherited by the child charged by the amount expended in his support by his mother. This they cannot do. Certainly they do not occupy any better position in this particular than their mother. She could not have exacted from J. C. Mallone compensation because he had no estate, and she was financially able to care for him. Nor was the maintaining of J. C. Mallone by his mother with any view to a portion or settlement in life within the meaning of section 1407 of the statute, supra. It was done in the discharge of a filial duty that a mother owed to her helpless child. The advancements made were only those necessary to sustain him from day to day, and can in no sense be considered as an advancement made with a view to a portion or settlement in life.

Nor are the views herein expressed in conflict with the opinion in Central Kentucky Asylum v. Knighton, 113 Ky. 156, 67 S. W. 366. In that case the court was considering the meaning and effect of a statutory provision authorizing the state, under certain conditions, to recover from the parent the board of the child while an inmate of an asylum; and it was said that the statute only applied to infants, and not an adult child. It is true the court in the course of the opinion said: "Being entitled to the services of the child until of age, there is some reason for holding the parent to a legal liability when the necessities of the child require that he should be supplied with food and clothing. But when of full age, the parent being entitled to no control over the child, and having no right to his custody or services, no such legal obligation exists and none can be created by statute unless by consent of the parent. He may contract to support the child, and it would be binding, but not otherwise." This rule might be invoked in this case if it was sought by strangers to charge Mrs. Mallone with care and attention to her son—a question, however, it is not necessary to decide in this case. But the fact that the parent might not be liable to third persons for the support of adult children is a long step from proving that the parent may himself charge them under facts like the ones shown by this record. It does not follow from the proposition that the parent may be exempt from liability at the hands of third persons that he is thereby permitted to charge for services and attention rendered by him.

Looking at the question as it is presented by the record, we cannot find any authority, statutory or otherwise, that would warrant us in holding that J. C. Mallone should be charged as an advancement with his maintenance; and the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the commonwealth of Kentucky and Ora L. Adams, as superintendent of schools of Mercer county, against D. C. Heath & Co. and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. B. Moulton and Wm. L. Whittinghill, for appellants. W. I. Allin and B. F. Roach, for appellees.

SETTLE, J. In 1905 H. H. Walker, then county superintendent of schools in Mercer county, in the name of the commonwealth of Kentucky and in his official capacity as such superintendent instituted an action in the Mercer circuit court against the appellant, D. C. Heath & Co., a corporation engaged in publishing and selling schoolbooks, and B. F. Graziani, their surety, in a bond executed to the commonwealth, under sections 4423, 4424, Ky. St. 1903, for the faithful performance on their part of a contract made with the county superintendent of schools of Mercer county, whereby they sold and undertook to furnish for the use of the schools of that county certain schoolbooks. The petition alleged a breach of the contract and bond by appellants in selling to the schools of the state of Ohio schoolbooks of the same quality as those sold Mercer county at lower prices than they had received from Mercer county, and for this alleged breach of contract judgment was asked against appellants for $10,000 damages, the full amount of the penalty named in the bond. Appellants filed an answer, containing a traverse and plea in abatement, basing the latter upon the pendency of a like action brought against them in the Mason circuit court upon the same bond by the superintendent of schools of Mason county, which, it was alleged, deprived the Mercer circuit court of jurisdiction. A demurrer to the plea of no jurisdiction was sustained by the Mercer circuit court, and the case then went to trial upon the issues made by the traverse, resulting in a verdict and judgment in appellees' behalf for $10,000. The day following the rendition of the judgment appellants and H. H. Walker, the then county superintendent, entered into an attempted written compromise and settlement thereof, whereby the latter accepted in satisfaction of the judgment of $10,000 the note of one W. S. Smith, an officer of D. C. Heath & Co., for $2,200, of date May 20, 1905, due 12 months after date, and payable upon determination by this court that the judgment rendered in the Mercer court was valid. The consideration expressed for the alleged compromise was the agreement of appellants to surrender their right to enter a motion for a new trial and of their right of appeal from the judgment in question. Pursuant to the alleged settlement a formal satisfaction of the judgment was entered upon the records of the Mercer circuit court by the county superintendent.

On January 1, 1906, Miss Ora L. Adams succeeded H. H. Walker as superintendent of schools of Mercer county, and on August 20, 1907, she, in the name of the commonwealth of Kentucky and in her official capacity, instituted the present action against the appellants, D. C. Heath & Co., B. F. Grazlani, H. H. Walker, and Ben C. Allen, clerk of the Mercer circuit court. The petition sets forth the recovery of the judgment rendered in the first action, and alleges its nonpayment, that the entry of record showing its satisfaction is false and of no effect, that it was without authority, and was procured and made by fraud and collusion between Walker, former superintendent, and appellants. The prayer of the petition asked the cancellation of the entry as to satisfaction of the judgment, and that Allen, clerk of the circuit court, be required by mandamus to issue execution upon the judgment against the property of appellants. After entering various motions and demurrers, following an election by appellees to dismiss so much of the action as asked the writ of mandamus, appellants filed answer containing three paragraphs. The first paragraph, after traversing the petition, set up and relied upon the alleged compromise and satisfaction of the judgment of $10,000; that Ora L. Adams, present superintendent, had brought suit upon the note of $2,200 given in satisfaction of that judgment, thereby ratifying the settlement; and that the maker of the $2,200 note is solvent and able to pay any amount that may be recovered upon the note. The second paragraph contained a plea of estoppel arising from the alleged compromise and satisfaction of the $10,000 judgment; it being averred that appellants were thereby prevented from entering a motion for a new trial within three days of the return of the verdict against them, and, further, that their right to prosecute an appeal from the judgment of $10,000 had been lost by the laches of appellees in allowing two years to elapse after the rendition of the judgment before instituting the action to cancel the entry showing its satisfaction. The third paragraph contained a formal plea of accord and satisfaction, resulting from the acceptance by Walker, the former county superintendent, of the $2,200 note of W. S. Smith in full satisfaction of the judgment of $10,000. Appellees filed a general demurrer to the answer, which the circuit court sustained, and appellants refusing to plead further, judgment was rendered canceling the entry made of record respecting the satisfaction of the $10,000 judgment, declaring appellees entitled to enforce the full payment thereof, and allowing them their costs. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

It appears from the record that Ora L. Adams, present superintendent of schools of Mercer county, entered a motion before judgment to dismiss it, to which the county attorney of Mercer county objected, and that the circuit court sustained the objection and overruled the motion to dismiss. It also appears that the same superintendent, after bringing the action and while it was pending, brought another in the Mercer circuit court against appellants upon the $2,200 note to recover the amount thereof, with interest. The record is indefinite as to the disposition made of the latter action, but briefs of counsel seem to concede that it was undetermined when the judgment in this action was rendered. Whether the alleged compromise under which the $2,200 note was executed was, as surmised by counsel for appellees, arranged before judgment for the $10,000 was rendered, or was, as claimed by appellants, made afterwards, is not material if the circuit court was right in holding the transaction void. It is manifest that the object of the parties concerned in entering into the alleged compromise was to prevent a recovery against the appellants, D. C. Heath & Co., and their surety, in the action on the same bond then pending in the Mason circuit court; it evidently being their opinion that the court in which suit was first brought would alone have jurisdiction to render judgment for the penalty named in the bond. Doubtless the procedure contemplated was to rely upon the judgment of $10,000 recovered in the Mercer circuit court as a bar to any recovery on the bond in the action pending in the Mason circuit court; and to make the plea in bar or abatement more effective, the entry of satisfaction appearing upon the judgment of the Mercer circuit court was made to convince the Mason circuit court that it had been fully paid, though in fact it was wholly unpaid. It is insisted for appellees that appellants, D. C. Heath &

Co., by inducing Walker, the county superintendent, to accept the note of a third party for the $2,200 that officer consented to receive in satisfaction of the judgment, and providing therein that, although payable one year after date, it was not in fact to be paid until the validity of the judgment of the Mercer circuit court should be determined by the Court of Appeals, intended to put it out of his power to enforce its collection. As the appellants named did not ask a new trial in the Mercer circuit court, or appeal from the judgment of that court, the only way to test the validity of the judgment of that court was through a ruling of the Mason circuit court growing out of an effort to use it therein to defeat a recovery in the action pending in that court against the appellants, D. C. Heath & Co. and B. F. Graziani. The acceptance by that court of the judgment as a bar to a recovery in the action before it, or its refusal to so accept it, would have entitled the party prejudiced by the ruling to have this court, upon appeal, review the ruling complained of, and thereby decide whether the judgment is a valid or invalid one.

A novel disposition seems to have been made of the $2,200 note accepted by the county superintendent in satisfaction of the $10,000 judgment. It was to "remain in the possession of C. E. Rankin as attorney for plaintiffs * * * until the sum for which said note is executed shall be paid according to the terms and tenor of this agreement." This singular arrangement with respect to the custody of the note is a matter of more than ordinary significance, in view of the further fact that it was not to be paid until the Court of Appeals rendered a decision in a case that might never get before it; there being nothing in the note or terms of compromise that compelled appellant to test the validity of the judgment of $10,000 rendered by the Mercer circuit court. In view of this situation, it may well be asked, when could the payment of the note be enforced? Was it due at the end of the year succeeding its date, at the expiration of such a time as appellants might reasonably have required to test by appeal the validity of the judgment of the Mercer circuit court, or will it become due at all? It might be said that an answer is furnished by the opinion of this court in B. F. Johnson v. Commonwealth, 97 S. W. 749, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 148, in which it was held that, where there is an action pending in each of two counties for the same breach of a bond such as appellants executed, the pendency of the one first brought may be pleaded in abatement of the second; but, where the second is based upon a different breach from that set up in the first action, the pendency of the first action cannot be pleaded in abatement. Yet, as there can be only one recovery had in either action, this fact may be pleaded in abatement in the other. While it cannot be said that the opinion, supra, determined the validity of the judgment of the Mercer circuit court, it does decide that, if valid, it would support a plea in abatement in the action in the Mason circuit court, and thereby defeat a recovery against appellants in that court. But the ruling of this court in Johnson v. Commonwealth, supra, cannot operate to deprive appellants of the right of appeal in the case in the Mason circuit court involving the same questions determined by the opinion in Johnson v. Commonwealth, however much the Court of Appeals might, in passing upon such appeal, feel itself bound to follow the opinion in that case. In other words, the mere right of appeal may exist independently of the question of whether the appellant will be entitled to the relief sought thereby. It does not appear, however, in the case before us, whether an appeal was ever taken by appellants to test the validity of the judgment of the Mason circuit court, but does appear that they are resisting a recovery in the suit brought by the present county superintendent upon the $2,200 note alleged to have been executed in satisfaction of the judgment. Appellants' position seems to us strangely inconsistent. After, as they claim, compromising and settling with the note of a third party of $2,200, a judgment they owed of $10,000, and using that judgment at its face value to defeat a recovery against them in an action in the Mason circuit court, appellants seem to be assisting the obligor in the $2,200 note in resisting its payment upon the ground that the validity of the judgment, in satisfaction of which it was given, has not been determined by the Court of Appeals, when they, who alone could have tested its validity, have failed to take the matter by appeal to that court.

Being inclined to rest our decision of this case upon the grounds adopted by the circuit court in its opinion, we need not declare collusive and fraudulent the alleged compromise of the judgment rendered by the Mercer circuit court in the former action, or its attempted ratification by the subsequent bringing of the suit upon the $2,200 note given in satisfaction of the judgment. Back of these questions lies another of greater importance, viz.: Was the act of Walker, the former superintendent, in accepting the note of $2,200 in compromise and satisfaction of the $10,000 judgment against appellants, D. C. Heath & Co. and B. F. Graziani, ultra vires and in consequence thereof void? If so, it would seem to follow that his successor, the present superintendent, was without authority to dismiss the action brought by her to obtain a cancellation of the record entry showing the satisfaction of the judgment, and also that the action brought by her to recover upon the $2,200 note was equally unauthorized.

Chapter 113, §§ 4363 to 4553, inclusive, Ky. St. 1903, known as the "school statute," contains the law applicable to this case. Section 4422, as amended by the act of March, 1902, creates a county board of examiners for each county of the state, to consist of the county superintendent and two other members of his appointment. Section 4423 requires this board to adopt a list of text-books for use in the common schools, under certain restrictions therein indicated. Section 4424 prevents a seller of text-books for use in the common schools of this state, whether a corporation or individual, from entering the market in the state until such seller shall have executed bond before the state board of education in the sum of $10,000, with good security resident in the state, conditioned that such text-books as are sold for use in the common schools in any county shall not exceed the lowest price at which the same books are sold by such seller in any other state or section of the country, or exceed the price fixed and filed in the office of the Superintendent of Public Instruction at Frankfort. The bond thus provided for was, as before stated, duly executed by the appellant D. C. Heath & Co., the appellant B. F. Graziani becoming surety thereon, following which a certified copy of the bond was forwarded by the State Superintendent of Public Instruction to the county superintendent of Mercer county, as required by section 4424 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903, supra, and this is the bond for a breach of which the judgment of $10,000, previously mentioned, was recovered against appellants. In the event of a violation by the principal of the provisions of the bond, section 4423, Ky. St. 1903, provides that the county superintendent "shall bring suit in the circuit court of his county for a forfeiture of said bond, and any money recovered therein, after paying the costs of proceedings, shall be covered into the school fund of the county."

The only authority conferred by this section upon the county superintendent is to bring suit for a forfeiture of the bond. While the statute does not expressly so declare, it seems to us to be its meaning that he shall collect the bond, and, when collected, pay it into the school fund of the county. In other words, the commonwealth, to which the bond is payable, constitutes the county superintendent its agent to sue upon and collect the bond; the damages being liquidated and fixed by the terms of the bond itself at $10,000. If a recovery results at all from the institution of the action on the bond, it must be for $10,000. It cannot exceed or fall below that sum. It is a cardinal principle of the law of agency that even an attorney at law, acting under employment to bring suit and prosecute and collect a claim, cannot, either before or after judgment, in the absence of special authority from the client, compromise or settle the claim for less than the full amount thereof; nor can he release a judgment by accepting something not sued for in satisfaction thereof. O'Reilly v. Call, 7 Ky. Law Rep. 516; Harrow v. Farrow, 46

Ky. 126, 46 Am. Dec. 60; Smith v. Dixon, 60 Ky. 438; Cox v. Adelsdorf, 51 S. W. 616, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 421; Benedict v. Wilhoite, 80 S. W. 1155, 26 Ky. Law Rep. 178. Manifestly the authority conferred upon the county superintendent by the statute cannot be broader than if it had been conferred upon the Attorney General or the commonwealth's or county attorney, neither of whom, under the mere power to sue upon and collect the bond, could have accepted in satisfaction of a judgment recovered on the bond a less sum than the whole thereof, or a note for even the full amount of such judgment, in lieu of money. This case is not one in which appellants can rightfully claim that the act of the former county superintendent, Walker, in accepting the $2,200 note in satisfaction of the judgment, or those of the present superintendent in attempting to dismiss the action and to ratify her predecessor's acceptance of the note by suing upon it herself, were within the apparent scope of their power as agents, or that the principal, the state, had recognized similar acts performed in its name by the agents; for the only powers possessed by either agent are such as were conferred by the statute, with which appellants must be presumed to have been familiar at the time of all their transactions with the agents, and that the authority conferred by the statute is specific, in that it directs the county superintendent, in the event of a breach of the bond, to bring suit for a forfeiture, and provides that the money recovered thereon shall, after paying the costs of the action, be covered (i. e., paid) into the school fund of the county. The power granted the county superintendent is restricted by the language of the statute to the particular acts it requires him to perform, and cannot be enlarged to embrace such as were attempted in the matter of the alleged compromise of the $10,000 judgment, the bringing of a suit on the $2,200 note accepted in pursuance of such compromise, or the attempted dismissal of the action. We therefore concur in the conclusion reached by the circuit court that these several acts on the part of the county superintendents were unauthorized, and therefore void. As well said in Long, Treasurer, v. McDowell, 107 Ky. 14, 52 S. W. 812: "There is no better settled principle of law than that the state cannot be estopped by the unauthorized acts of its officers."

It is contended by appellants that the commonwealth is only a nominal party to the action; that, by reason of the provisions of the statute requiring the county superintendent to institute the action, he is the real party in interest; and that the power given him to sue carries with it the power to dismiss the action at any stage of the proceedings. We think it clear that, before the adoption of our present Code, an action upon a bond like that of appellants was required to be brought in the name of the commonwealth alone, though some officer might be authorized to institute it. But section 21, Civ. Code Prac., provides that a person expressly authorized to do so may bring an action without joining with him the person for whose benefit it is brought. As the statute makes it the duty of a county superintendent to bring suit upon the bond, perhaps the bringing of the suit in his name alone would not be held sufficient to justify its dismissal. In at least one such action (American Book Company v. Wells, 83 S. W. 622, 26 Ky. Law Rep. 1159) the county superintendent seems to have been the only plaintiff, though it does not appear that objection was made to the petition on account of defect of parties. However, section 21, supra, is but an enlargement of section 18, Civ. Code Prac., which requires that every action must be maintained in the name of the real party in interest. The bond was taken to the commonwealth, and it was the party injured by its breach. Therefore the commonwealth is the real party in interest; the superintendent being the nominal party. The original suit, in which the judgment of $10,000 was recovered against appellants, was brought in the name of the commonwealth, as well as that of the county superintendent; and the present action was instituted in the same way. If the county superintendent in either case had refused to institute the action, it might have been brought in the name of the commonwealth by the state board of education, or in the name of the commonwealth by the trustees of any school district of Mercer county, or in the name of the commonwealth alone for the benefit of the common schools of Mercer county, as they are the beneficiaries.

It is the general doctrine in this state that, where a bond is taken in the name of the commonwealth for the benefit of a person or class of persons, an action may be brought by such person or persons in the name of the commonwealth for his or their use and benefit. So, where the rights of a corporation are involved and the directors refuse to sue, a stockholder may sue for the corporation or for himself and associates and join the corporation as a party plaintiff or defendant. Such is likewise the rule of practice where the personal representative of an estate refuses to sue. In such case suit may be brought by the distributee, joining the personal representative as defendant. Commonwealth v. Tilton, 48 S. W. 143, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1056; Shawhan v. Zinn, 79 Ky. 300; McChord v. Fisher (Ky.) 13 B. Mon. 194. But this matter seems to have been put at rest by this court in the case of B. F. Johnson Co. v. Commonwealth, supra, in the opinion of which it is said: "But, stripped of all form, the action is an action by the commonwealth on the bond executed to it; the county superintendent being simply the officer of the state authorized to institute the suit for it." This being true, when the present county superintendent entered her motion to dismiss the action, the county attorney had the right, and it was his duty, to object to and resist the granting of the motion. Had the county superintendent withdrawn from the action after the refusal of the court to dismiss it, such action upon her part could have had no effect upon the case. In Wright v. Baker, 94 Ky. 343, 22 S. W. 335, which was a suit brought in behalf of a school district, two of the trustees attempted to withdraw from the suit, with respect to which this court said: "The effort by the two Bentleys to withdraw their names as plaintiffs in the action did not affect the proceedings."

Section 130, Ky. St. 1903, relating to the duty of county attorneys, provides: "He shall investigate and inquire into the condition of all unsatisfied judgments in his county in favor of the commonwealth, and take all necessary steps, by motion, action or otherwise, to collect or cause the same to be collected and paid into the state treasury." Under the authority here given the county attorney had the right to take such action as would compel the payment by appellants of the judgment of $10,000 rendered against them by the Mercer circuit court, and it is further his duty, upon collecting the judgment, to see that it is "covered into the school fund of the county," instead of being paid into the state treasury; such disposition of it being required by section 4423, Ky. St. 1903. In the absence of statutory authority to that effect, we cannot afford to say that county school superintendents may exercise such powers as were exercised by the two superintendents of Mercer county in the matter of the attempted compromise of the judgment of the Mercer circuit court, as to do so would tend to destroy in large measure the salutary aim of the statute with reference to the sale of schoolbooks in the state, which was and is to prevent extortion and fraud upon the part of those permitted to supply its schools with these instruments for the mental and moral advancement of the children within its bounds.

Finding no error in the rulings of the circuit court, the judgment is affirmed.

UNION TRUST & SAVINGS CO. et al. v. MARSHALL'S ADM'RS.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 5, 1908.)

1. PARTIES (§ 75*)—DEFENDANTS—NECESSARY PARTIES—OBJECTIONS—MODE OF OBJECTIONS.

In a suit by administrators for the settlement of an estate, if a necessary party was not before the court, either by summons or warning order, the party objecting on that ground should have stated the name of such party.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 356*)— PAYMENT OF CLAIMS—SALE—AUTHORITY TO MAKE.

In a suit by administrators to settle an estate, consolidated with a suit by creditors to have certain alleged preferences declared an assignment for the benefit of decedent's creditors, certain lienholders being made parties and their liens set up, a sale of the land could be ordered, though such lienholders had not filed their answers and set up their liens when judgment was entered, under Civ. Code Prac. § 692, requiring the plaintiff in an action to enforce a lien to make other lienholders defendants, and permitting a judgment of sale to satisfy all the liens, though such defendants failed to assert their claims, but providing that they shall not be allowed to withdraw or receive any of the proceeds until they have shown their right thereto by answering and cross-petition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 356.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 329*)—
SALE FOR DEBTS—PROPERTY SUBJECT TO DISPOSAL.

Where decedent had the right under his father's will to purchase the interests of other remaindermen in land in which decedent had a remainder within a certain time after the life tenant's death, and decedent elected by his will to purchase the interest of a deceased remainderman, the representatives of such remainderman being made defendants, decedent's administrators, in proceedings to sell the estate to satisfy debts, could consummate his election to purchase by paying the stipulated price out of the estate, and then sell the land for debts together with the rest of the estate; it being unnecessary to institute a separate proceeding to vest title in themselves.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 329.*]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 341*)—
SALE—REPORT—DETERMINATION AS TO NE-CESSITY OF SALE.

Under Civ. Code Prac. § 429, authorizing the court to order a sale of real property for the payment of debts, if it appears to the satisfaction of the court that the personal estate is insufficient, the real property may be sold where the pleadings alleged without contradiction that decedent's debts were greater than the value of his estate, though there was no reference to a commissioner, or report of the necessity of sale; since, where the rights of infants are not involved, a reference and report are not essential to the validity of the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1434-1437; Dec. Dig. § 341.*]

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 356*)—
SALE—CONTEST OF CLAIMS.

A suit by administrators to sell land to satisfy debts was consolidated with a suit by creditors to have certain mortgages, alleged to be preferences, declared an assignment for the benefit of creditors. Several of the lawyers in the case resided in another county, and the alleged preferences were numerous so that it would have taken a long time to adjudicate them, and in the meantime the assets of the estate would have been diminished. The sale was attacked on the ground that, until the determination of the alleged preferences, the lienholders would not know how much to bid on the land in case of sale. Held, while the rights of the various lienholders should be first determined, where it could be done without prejudicing the estate, the trial court had a large discretion in the matter, and, under the circumstances, the sale was properly made before determining the rights of creditors and lienholders.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Dec. Dig. § 356.*]

6. MORTGAGES (§ 398*)—RIGHT TO FORECLOSE —MATURITY OF DEBT—DEFAULT IN INTER-EST.

Where a mortgage contained an absolute provision that, if any interest remained due and unpaid for 30 days, the whole debt should become due, the entire debt and interest became due without any action by the mortgagee on the failure to pay the interest for that period.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1163; Dec. Dig. § 398.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fleming County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Robert Marshall's administrators against the Union Trust & Savings Company and others for a settlement of the estate, and to have the property sold to pay debts. From a judgment for plaintiffs, one of defendants appeals. Affirmed.

Worthington & Cochran and Garrett S. Wall, for appellant. B. S. Grannis, for appellees.

CLAY, C. R. T. Marshall died on May 7, 1907, in Fleming county, Ky., the owner of a large estate, consisting of personal property and 710 acres of land which he owned in fee simple and the remainder interest in 400 acres, subject to the life estate of his mother, who was then a very old woman. His will was probated on May 27, 1907. On May 29, 1907, L. M. Marshall and John Marshall, appellees herein, qualified as his administrators, and on June 26th they instituted this action in the Fleming circuit court for a settlement of his estate. To this action the widow and children of R. T. Marshall, the husband and children of Eliza C. Ambler, the appellant Union Trust & Savings Company, which held a mortgage on the land involved in the sum of $40,000, and other lienholders and creditors, were made parties defendant. The petition, after setting out a great many of the debts of the decedent, R. T. Marshall, charged that he at the time of his death was wholly insolvent; that his debts amounted to $90,000 or more; that his estate, real and personal, including some $13,500 life insurance, payable to his estate, did not amount to more than $70,000; that his wife, Rebekah Marshall, had renounced the provisions of the will, and asked that she be allowed her rights under the law; that it was necessary to make a sale of all the personal estate of R. T. Marshall and of all the real estate of said R. T. Marshall subject to the rights of his wife, Rebekah Marshall, and his mother, Jane Marshall. These allegations of the petition were not denied. On July 8, 1907, J. P. Taylor and others, creditors of R. T. Marshall, filed their suit under the act of 1856, by which they sought to have the $40,000 mortgage executed to appellant Union Trust & Savings Company and a number of other alleged acts of preference committed by R. T. Marshall within six months just prior to his death declared to operate as an assignment for the benefit of all his creditors. Thereafter these two suits were consolidated. On February 1st the circuit court ordered all of decedent's land to be sold in the month of June, 1908. From that judgment, the Union Trust & Savings Company prosecute this appeal.

It is insisted by appellant that the sale was premature because numerous nonresidents and infant defendants were not before the court. Counsel for appellant, however, have failed to point out what necessary parties were not before the court. If there was a single party required by the Code to be made a defendant who was not before the court, either by summons or warning order, the name of such party should have been stated by counsel. Notwithstanding this fact, however, we have examined the record, and are of opinion that all the necessary parties were before the court at the time of the entry of the judgment.

It is next insisted that certain parties did not file their answers and set up their lien claims at the time the judgment was entered. This, we think, was unnecessary. The petition did make the lienholders parties, and set up their liens. Under this condition of the record a sale could be ordered, although such lienholders could not withdraw or receive any of the proceeds of the sale until they had shown their right thereto by answer and cross-petition. Section 692, Civ. Code Prac.

The further objection is made that Abner Clary filed a claim on May 13, 1908, against the one-third interest of the Amblers in the 400 acres of the Marshall land. It appears, however, that Clary was not asserting a lien on the interest of the Amblers in the 400 acres of land, but was setting up only a general claim against the Ambler estate and the fund coming to them.

The next objection is that Marshall did not own the one-third interest of his sister, Mrs. Ambler, in the 400 acres occupied by his mother for life, and that the sale was therefore improper. The record discloses the fact that by the will of Charles Marshall, the father of R. T. Marshall, he gave his wife, Jane Marshall, 400 acres of land for life, with remainder in equal parts to R. T. Marshall, Sallie D. Taylor, and Eliza C. Ambler. He further provided, however, that R. T. Marshall should have the option to buy the interests of Eliza C. Ambler and Sallie D. Taylor in the 400 acres of land at the price of $4,000 each, and that he should have four years from the death of his mother, Jane Marshall, within which to exercise the option. R. T. Marshall, by his will, elected to exercise the option and to purchase the interest of Eliza C. Ambler in said 400 acres of land, and pay her therefor the price fixed by his father's will. At the time of filing the petition Eliza C. Ambler was dead, leaving several infant children. The administrators of R. T. Marshall, therefore, asked that the election of R. T. Marshall to take said interest in said 400 acres of land and pay therefor the sum of $4,000 out of his estate be carried into effect, and Mrs. Ambler's husband and children were all made defendants for the purpose of carrying out that election, and passing title from them to the purchasers of the land. Manifestly, under these circumstances, it would be unnecessary first to institute judicial proceedings for the purpose of investing the interest of the Amblers in the representative of R. T. Marshall, and then afterwards institute another suit for the purpose of having the interest so vested sold for the purpose of paying his debts. With the necessary parties before the court the whole arrangement could be perfected in one suit and the purchaser get a clear title to the property purchased. This is exactly what the administrators sought to have done, and we cannot see how appellant or any one else was prejudiced by ordering a sale of the land in question under these circumstances.

Counsel further insist that there was no report on claims against the estate, and it did not appear that it was necessary to sell the real estate. The pleadings allege, however, and it is not denied, that decedent was in debt for more than $90,000, and that all of his estate amounted to about $70,000. Under these circumstances, the court had a right to order a sale of the land in question; for it is well settled that in cases where the rights of infants are not involved a reference to the commissioner is not indispensable to the validity of a judgment directing a sale of the real estate of a decedent, nor need it always precede the judgment. Section 429, Civ. Code Prac., authorizes the court to order the real property to be sold for the payment of the residue of the debts, if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the court that the personal estate is insufficient for payment of all the debts, no matter whether it appears from the report of the commissioner or from the pleadings. Harlammert, etc., v. Moody's Adm'r, 26 S. W. 2, 15 Ky. Law Rep. 839.

Appellant's chief objection to the sale is based upon the fact that until the action attacking its mortgage and the other liens upon the land as preferences under the act of 1856 could be determined neither it nor any of the other lienholders would be in position to know how much to bid on the land in case of a sale. Of course, where it can be done without sacrificing the interest of the estate, it would be well to adjudicate the rights of the various lienholders; but in such matters the chancellor has a large discretion. His primary duty is to conserve the interests of all the lienholders, of all the creditors, and of all the parties in any wise interested in the estate. Very frequently an action involving a preference is long drawn out. In this case, where several of the lawyers do not reside in the county where the action was brought, and the action involved many acts of alleged preference, it would have doubtless taken a long time to adjudicate the rights of the parties. In the meantime the assets of the estate would certainly not have increased; on the other hand, the debts bearing interest would have vastly increased. Under the circumstances, the circuit court must have been of the opinion that it was better for the interests of all concerned that the sale should take place at the earliest possible moment, rather than that it should be postponed because appellant would not know how much to bid on the land.

Another point raised by counsel is that appellant's debt was not due, and that a sale could not be ordered until it was due. It appears, however, that there was a provision in the mortgage to the effect that, if any interest remained unpaid for a period of 30 days, the whole debt should become due and collectible. The provision did not contain the usual words, "shall become due and collectible at the option of the mortgagee." The language is absolute, and we conclude as a matter of fact that there is no merit in appellant's contention that its debt and interest were not due.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

COMMONWEALTH v. WEST.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Oct. 28, 1908.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 194*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—THREATS.

W. had been convicted of a criminal assault, and while serving sentence therefor asserted that when he got out he would kill all instrumental in his conviction, and, after his release, he shot the brother of the assaulted woman, and a special deputy was appointed to arrest him, the deputy summoning accused and another as a posse to aid him, and in making the arrest accused shot deceased, thinking he was W. Held, in a prosecution for the shooting, that, since the posse would be justified in arresting W. if they had reasonable grounds to believe he had committed a felony, his declaration while in prison that he intended to kill the family that caused his conviction was admissible to show that the shooting for which accused attempted to arrest W. was felonious, so as to justify the attempted arrest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 417-419; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 194*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—CHARACTER OF DECEASED.

W.'s statements while in prison were also admissible in connection with his subsequent execution of his threats to show his dangerous character, and accused's peril in attempting to arrest him, as defendants were justified in shooting more quickly in attempting to arrest such a man than if he were less dangerous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 417-419; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 814*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where the undisputed evidence showed that accused alone killed deceased, it was error to instruct as to his responsibility in aiding and abetting others in the killing, though the indictment contained counts charging accused with aiding and abetting others in committing the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1979, 1985; Dec. Dig. § 814.*]

4. ARREST (§ 65*)—CRIMINAL CHARGES—AUTHORITY UNDER WARRANT—PEACE OFFICERS.

Where a justice of the peace appointed one as a special bailiff to execute a warrant for a homicide not committed in his presence, and the one appointed selected a posse to aid him, the warrant and appointment would not authorize the posse to make the arrest, they not being peace officers, since under the direct provisions of Cr. Code Prac. §§ 37, 38, a private person may make an arrest only where he has reasonable ground to believe a felony has been committed, and the felon is at large, or where he is ordered by a magistrate to arrest one committing a public offense in the magistrate's presence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arrest, Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

5. HOMICIDE (§ 105*)—CRIMINAL CHARGE—FORCE NECESSARY.

One authorized to make an arrest for felony could use such force as reasonably appeared to be necessary, even to the extent of taking life.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 135; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

6. HOMICIDE (§ 184*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—MOTIVE.

In a prosecution for a homicide committed while attempting to make an arrest under a warrant, though the warrant under which the arrest was attempted to be made and the indorsement thereon did not authorize the arrest, the warrant, indorsement, and the acts done under it were admissible, in connection with the other evidence, to show the motive prompting accused's conduct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 388; Dec. Dig. § 184.*]

7. ARREST (§ 68*)—CRIMINAL CHARGE—MODE OF MAKING ARREST.

One making an arrest on a criminal charge should inform the person arrested, if there was reasonable opportunity to do so, of his intention to make the arrest, and of the offense charged, unless these facts were already known to the person arrested.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arrest, Cent. Dig. § 168; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

8. HOMICIDE (§ 116*)—TRIAL—SELF-DEFENSE.

In a prosecution for homicide for killing a person who was with W., whom defendants were attempting to arrest for a felony, if W. did not have reasonable ground to believe that defendants intended to kill him, or do him great bodily harm, but himself first attempted to kill defendants, or any of them, or do them great bodily harm, and one of defendants believed and had reasonable ground to believe that he or the other defendants were in danger of death, or great bodily harm, and it appeared necessary to kill W. to avert such peril, and W.'s companion was killed, defendant believing, and having reasonable ground to believe, that he was shooting at W., he was justified on the ground of self-defense, but if defendant did not have reasonable ground to believe that himself or the other defendants were in danger, and himself first assaulted W. so as to endanger the latter's life or person, and in so doing made the danger to himself, if any, necessary or excusable on the part of W., defendant was not excusable on the ground of self-defense.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Laurel County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Dempsey West was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and the commonwealth appealed to have certain rulings settled and certified. Rulings certified as stated.

Jas. Breathitt, Atty. Gen., Tom B. McGregor, Asst. Atty. Gen., and Wm. Lewis, for the Commonwealth.

BARKER, J. The commonwealth of Kentucky has appealed in this case, complaining that the law was not properly ruled in several particulars upon the trial in the court below; and it now asks that the questions mooted by it be adjudicated and certified to the circuit court.

The appellee, Dempsey West, was indicted by the grand jury of Whitley county on the 13th day of November, 1906, together with Samuel Lewis and John W. Johnson, charged with the willful murder of Esrom Lawson. The venue of the action on motion was transferred from Whitley to Laurel county. When the case was called for trial, Dempsey West demanded a separate trial, which was granted by the court, and the commonwealth elected to try him first. The trial resulted in a verdict of guilty of the crime of voluntary manslaughter, and the punishment of the defendant fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for two years. From this judgment West did not prosecute an appeal, and, as said before, the commonwealth has appealed for the purpose of having certain principles of law arising during the trial settled and certified. A short history of the facts which led up to the killing involved in this prosecution will be necessary.

In 1897 one "General" Williams was charged with and indicted for the crime of criminal assault upon a female of the Bays family in Knox county. This prosecution resulted in his being found guilty and sentenced to the penitentiary for a period of 10 years, which term he seems to have served out. While in the penitentiary in Frankfort he was so violent as to lead the officers in charge of him to doubt his sanity, and he was tried in the Franklin county court on an inquisition of lunacy. The verdict of the jury found him sane, and he was returned to prison. During the trial in the Franklin county court Williams openly stated that when his time was out, and he returned home, he intended to kill all who had any part in sending him to the penitentiary. As soon as his term expired, and he returned to his home in Knox county, he armed himself with a Winchester rifle, and went to Corbin, looking for J. W. Bays, the father of the girl he had wronged, evidently with the intention of assassinating him. Being unsuccessful in his search for the father at Corbin, he came by the Bays' home, and found Levi Bays, the brother of the wronged girl, standing in the yard. He called to Levi to come to him, saying that he desired to converse with him, and when the young man approached, without any provocation on the latter's part, Williams shot him with the Winchester rifle, the ball entering his arm just below the shoulder, having done which, and perhaps supposing his victim dead, he proceeded on his way into the mountains. This high-handed crime naturally excited the neighborhood, and W. H. Burch, a justice of the peace in the district where it occurred, issued a warrant for the arrest of Williams, charging him with the offence of shooting with intent to kill. There being no regular peace officer convenient, Samuel Lewis was appointed by the justice as special bailiff to execute the warrant, and he summoned Dempsey West and John W. Johnson as a posse to aid him in making the arrest. Armed with the warrant, these three started in search of Williams. They followed him for several hours, and finally received information that he was at the house of his aunt, Mrs. Margaret Lawson, in Whitley county, Ky. Having thus located the defendant in the warrant, the posse took counsel among themselves as to the best way to arrest the desperate man for whom they were looking. It was agreed that, as Lewis was the only one of the posse whom Williams did not know, he should go into the house of Mrs. Lawson, and ascertain certainly whether or not Williams was located therein. If Lewis did not return within 10 minutes, his companions were to understand that Williams was in the house, and to at once come forward and aid in his arrest. The Lawson house was situated near the junction of two county roads, and Williams had placed himself in a window from which he could observe the approach of persons on either to the house. His Winchester rifle was lying conveniently on a bed at his side. Lewis, who was a stranger, went to the house, and asked for a drink of water, and engaged the inmates in conversation, inquiring where he could find or purchase some "yoke cattle" which he pretended he wished to buy. At the expiration of the appointed time, Dempsey West and John W. Johnson approached the house from different sides. At this point the evidence for the commonwealth and that for the defendants diverges. The commonwealth's evidence tended to show that, as soon as West and Johnson arrived at the house, Lewis, without warning or demand for the surrender of Williams, opened fire upon him with a pistol, and while he was shooting at him from one direction Johnson was also shooting at him through a door and from another direction, with the result that Williams was shot through the body some seven or eight times, and almost instantly killed; that, when the shooting commenced, Esrom Lawson and the other inmates of the house fled from it; that Lawson ran out of a door in or near which Dempsey West was standing with a double-barrel shotgun in his hand, and that thereupon West fired upon Lawson, shooting him through the back or side, and instantly killing him. The defendants' evidence was that, as soon as Williams saw Johnson and West approaching the house, he sprang to his gun for the purpose of killing his would-be captors; that thereupon, and in order to save his own life, Lewis opened fire upon him, as did also Johnson, with the result that Williams was almost instantly killed. The testimony of the defendants also tends to show that the reason Williams did not succeed in shooting or shooting at the posse was that, for some unexplained cause, the mechanism of his gun could not be made to work, or, in the language of the witnesses, "his gun hung up on him." Dempsey West in his own behalf testified that, when he approached one of the doors of the Lawson house, he heard a hurried shuffling of feet, and instantly a fusillade of pistol shots were fired within, and he heard also a voice which he took to be Lewis' crying, "Halt! Halt!" and that at this juncture the door was thrown open, and a man whom he thought was Williams sprang out, and with him came a volume of powder smoke which had been confined in the room before the door was opened; that believing the man who sprang out of the door to be Williams, and that he had killed Lewis and was coming to kill him, he raised his gun and fired, with the result that Esrom Lawson fell dead at his feet; that he did not know Lawson at all, did not know he was in the house, and had no desire or motive to injure him in any way; that he believed it was Williams whom he had shot, and did not find out that it was Lawson for some little time afterwards. The three men composing the posse at once sought the sheriff of Whitley county, and surrendered themselves. They were afterwards indicted, with the result above mentioned.

The commonwealth challenges the competency of the testimony of the officers in Franklin county as to the declarations made by Williams that, when he had served his time in the penitentiary, he intended to return home and kill all the persons who had been instrumental in securing his conviction. We think this evidence was competent. The trial court, as we shall hereafter show, correctly ruled that the warrant, and the appointment of Lewis as special bailiff to execute it, did not justify the posse in making the arrest, but that they were authorized, if they had reasonable grounds to believe a felony had been committed and the felon was at large, to arrest him without a warrant. The declaration of Williams that he intended to kill the members of the Bays family who prosecuted him when he returned home was competent to show that the shooting of Levi Bays was felonious; and it was also competent to show that Williams was a bloody-minded and desperate man, and the necessity on the part of the posse to be on their guard when they undertook to arrest him. In other words, the defendants were entitled to have the jury thoroughly understand the danger of their situation in undertaking to arrest Williams; and his declarations to murder, made in Frankfort, coupled with what he did when he returned home, were all calculated to establish his desperate, dangerous, and lawless character. The defendants were justified in shooting much more quickly in dealing with a man of the character of "General" Williams than they would have been in undertaking to arrest a less ferocious man. Therefore all the evidence of his declarations as to what he intended to do to the Bays family, in the light of what afterwards happened, was competent.

We think the court erred in the instructions in so far as they relate to Dempsey West having aided and abetted Lewis or Johnson in killing Esrom Lawson. In form the instructions on this subject are not open to criticism; but there was no evidence which justified their being given. The indictment, it is true, consisted of several counts, in some of which West is charged with having aided and abetted Lewis and Johnson in killing Lawson; but the evidence, without any contrariety or contradiction, showed that West alone killed Lawson. He testified to this fact himself, and all of the eyewitnesses, both for the commonwealth and for the defendants, corroborated him on this point. This being true, the court should have omitted all reference to the defendant as being an aider or abettor of Lewis or Johnson, and confined its instructions alone to the principles of law arising from the evidence that West alone killed Lawson.

The most insistent complaint that the commonwealth makes as to the instructions is in the giving of No. 6, which is as follows: "Neither the warrant of arrest issued by the Magistrate Burch for the arrest of General Williams, nor the indorsement thereon, admitted in evidence, gave authority to defendants or to either of them to arrest said Williams, and the evidence as to the issuance of said warrant, the indorsement thereon, and all that was done under it may be considered in connection with the other evidence to throw light on, and to illustrate, the situation of the parties and the motive prompting their conduct. But if defendants had reasonable grounds to believe that said Williams had committed a felony in Knox county, Ky., and had not been arrested therefor, defendants had the right to arrest him therefor, and to use such force as reasonably appeared to them to be necessary to accomplish the arrest. But in making the arrest it was the duty of the defendants or one of them to first inform Williams, if he gave them a reasonable opportunity to do so, of the intention to arrest him and of the offense charged against him, unless he already knew of such intention and charge. If he already knew of said intention to arrest him and the charge against him, it was his duty to peaceably submit to arrest. And if you believe, from the evidence, that defendants went to the house where the said Esrom Lawson was killed, not intending to kill him or said Williams, or to do them or either of them any great bodily harm, but only to arrest the said Williams, and at a time when defendants had reasonable grounds to believe that said Williams had committed a felony and had not been arrested therefor, and that said Williams did not have reasonable grounds to believe that defendants or any one or more of them intended to kill him or to do him some great bodily harm, but that he then and there first attempted to kill defendants or one of them, or to do them or one of them, some great bodily harm, and defendant West believed and had reasonable grounds to believe he was or the defendants Lewis and Johnson were, or one of them was, then and there, in danger of death or of the infliction of some great bodily harm at the hands of the said Williams, or the said Esrom Lawson, or any person acting at the time with them or with either of them, and that to shoot at and kill Williams was necessary, or appeared to the defendant, in the exercise of a reasonable judgment, to be necessary, in order to avert said danger, either real or to the defendant apparent, and in such shooting by defendant West, if he did shoot he believed in good faith and had reasonable grounds to believe he was shooting at said Williams and said Lawson, was thereby killed, you ought to find the defendant not guilty on the ground of self-defense and apparent necessity, or the defense of another or apparent necessity. On the other hand, if you shall believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant West did not believe and did not have reasonable grounds to believe that his life or person, or the life or person of the defendants Lewis and Johnson, or one of them, was in danger at the hands of Williams or said Lawson or any person acting with them or either of them, but that said West first willfully and feloniously, or that said Lewis and Johnson, or one of them, first willfully and feloniously assaulted said Williams with a deadly weapon, placing his life in danger, or his person, of some great bodily harm, and that defendant West willfully and feloniously aided, assisted, advised, abetted, counseled, or encouraged the said Lewis and Johnson, or either of them, to so willfully and feloniously assault said Williams with a deadly weapon, and, in doing so, defendant or the said Lewis and Johnson made the harm or danger to himself or themselves, if any there was, necessary or excusable on the part of Williams or said Lawson in his own necessary or reasonably apparent necessary self-defense, you should not in that event excuse defendant on the ground of self-defense." The foregoing instruction certainly does not err in favor of the defendant or against the commonwealth. In it the court correctly told the jury that neither the warrant of arrest issued by the justice nor the indorsement thereon gave authority to the defendants to arrest Williams. None of the posse were peace officers, and the only occasion upon which private persons are justified in undertaking an arrest is where they have reasonable grounds to believe that a felony has been committed and the felon is at large; or where they are ordered by a magistrate or judge to arrest a person committing a public offense in the magistrate's or judge's presence. Sections 37, 38, Cr. Code Prac.; Wright v. Commonwealth, 85 Ky. 123, 2 S. W. 904; Begley v. Commonwealth, 60 S. W. 847, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 1546; Bates v. Commonwealth, 16 S. W. 528, 13 Ky. Law Rep. 132; Salisbury v. Commonwealth, 79 Ky. 425. The court also properly told the jury that, if the defendants had reasonable grounds to believe that Williams had committed a felony and was at large, they had a right to arrest him therefor without a warrant, and to use such force as reasonably appeared to them to be necessary to accomplish the arrest; and it might have been added with propriety that the force used, if necessary, might be extended even to the taking of the defendant's life. Reed v. Commonwealth, 100 S. W. 856, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 1212, and the authorities therein cited. Without further analysis of the instruction complained of, we deem it sufficient to say that, with the suggestion above made, it fairly states the principles of law to which it is directed, and, as said before, certainly does not err in favor of the defendant.

The other instructions of the court are not complained of by the commonwealth, and, except as corrected in this opinion, are not subject to criticism, all of which is certified.

WOODS et al. v. WOODS' ADM'R.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Oct. 30, 1908.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 212*) — ASSIGNMENT — CONTRACT—PARTIES—MENTAL CAPACITY.

Evidence held to show that insured was mentally capable of contracting with her sons to pay the premiums on her life policy and take the proceeds at her death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 481; Dec. Dig. § 212.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 116*)—LIFE INSURANCE—INSURABLE INTEREST—PARENT AND CHILD.

The relationship between parent and child is itself sufficient to give either an insurable interest in the life of the other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 159; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 122*) — LIFE INSURANCE — CONTRACT WITH STRANGER TO PAY PREMIUMS.

Where a mother contracted with her sons to pay premiums on her life policy and take the proceeds at her death, an agreement between the sons and a nephew of insured, who had no insurable interest, that he should furnish one-third of the premiums and have one-third of the proceeds of the policy did not affect the validity of the policy or affect the sons' interest therein.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Shelby County.

"To be officially reported."

Petition by H. C. Riner, administrator of Sarah E. Woods for advice as to the distribution of the proceeds of her life policy, to which Joe Woods and another filed a counterclaim and cross-petition. From a judgment awarding cross-petitioners insufficient relief, they appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

P. J. Beard, for appellants. Gilbert & Gilbert and J. C. Beckham & Son, for appellees.

CLAY, C. Sarah E. Woods died intestate on the 14th of March, 1907, leaving as her heirs at law the appellants, Joe Woods and Sam Woods, and the appellees, Oad Woods, Arthur Woods, Mary Woods, and others. In the year 1901 she had her life insured in the Equitable Life Assurance Society in the sum of $10,000. At the time she obtained the policy of insurance she entered into a contract with appellants, Joe Woods and Sam Woods, by which it was agreed that they should pay the insurance premiums on the policy, and in consideration thereof they should be entitled to the proceeds at her death. At the same time they entered into an agreement with George T. Woods, a nephew of Sarah E. Woods, by which he agreed to furnish appellants one-third of the premiums due on the policy, and in consideration thereof was to share in one-third of the proceeds. Upon the death of Sarah E. Woods the Equitable Life Assurance Society paid the $10,000 to H. C. Riner, who had qualified as her administrator. He instituted this action in the Shelby circuit court for the purpose of obtaining the advice and direction of the court as to how the fund should be distributed and to whom paid. To this petition Joe Woods and Sam Woods by answer, counterclaim, and cross-petition set up the agreement above referred to, alleged that they had paid the annual premium of $579.50 for the years 1900, 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, and 1906, and asserted claim to the entire proceeds of the policy of $10,000. To this a reply was filed by the other heirs, the appellees herein, in which they claimed that the agreement between appellants and their mother was procured by fraud, that she was not mentally capable of entering into an agreement, and that appellants had no insurable interest in the life of their mother. On submission of the case the trial court rendered an opinion and judgment based thereon, by which it was held that the policy was issued on the life of Sarah E. Woods, payable by its terms at her death to her estate; that a written contract was entered into between her and two of her sons, the appellants, by which they were to pay the yearly premiums, and be the beneficiaries of the policy; that these sons made an agreement with George T. Woods, by which he was to receive one-third of the proceeds of the policy, upon paying to them one-third of the premiums; that the premiums were all paid by the appellants; that George T. Woods, and his administrator after his death, paid to the appellants one-third of the premiums. The court then directed that the administrator pay to the appellants the premiums paid by them on the policy, with interest thereon from the dates of the respective payments until paid; that the balance of the $10,000 was a part of the estate of Sarah E. Woods, and was ordered to be held and so accounted for by the administrator. From the judgment so entered, this appeal is prosecuted.

The trial court seems to have disregarded the plea of fraud and of mental incapacity, and we think properly so. The evidence in this case conduces to show that Sarah E. Woods was a woman of fine common sense, and that she knew how to attend to and manage her own affairs. When she took out the policy she understood perfectly well the nature of the contract which she had made with appellants. There is also evidence to the effect that the same privilege, of taking out insurance on her life, was accorded to her other children, but that they failed to avail themselves of it. All along they knew of the existence of the policy in question and of the fact that appellants were paying the premiums thereon in pursuance of the contract by the terms of which they expected to secure the proceeds. However, the trial court held that appellants, who were the sons of Sarah E. Woods, had no insurable interest in the life of their mother. The court seems to have proceeded upon the idea that some other element, such as that of support or a pecuniary interest in the life of the mother, was necessary in addition to the relationship which existed between the mother and her sons. Appellees below seem to have relied, and the court itself appears to have based, its opinion upon the doctrine laid down in the case of Life Insurance Company v. O'Neill, 106 Fed. 800, 45 C. C. A. 641, 54 L. R. A. 225. In that case it was decided by the Circuit Court of Appeals that "an adult son has not, from the bare fact of relationship, an insurable interest in the life of his father." This case followed the English doctrine. The latter doctrine, however, was based upon the statute 14 Geo. III, c. 48, which provided that, to support insurance on the life of another, there must have been a pecuniary interest on the part of the insured in the life of the assured, and the interest ordinarily growing out of relationship or consanguinity is not alone sufficient. Although having no similar statute, the courts of several states have adopted the English doctrine. With all due deference to the courts thus holding, we are of the opinion that the rule announced by them does not accord with the weight of authority, and is not based upon sound reasoning.

In the recent case of Hess' Adm'r v. Segenfelder, etc., 105 S. W. 476, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 225, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1172, this court, in discussing the question of insurable interest, said: "It has been held a son has an insurable interest in the life of his father (Reserve Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Kane, 81 Pa. 154, 22 Am. Rep. 741); a father has an insurable interest in the life of his child (Williams v. Washington Life Ins. Co., 31 Iowa, 541); sisters and brothers have an insurable interest in the life of each other (May on Insurance, § 107); a wife has an insurable interest in the life of her husband, and a husband in the life of his wife (Currier v. Continental Life Ins. Co., 57 Vt. 496, 52 Am. Rep. 134; Ky. St. 1903, § 654); a person dependent upon the life of another has an insurable interest in that life (Lord v. Dall, 12 Mass. 115, 7 Am. Dec. 38); a granddaughter has not an insurable interest in the life of her grandfather, nor has a nephew, as such, an insurable interest in the life of an aunt, nor a son-in-law an insurable interest in the life of his mother-in-law (May on Insurance, § 107). In Singleton v. St. Louis Ins. Co., 66 Mo. 63, 27 Am. Rep. 321, an uncle was held not to have an insurable interest in the life of his nephew. In Burton v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., 119 Ind. 207, 21 N. E. 746, 12 Am. St. Rep. 405, the court held that a grandchild had no insurable interest in the life of his grandfather. A stepson has no insurable interest in the life of his stepfather, where he has a separate home and family of his own. United Brethren Mutual Aid Society v. McDonald, 122 Pa. 324, 15 Atl. 439, 1 L. R. A. 238, 9 Am. St. Rep. 111. "These authorities illustrate the limitations that have been placed on insurable interest, and the extent to which the courts have gone in an effort to prevent wagering and speculative contracts of insurance. Although an examination of them will show various reasons for the conclusion reached, it may safely be said that the relationship of creditor and debtor must exist, or that the beneficiary must have or expect some pecuniary relief, benefit, or advantage from the continuance of the life of the insured, or the relationship growing out of ties of blood or marriage must be so close as to justify the well-founded belief that loss or disadvantage would naturally and probably arise to the party in whose favor the policy is written from the death of the person whose life is insured. Generally, the courts have endeavored to make insurable interest dependent on the question that pecuniary loss would presumably result to the beneficiary from the death of the insured; but, where the relationship, as in the case of husband and wife, parent and child, sister and brother, is so close as to preclude the probability that mercenary motives would induce the sacrifice of life to gain the insurance, the element of pecuniary consideration is not deemed essential to sustain the validity of the policy."

Prior to the above opinion the doctrine that a son had an insurable interest in the life of his parent was recognized in Beard v. Sharp, 100 Ky. 606, 38 S. W. 1057. In Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 779, 26 L. Ed. 926, the rule is thus stated: "It is not necessary that the expectation of advantage or benefit should be always capable of pecuniary estimation; for a parent has an insurable interest in the life of his child, and a child in the life of his parent, a husband in the life of his wife, and a wife in the life of her husband. The natural affection in cases of this kind is considered as more powerful—as operating more efficaciously—to protect the life of the insured than any other consideration." In 25 Cyc. p. 704, the doctrine is thus laid down: "It has sometimes been said in definite terms that the relationship of parent and child, without right or liability as to support, and without other direct pecuniary interest, is not sufficient to sustain a policy taken by one on the life of the other. But a more liberal rule seems to be supported by many authorities, in accordance with which such relationship is sufficient in itself to show such interest as will support a policy by the one on the life of the other." Among the cases recognizing this doctrine may be cited the following: Valley Mutual Life Association v. Teewalt, 79 Va. 423; Reserve Mutual Insurance Co. v. Kane, 81 Pa. 154, 22 Am. Rep. 741; Equitable Life Insurance Co. v. Hazelwood, 75 Tex. 338, 12 S. W. 621, 7 L. R. A. 217, 16 Am. St. Rep. 893; Tucker v. Mutual Benefit Life Co., 121 N. Y. 718, 24 N. E. 1102; Trenton Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Johnson, 24 N. J. Law, 576; Hilliard v. Sandford, 4 Ohio N. P. 363.

In speaking of the duties due from children to their parents, Blackstone (1 Lewis' Ed. p. 428) says: "The duties of children to their parents arise from a principle of natural justice and retribution; for to those who gave us existence we naturally owe subjection and obedience during our minority, and honor and reverence ever after. They who protected the weakness of our infancy are entitled to our protection in the infirmity ty of their age. They who by sustenance and education have enabled the offspring to prosper ought in return to be supported by that offspring in case they stand in need of assistance. Upon this principle proceed all the duties of children to their parents, which are enjoined by positive laws." It may be safely said that no relationship in life, arising from ties of blood, is more sacred or more binding than that of parent and child. As the mother looks into the eyes of her child and uses every effort to guard it from harm and prolong its life, so the child as maturity comes raises a strong arm to protect her in her old age, and looks with fear to the time when she will be taken away. Thus every common instinct, to say nothing of love and affection, makes each interested in the long life of the other. With such a tie uniting parent and child, we cannot accede to the doctrine that some pecuniary loss or disadvantage must result to the son from the death of his mother in order that he may be interested in the continuation of her life. We, therefore, conclude that the relationship between parent and child is of itself sufficient to give either an insurable interest in the life of the other, and that no other element is required.

Nor do we think the fact that appellants entered into a contract with George T. Woods, by which he was to furnish one-third of the premiums and to share in one-third of the proceeds of the policy, had the effect of invalidating the policy so far as the appellants are concerned. This precise question was before this court in the case of Beard v. Sharp, supra. There the son had for a number of years paid the premium on the policy of insurance on the life of his mother issued for his benefit. After paying several premiums he caused a new certificate to be issued, making himself and a stranger joint beneficiaries, the stranger agreeing to pay the premiums. This court held that the son was entitled to the whole amount of the proceeds of the policy, less the premiums paid by the stranger, with the interest thereon, and further held that the insurance was not invalidated by the designation of a person prohibited by law from being a beneficiary. Indeed, it may be said to be the general rule that a contract of insurance is not invalidated by the designation of a person prohibited by law to be a beneficiary. Caudell v. Woodward, 96 Ky. 646, 29 S. W. 614; Weigelman v. Bronger, 96 Ky. 132, 28 S. W. 334; Warnock v. Davis, 104 U. S. 775, 26 L. Ed. 924.

Being of the opinion that Sarah E. Woods was mentally capable of contracting, and that no fraud was practiced, either upon her or appellees herein, in securing the contract of insurance, that the subsequent contract made by appellants with George T. Woods did not affect the validity of the policy, or appellant's interest therein, and that the relationship existing between appellants and their mother was sufficient, in and of itself, to give them an insurable interest in her life, we therefore conclude that appellants are entitled to the whole proceeds of the policy.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment in conformity with this opinion.

McFARLAND'S ADM'R v. LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Oct. 30, 1908.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 29*)—APPOINTMENT OF ADMINISTRATOR—VALIDITY.

Under Ky. St. 1903, §§ 3896, 3897, requiring the granting of administration to relations of decedent on their applying therefor, and authorizing the appointment of any other person where no application by relations is made within a specified time, the appointment of a stranger, made within the time relations might apply for their appointment, is not void, but voidable only.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 29*)—REMOVAL OF ADMINISTRATOR—VALIDITY OF PRIOR ACTS—STATUTES.

Under Ky. St. 1903, § 3848, providing that lawful acts by an administrator subsequently removed shall remain valid and independent thereof, the lawful acts of an administrator holding under a voidable appointment are valid notwithstanding his subsequent removal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 177; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 29*)—CLAIMS IN FAVOR OF ESTATE—COMPROMISE—VALIDITY.

Under Ky. St. 1903, § 3882, authorizing a personal representative to compromise any claim for damages for the death of decedent, an administrator acting under a voidable appointment may compromise a claim for decedent's death.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Whitley County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Gillis McFarland's administrator against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Johnson & Snyder, R. S. Rose, and T. Z. Morrow, for appellant. Benjamin D. Warfield and Charles H. Moorman, for appellee.

CLAY, C. This is an action by W. W. McFarland, as administrator of Gillis McFarland, deceased, for damages for personal injuries resulting in the death of the latter.

Among other defenses the appellee, Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, pleaded that at the time of his death the decedent, Gillis McFarland, was a resident of Whitley county, Ky., and died domiciled therein; that thereafter, on the 15th day of August, 1904, the Whitley county court, at a term that day duly held, appointed Isabella McFarland administratrix of the estate of Gillis McFarland, deceased; that she accepted the appointment, and gave bond as required by law, and thereupon took the oath as required by law in such cases, and was granted by the court letters of administration on the estate of said Gillis McFarland; that thereafter, while she was acting as such administratrix, she instituted an action in the Whitley circuit court against the defendant for damages on account of the death of said Gillis McFarland; that while said action was still pending in that court, and she was still acting as administratrix, the cause of action was duly adjusted and compromised and settled between her and the defendant by a contract, by the terms of which she agreed to accept from the defendant the sum of $200 in full compromise and satisfaction of the cause of action so set out in the petition; that said sum was then and there paid to her by the defendant, and was accepted by her as such administratrix in full compromise, settlement, and satisfaction of her cause of action, and of any and all claim which the estate of Gillis McFarland had against the defendant for damages on account of his death; that the defendant pleaded and relied upon said settlement, compromise, and payment as a bar to this action. In reply to the above paragraph of the defendant's answer, the plaintiff admitted the residence of decedent, the qualification of Isabella McFarland as administratrix, and the settlement with said Isabella as alleged in the defendant's answer; but plaintiff alleged that the county court order appointing said

Isabella administratrix, as well as the order of that court qualifying her as such administratrix, was absolutely null and void, because said Isabella was not at the time of her appointment and qualification as such administratrix of said Gillis McFarland, or at the time of the settlement of the suit brought by her as administratrix of the estate of Gillis McFarland against the defendant, or at the time of the acceptance of the $200, the sum agreed on in said settlement, or at any other time, the surviving wife of said Gillis McFarland, nor was she in any wise related to him; nor was she next after such surviving wife, or in any wise or at all entitled to a distribution of his estate or any part of it. Plaintiff further alleged that the appointment and qualification of said Isabella McFarland as administratrix of said Gillis McFarland occurred within less than 60 days, and before the second county court in Whitley county, after the death of Gillis McFarland; that said county court was without jurisdiction to make said appointment, and the appointment was, for that reason, null and void; and being, for the reason stated, and also for the reason that said appointment was in fraud of the rights of Nola McFarland and the infant child of the decedent, Hannah McFarland, null and void, it conferred no rights on said Isabella to sue on, compromise, or settle any claim for or against the estate of the decedent with the defendant or any one else, or to administer any estate left by him in Whitley county or elsewhere. Plaintiff further pleaded that on the 17th day of September, 1897, at South McAlester, Ind. T., he, the said Gillis McFarland, was duly married to one Nola Morten, who thereupon became Nola McFarland, his lawful wife, and from whom he was never divorced, and that she, said Nola McFarland, was living at the time of the death of said Gillis McFarland, her husband; that, at the time of the death of Gillis McFarland, Nola McFarland was at Huntington, Ark., and had an infant child, Hannah McFarland, the issue of her marriage with Gillis McFarland, and as soon as she learned of the death of her husband, which was not until after the appointment of Isabella McFarland, and after the compromise pleaded by defendant, she came to Kentucky, and on the 12th day of July, 1905, appeared in the Whitley county court and moved said court to remove Isabella McFarland as administratrix, and for cause shown said Isabella was then removed, and said Nola then in writing waived her right to be appointed administratrix of her husband and requested that plaintiff, who is the father of the decedent, be appointed in her stead, which was done. By another paragraph in the reply plaintiff pleaded that all the foregoing facts were known to the defendant at the time of the settlement and payment of the money to Isabella McFarland, or that such knowledge was easily accessible to it. By rejoinder the defendant put in issue all the affirmative allegations of the reply, and further pleaded that many months before his death Gillis McFarland was united in marriage in Campbell county, Tenn., to Isabella Abbott; that within a few days thereafter they came to Whitley county, Ky., and took up their residence therein, and from that time until his death they continued to live together as husband and wife, and were so recognized by their relatives and neighbors; that, after his death, the said Isabella appeared in the Whitley county court, and moved the court that she be appointed as administratrix of the estate of said Gillis McFarland, deceased, and she was thereupon appointed by said court as such administratrix; that she accepted the appointment and duly qualified as such, and while the appointment was in full force she, as such administratrix, made with the defendant, in good faith, the compromise and settlement which is pleaded in the answer. Thereupon the plaintiff filed a demurrer to the above paragraph of the rejoinder. After consideration the court held that the demurrer should be carried back to paragraphs 2, 3, 4, and 5 of the reply, which attacked the validity of the compromise made by defendant with Isabella McFarland, the former administratrix, and also attempted to plead knowledge on the part of defendant of the facts connected with the appointment of Isabella McFarland. Appellant declining to plead further, his petition was dismissed, and he is here on appeal.

It is the contention of appellant that the damages that may be recovered for the death of a person are for the benefit of his widow and child; that this right to such damages cannot be defeated by a settlement with an administratrix not related to the decedent and who had no right to qualify; that the power of the court under sections 3896, 3897, Ky. St. 1903, to appoint a creditor or other person as administrator, applies only where the surviving husband or wife, or such others as are next entitled to distribution, fail to apply for administration at the second county court after the death of the intestate; that in this case the county court did not wait for the second term of the court, but appointed Isabella McFarland administratrix at a time when she had no power to qualify and he had no power to make the appointment, and the appointment was consequently void, and all her acts done in pursuance of said appointment were also void.

This question has been before this court, and it has been decided that an appointment made under such circumstances is not void, but only voidable. In the case of Spayd's Adm'r v. Brown, etc., 102 S. W. 823, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 438, this court said: "But, whilst the appointment of a creditor or other person before the expiration of the second county court day, after the death of the intestate is voidable, if any relative qualified to act applies at or before the second county court day, we do not conceive that the appointment of the creditor or other person would be absolutely void." The same doctrine is recognized in Buckner's Adm'r v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 120 Ky. 600, 87 S. W. 777; also in the case of Lavinia Estill Cunningham v. Estelle Clay's Adm'r, 112 S. W. 852, opinion rendered October 13, 1908. If the appointment of Isabella McFarland as administratrix of Gillis McFarland was not void, but only voidable, what, then, was the effect of her acts done while acting as administratrix? In 18 Cyc. p. 141, the doctrine is thus stated: "As a general rule, all acts by an executor or administrator done in the due and legal course of administration are valid and binding, even though the appointment is voidable and the letters issued by the court are afterward revoked or the incumbent discharged from his trust, and he will be protected in all lawful and bona fide acts done before revocation of his letters." In People v. Cole, 84 Ill. 327, it was held that the receipt of an administrator regularly appointed will bar any subsequent action for the recovery of the debt, notwithstanding irregularities may have intervened in the appointment of the administrator which would be fatal upon appeal or error. Chancellor Kent (2 Com. 413) says: "It is the received doctrine that all sales made in good faith, and all lawful acts done, either by administrators before notice of a will or by executors or administrators, who may be removed or superseded, or become incapable, shall remain valid, and not be impeached on any will appearing, or by any subsequent revocation." As if declaratory of the doctrine announced by Chancellor Kent, our Legislature enacted section 3848 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903, which is as follows: "Where an order of administration is set aside or letters of administration revoked, or where any executor or administrator shall be removed, or the will under which he acted shall be declared invalid, all previous sales of personal estate, made lawfully by the executor or administrator, and with good faith on the part of the purchaser, and all other lawful acts done by such executor or administrator, shall remain valid and effectual. But pending an action or procedure to set aside or reject the will there shall be no power to sell the land of the deceased, except under a judgment of court." Thus it will be seen that, not only by the weight of authority in other jurisdictions, but by express statute, it is provided that all lawful acts of an administrator, even though he may subsequently be removed, shall remain valid.

The only question remaining, then, is: Was the act of the former administratrix in making the compromise settlement one which she could lawfully perform while acting as such administratrix? Of this there can be no doubt, because section 3882 of the Kentucky Statutes expressly provides that a personal representative may compromise and settle any claim for damages growing out of injury to or the death of the decedent. As the appointment of Isabella McFarland as administratrix of Gillis McFarland was not void, but only voidable, and as the compromise which she effected with appellee was within her power as such administratrix, we therefore conclude that it was valid and binding on the estate of Gillis McFarland, even though Isabella McFarland was subsequently removed and appellant appointed in her stead. It therefore follows that the settlement made is a complete bar to any further recovery by appellant.

But counsel for appellant insist that the demurrer should not have been sustained to the reply, because of the plea that appellee had knowledge, or ought to have known, of the facts connected with the appointment of Isabella McFarland. It is a fundamental rule of pleading, however, that the language of a pleading must be construed most strictly against the pleader. Appellant pleads that the facts were well known to the defendant at the time of the settlement and payment of the money, "or that said knowledge was easily accessible to it." The fact that a person could learn of a thing is not equivalent to knowledge, especially where the facts alleged do not show that there was anything to put him upon notice. So far as the record shows, the woman who was actually living with the decedent as his wife had qualified as his administratrix. There was no circumstance connected with her appointment that would lead appellee to believe that the decedent had another wife and a child in a distant state. Of course, if appellant had pleaded and could have shown fraud and collusion on the part of appellee and the former administratrix, this would have been sufficient to prevent the compromise from being pleaded as a bar to recovery by appellant. McLemore, etc., v. Seebree Coal & Mining Co., etc., 121 Ky. 53, 88 S. W. 1062.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

FORSYTHE et al. v. SOUTHERN RY. IN KENTUCKY.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Oct. 30, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR — ERRONEOUS ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a suit to restrain a railroad company from obstructing a farm crossing, error in admitting the testimony of a witness that the owner in conveying the right of way had stated that it was not necessary that the deed should make any reference to the fact that the company should maintain farm crossings was not prejudicial to the company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4153; Dec. Dig. § 1050.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 129*)—RIGHT OF WAY—DUTY TO MAINTAIN FARM CROSSINGS.

A railway company purchased the property of another railway company without notice of a verbal contract between the latter company and an owner through whose land the road ran, which required the maintenance of farm crossings. There was nothing to put the company on notice. It obtained a deed from the owner for a right of way which was silent on the question of farm crossings, and there was no mistake in the execution of the deed. Held, that the company was not bound to maintain farm crossings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 401; Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 67*)—RIGHT OF WAY—CONVEYANCES—CONSIDERATION.

A deed conveying a railroad right of way which recites that the grantor conveys to the railroad company a railroad right of way in consideration of full payment of the purchase price, and the further consideration that the company shall maintain lawful fences on both sides of the right of way, is supported by a sufficient consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 129*)—RIGHT OF WAY—MAINTENANCE OF FARM CROSSINGS.

A railroad company purchasing the property of a railroad company at a time a well-marked roadway under a trestle in the roadbed existed, which way had been used by the owner under the original contract for the right of way, purchased with notice of the existence of the roadway, and could not deprive the owner of the land of the use thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 401; Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

5. RAILROADS (§ 104*)—RIGHT OF WAY—MAINTENANCE OF FARM CROSSINGS.

Evidence held not to show the existence of a roadway under a trestle in a railroad roadbed at a time a railroad company purchased the railroad property, relieving the company of the duty to permit the use of any roadway under the trestle after obtaining a deed conveying the right of way without referring to any duty to maintain crossings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 104.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Fred A. Forsythe and others against the Southern Railway in Kentucky. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. T. Wilson, for appellants. Edward P. Humphrey, E. H. Gaither, and Humphrey, Davie & Humphrey, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. In 1887 the Louisville Southern Railroad Company constructed its line of railway from Louisville to Burgin, Ky. The route for the road was surveyed through the land of J. M. Forsythe, who died some years ago, and the company desired to build the road through his farm, which contained 540 acres of fine land. Mr. Forsythe was very reluctant to permit the road to be built through his place, but finally agreed that it might be done in consideration of the agreement of the company to pay him $6,000 in money, give him three crossings (one overhead and two undergrade), and build and maintain the fencing on both sides of the road. The road run through the farm a distance of nearly three-quarters of a mile, dividing it into two nearly equal parts. The overhead crossing was to be at the northern limit of his farm, one undergrade crossing near the center, and another undergrade crossing near the southern boundary of his place. The overhead crossing was over a cut made by the railroad, and the undergrade crossings were under trestles. A short time after this contract was made, and by agreement of Mr. Forsythe, the overhead crossing was converted into a grade crossing; and it may be conceded that he was placed in the use and possession of these three crossings. In 1891, the railroad company having failed to pay the whole of the $6,000, he instituted an ordinary suit against them for the balance due. This suit in November, 1891, was dismissed settled, coupled with an agreement upon the part of Mr. Forsythe to make a deed for the right of way over the land as soon as a survey of the same was made. The contract between the railroad company and Forsythe was not in writing; nor was there any writing entered into between the parties concerning their agreement until 1898, at which time the railroad had been in operation for some years, and Forsythe and his wife then conveyed to the appellee Southern Railway Company in Kentucky by deed duly acknowledged and recorded the right of way through his land. The deed recites that: "Whereas, the said J. M. Forsythe instituted suit in the Mercer circuit court on April 14, 1891, against the Louisville Southern Railroad Company, whereby he sought to recover for the value of certain lands taken by said company for railroad purposes, and for damages resulting to the adjacent lands on account of the occupancy thereof by said company; and whereas, said suit was dismissed settled by the plaintiff on November 3, 1891, the damages therein claimed having been fully paid; and whereas all the right, title and interest of the Louisville Southern Railroad Company in and to said tract of land was by virtue of an order entered in the circuit court of the United States, district of Kentucky, in the case of Central Trust Company of New York v. Louisville Southern Railroad, transferred by E. T. Lolley, special commissioner in said cause, to the Southern Railway Company in Kentucky, a deed for said interest having been made August 20, 1894, and whereas no deed for the right of way over said land has ever been made by the said Forsythe: Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and full payment of the purchase price, and the further consideration that the said second party shall permanently maintain lawful fences on both sides of the land herein conveyed, the said first parties hereby sell and convey unto the said Southern Railway Company in Kentucky the right of way over the following described tract of land, and the use thereof for railroad purposes: [Then follows a description of the land conveyed.] To have and to hold said tract of land for the purposes set forth above, together with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging, unto the said second party, its successors and assigns forever, with covenant of general warranty." In September, 1907, the trestle erected and used by the railroad company that spanned the southern crossing claimed by Forsythe under his agreement became unsafe, and the company commenced to make an embankment under the trestle that was intended to take the place of it. When the company undertook to make this embankment that would obstruct the crossing, and deprive appellants, who were then the owners of the land, of the use of it, they brought this action, setting out the essential facts herein stated, and sought an injunction restraining the company from obstructing the crossing. Upon final hearing of the case, the petition was dismissed, and the plaintiff appeals.

The contentions of the appellants are that the contract, so far as the crossings were concerned, was an executed contract in 1887 and Forsythe was in possession of the crossings at the time the deed was made; that the Southern Railway Company as the vendee and purchaser of the Louisville Southern Railroad could only acquire such interest in the land as the Louisville Southern Railroad had acquired by and under its contract with Forsythe; and that the deed was made by Forsythe and accepted and received by the Louisville Southern Railroad Company with reference to the physical construction of the road and all of the conditions surrounding it. Second. That, if the deed fairly construed conveyed anything more than the Louisville Southern Railroad acquired from Forsythe by its contract, then the reservations of said crossings were omitted from the deed by mistake and oversight, and it is asked that the deed be corrected to conform to the contract.

The appellee insists, first, that it is neither alleged nor proven by appellants that their user of the supposed crossing was adverse; second, that it is not alleged or proven by them that there was any mutual mistake in regard to the execution of the deed; and, third, that, as they had no notice of the contract between their vendor and Forsythe, they are not bound by its terms, no matter what they were, that the deed made to them is the only written contract, and the only contract the terms and conditions of which they are bound by. The contract between Forsythe and the Louisville Southern Railroad was negotiated by John B. Thompson, who was the mutual friend of the contracting parties. It is clear from his evidence that, by the original agreement between Forsythe and the Louisville Southern Railroad Company, Forsythe was to have the three crossings heretofore mentioned. It will be observed that the only agreement ever made concerning the crossings was the verbal one made in 1887, and that in 1894 the Southern Railway Company purchased under decretal sale all the rights, franchises, and property of the Louisville Southern Railroad Company that built the road. Thompson also testified that in 1898 the appellee company presented a deed to Forsythe, but he refused to sign it because no mention was made in it of either the fencing or crossings, and this deed was returned to the company, and another deed and the one heretofore mentioned sent to him, which he executed. Thompson further testifies that he called the attention of Forsythe to the fact that the second deed, although it specified the fencing, did not mention the crossings, and Forsythe said that his lawyer told him that it was not necessary that the crossings be mentioned as the crossings were there, and the company could not change them. Although it was competent for Thompson to testify to the fact that he saw the deeds and knew their contents, it was manifestly not competent for him to relate a conversation with Forsythe in respect to them, although the conversation as detailed by him is not prejudicial to the interests of the appellee. There is no evidence whatever that the appellee company had any notice of the verbal contract between Forsythe and the Louisville Southern Railroad Company; nor is there any evidence tending to show mistake or oversight in the execution of the deed. Nor was there anything to put them on notice. Bailey v. Southern Ry. Co., 112 Ky. 424, 60 S. W. 631, 61 S. W. 31.

The point is made that there was no consideration for the deed, but this is not well founded. The deed itself recites a consideration amply sufficient to support it.

The only remaining question is: Was the passway or crossing in controversy sufficiently marked or defined to put the appellee company on notice of its existence at the time it became the purchaser of the land. If at that time there had been a well-marked roadway under the trestle, and this way had been used by Forsythe under the original contract, we would say that the purchaser must be held to have made his purchase with notice of its existence, and could not deprive the owner of the land of its use. Jones v. Prewitt, 108 S. W. 867, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 358. To illustrate, there was a grade crossing in a cut several feet high on the land of Forsythe made when the road was constructed or shortly thereafter, and in use from that time until the road was sold; and this grade crossing, although there may not have been any writing or record concerning it, was in and of itself sufficient to put the purchaser upon notice that the owner of the land had at that point a crossing, and the purchaser would not be permitted to close or obstruct the crossing, upon the ground that he had no notice of it. The crossing and the physical facts about it furnished all the notice necessary to estop the purchaser from questioning its existence; and so, in reference to the middle undergrade crossing. If it be a fact, which we do not determine, that there was a plainly marked road under it at the time of the purchase by appellee, indicating its use as a roadway, and the appearance of the ground was sufficient to put a person of ordinary prudence upon notice that it was in use as a passway, we would also say that the appellee company could not deprive Forsythe of the use of it. But the evidence does not show that the use of the undergrade crossing in controversy was at any time sufficient to put a person of ordinary prudence upon notice that there was a crossing there. There was nothing in the appearance of the ground or the surroundings to indicate that there was a crossing or roadway. It is true there is evidence that occasionally a few loads of rails, hay, corn, and other farm produce were hauled by persons living on the farm under this trestle from the adjacent fields of Forsythe, but the hauling was at long intervals. The passway was the farthest one from the residence and buildings, and was seldom used. There was also a fence erected by the side of the trestle that it was necessary to take down whenever this way was used; there being no gate or other opening in the fence. Several witnesses testified, and there is little contradiction of it, that the crossing or passage under this trestle was so seldom used that there was no appearance whatever of a road. The company, when it purchased the railroad, could not be charged with the existence of a crossing at this place. The deed makes no reference to the crossings, and it is entirely probable that mention of them was omitted because Forsythe believed that as they were in existence it was unnecessary to notice them. And, if as a matter of fact the crossings at the time the purchase was made and the deed executed were in use to such an extent that a person of ordinary prudence would know they were there, it would have been unnecessary to mention them in the deed, because the deed related back to the purchase, and the purchaser would be charged with notice of the conditions when he purchased; and this notice would estop him when he accepted the deed. The rights and liabilities of the parties are measured and limited by this deed, except with reference to the crossings, the existence of which the company was bound as before indicated to take notice of.

Perceiving no error, the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Campbell County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Henry Roettger and another against M. Riefkin and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Ramsey Washington and Howard M. Benton, for appellants. Thos. P. Carothers, Wm. A. Burkamp, and Otto Wolff, for appellees.

HOBSON, J. Henry Roettger and wife rented rooms of M. Riefkin and wife to live in. By the lease they were to vacate within three days upon failure to pay rent. They failed to pay the rent, and a warrant of forcible detainer was taken out by the landlords. The case was tried on Friday, January 4th, and a judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs. About 4 p. m. on Monday, January 7th, the Riefkins went to a magistrate, and had him to issue a writ of possession, which was then placed in the hands of the constable, who proceeded with Riefkin to the premises. Riefkin secured a key, and opened up the rooms for the constable to enter. He and the constable then entered, and the constable then and there removed the tenants' goods from the premises, and placed them on the sidewalk, where rain fell upon them the following night. All this occurred about 4:30 p. m. Monday, the tenants not being present, and not knowing that the goods were to be removed. Thereupon the tenants brought this suit to recover damages for the injury to their property, which they charged had been ruined. At the conclusion of the evidence for the plaintiffs the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find for the defendants, and this being done, and the plaintiffs' petition being dismissed, the plaintiffs appeal.

By section 461 of the Civil Code of Practice, if the party against whom the inquisition is found, in a case of forcible detainer, fail to file a traverse on or before the third day after the finding of the inquest, the judge or justice shall on request issue execution. The inquest was returned on Friday; and, as the defendants in that case had three days to file a traverse, no execution could properly issue until the expiration of three days. As the day of the judgment must be counted, the three days would expire on Sunday, if Sunday is to be counted; and, if Sunday is not to be counted, the three days would expire on Monday, but the defendants would have the whole of Monday to file the traverse, and no execution could lawfully be issued on that day. The Code provides that a motion for a new trial must be made within three days after the verdict or decision is rendered. Under this provision it has been held that Sunday is not counted, and that the statute means three juridical days. Long v. Hughes, 1 Duv. 387; Frazier v. Clark, 88 Ky. 260, 10 S. W. 806, 11 S. W. 83. The Code also provides that, in cases of felony, the court shall not pronounce judgment until two days after the verdict is rendered. This has also been held to mean two juridical days. O'Brien v. Commonwealth, 89 Ky. 354, 12 S. W. 471. In the recent case of Geneva Cooperage Company v. Brown, 124 Ky. 16, 98 S. W. 279, the court, upon a consideration of the authorities, laid down the rule that where the statute does not in terms exclude Sunday, yet if the time fixed is less than a week, Sunday will be excluded in computing the time. Sunday must therefore be excluded in computing the three days allowed by the statute for filing a traverse in cases of forcible entry or detainer. It follows that the execution was issued prematurely; and, while it, being fair on its face, protected the officer, it did not protect the persons who procured it to be issued before it was authorized to be issued. A person who wrongfully procures a warrant of restitution to issue, and has the constable to execute the writ, is responsible to the person injured for the damages which he thereby sustains. It is not necessary for us to consider whether the plaintiffs' petition set out a cause of action in trespass or case. It states the facts, and, the facts stated being sufficient to warrant a recovery, the petition is sufficient under the Code. It is recited in the agreed facts that the defendants went to the magistrate and requested him to issue the writ. There is therefore sufficient evidence to go to the jury as to both of the defendants. Morrison v. Price, 33 Ky. Law Rep. —, 112 S. W. 1090.

It is true an execution prematurely issued is voidable, and not void. Freeman on Executions, § 25; Galot v. Pierce, 38 S. W. 892, 18 Ky. Law Rep. 1004. It may be quashed, but unless quashed it protects the officer or the purchaser at the sale; but this case does not turn on the question whether the execution was void or voidable. The defendants, when they were not entitled to the possession of the property, and when they were not entitled to a writ of possession, took out the writ, and set the plaintiffs' property out on the street. This was a tort, and they must compensate the plaintiffs for such damages as they thereby sustained; for the plaintiffs were rightfully in possession of the rooms, and could not be lawfully disturbed until the expiration of the three days after the judgment.

On another trial the court will exclude all evidence as to the plaintiffs having been heretofore evicted by other landlords from places which they had rented. What had occurred on other occasions is incompetent here.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

In an action for damages for the pollution of a spring by permitting oil to escape into it, the spring not being permanently destroyed, an instruction to find for plaintiff such amount as would fairly compensate her for the damage to the spring was erroneous, as fixing no measure of damages; a proper instruction being that they should award such damages as would fairly compensate plaintiff for the diminution in value of the use of the property resulting from the pollution up to the bringing of the action.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pulaski County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by Ida Gillispie against the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for further proceedings.

John Galvin and O. H. Waddle & Son, for appellant. Morrow & Morrow and R. B. Waddle, for appellee.

CLAY, O. The appellant, Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Company, permitted a tank of oil to escape from its premises into a spring on the property of appellee, Ida Gillispie. This action was instituted by appellee to recover damages for the pollution of the spring. The jury returned a verdict in her favor for $350, and, from the judgment based thereon, the railway company appeals.

It appears that appellee is the owner of property in the city of Somerset adjoining the right of way of appellant. Upon this property there is located a spring. Around this spring she has built a brick house in which she keeps milk and butter. Upon the property in question are two houses, in one of which appellee lives. After the oil was thrown upon the ground, and permitted to seep into the spring, the water therefrom was utterly unfit for any purpose. Thereupon appellee expended the sum of $45 for the purpose of getting water connections, and was compelled to expend certain sums for ice which would not have been necessary had the spring not been polluted.

Appellant asks a reversal upon two grounds: First, the verdict is excessive; second, error in the instructions fixing the measure of damages. As we have concluded to reverse this case upon another ground, it will not be necessary to consider the question whether the verdict was excessive.

The court instructed the jury as follows:

"(1) You will find for the defendant in this case, unless you shall believe from the evidence that prior to the 10th day of July, 1907, the time of the filing of this action, the defendant so operated and managed its railway as to cause quantities of oil or other polluting substance to escape from its cars or premises, and run into and so pollute plaintiff's spring as to make it unfit for use for domestic purposes, and, if you so believe from the evidence, you will find for the plaintiff.

"(2) If you find for the plaintiff, you will find such sum as you believe will fairly compensate her for the damage and injury to her spring, if any, there was caused by its being polluted with oil or other polluting substance, which rendered it unfit for family use or domestic purpose, and for such time as she was deprived of the use of said spring up to the time of this trial, and by reason of any annoyance and inconvenience and discomfort suffered by plaintiff, if any, by reason of the pollution of said spring, providing your finding shall not exceed $1,000.

"(3) Nine jurors concurring finds a verdict. When as many as nine and less than twelve agree, those agreeing to the verdict will sign it. If all agree, one only will sign it, adding after his name the word 'Foreman.'"

Complaint is made only of instruction No. 2. Manifestly this instruction is erroneous. The language, "you will find such sum as you believe will fairly compensate her for the damage and injury to her spring, if any, there was caused," etc., fixes no measure of damages at all. Under that language the jury might have "roamed at will," and fixed upon any amount they saw fit. Furthermore, the instruction permits a recovery, not only for damages for injury to the spring, but for the time plaintiff was deprived of the use of the spring, and for the annoyance, inconvenience, and discomfort suffered by plaintiff. As there was no testimony given to show that the spring was permanently destroyed, the correct measure of damages in such a case is the diminution in the value of the use of the spring from the time it was polluted up to the time of filing this suit. If, however, plaintiff could, by the exercise of ordinary care, and at reasonable cost, have cleaned out the spring and removed the cause of its pollution, she could only recover up to the time when she could have so cleaned it out. It was her duty to minimize the damages if she could do so by ordinary care and at reasonable expense. She could not sit idly by and recover damages which she might have avoided by the exercise of ordinary care. Long, etc., v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 107 S. W. 203, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 774, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1063; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Moore, etc., 101 S. W. 934, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 141, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 579. For the purpose of determining the diminution in value of the use of the property, all the evidence contained in the record before us is admissible.

Upon the next trial of this case the court, in addition to instruction No. 1, will instruct the jury as follows:

"No. 2. If the jury find for the plaintiff, they will award her such damages as they believe will fairly compensate her for the diminution in value of the use of said property resulting from the pollution of the spring during the time of such pollution up to July 10, 1907, the date of filing this action.

"No. 3. If, however, you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, by the use of orinary care and at a reasonable cost, could have cleaned out the spring and removed the cause of pollution, you will, in case you find for her, award her such damages only as will fairly compensate her for the diminution in the value of the use of the property up to the time when she might have so cleaned out the spring, together with the reasonable cost of so cleaning it out."

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

1. TRIAL (§ 139*)—SUBMISSION OF ISSUE TO JURY—EVIDENCE.

Where there is more than a scintilla of evidence to sustain the theory of plaintiff in an action for negligence, the case is properly submitted to the jury, though the weight of the evidence is in defendant's favor.

3. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for the death of a person struck by a car, the petition charged those in charge of the car with gross negligence in running it at a high speed, and there was evidence that decedent was knocked down on the track in front of the car by a passing wagon, and that the car could not have been stopped in time to avoid the accident after he fell on the track, an instruction that the jury, if finding that decedent was thrown on the track in front of the car, and if finding that the motorman could have prevented the collision by the exercise of ordinary care, should find for plaintiff was prejudicial, because it submitted an issue not supported by the evidence.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by R. E. Buckner's administrator, against the Louisville Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

R. L. Greene, Fairleigh, Straus & Fairleigh, and Forcht & Field, for appellant. Geo. Weissinger Smith, A. T. Burgevin, and C. R. Dinwiddie, for appellee.

SETTLE, J. The appellee, A. M. Sea, administrator of the estate of R. E. Buckner, deceased, recovered in the Jefferson Circuit Court, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division, a verdict and judgment against the appellant, the Louisville Railway Company, of $2,500 damages, for the death of his intestate caused, as alleged, by the negligence of appellant's agents and servants in running a car against and over him which they were at the time operating at an unusual and dangerous rate of speed. The refusal of the court to grant appellant a new trial gave occasion for this appeal.

While numerous grounds were urged for a new trial, only two of them are relied on for the reversal asked of this court, viz.: First, that there was not sufficient proof of negligence to authorize the verdict; second, that the court erred in instructing the jury.

The intestate was 72 years of age at the time of his death. He was in the employ of the city of Louisville as a street sweeper; and it is the contention of appellee that, while standing on the south track of appellant's railway in Chestnut street at its intersection with Sixth street, looking eastwardly and engaged at work, he was struck, knocked down, and so injured by one of appellant's street cars, which was approaching him from the rear and rapidly running eastwardly, as to cause his death, which occurred about three months after the accident. On the other hand, it is appellant's contention that, just before the car struck the intestate, he was knocked in front of it by lumber, which projected from a passing wagon, and that the car could not be stopped in time to prevent its striking him.

There was evidence to support appellee's contention. Appellee's principal witness was Clara Pena, a negro woman. Her testimony was, in substance, that at the time of the collision she was on the west side of Sixth street and the north side of Chestnut, between the curbing and the south track on which the car was running; that the car was running rapidly, and so near her that she stepped back out of its way and stopped to let it pass. At that time she said she saw the intestate standing in the middle of Chestnut street at the crossing sweeping, with his back toward the car; that she heard no bell, and saw the car strike him twice; that he was knocked down by the first collision, and fell on the track a few feet in front of the car, and it then struck him the second time, fastening his body as it lay on the track under the front guard; that the car was checked by the motorman when it struck the intestate, but not enough to stop it before it struck the fallen man the second time. The witness said he was not struck by a wagon or by lumber projecting from a wagon. It seems clear from the testimony of the negro woman that she was standing immediately at the point of the accident so situated as to see the whole of it, and that no other person, except the motorman, had the same opportunity to see what happened. Furthermore, if she told the truth, the car gave no signal of its approach, and was running at such a high rate of speed that she had to suddenly step back out of its way, and the intestate was standing upon the track, and did not fall thereon until struck by the car, which was not stopped after striking him before it ran against him the second time. The negro woman was in some measure corroborated by E. E. Roebuck, a letter carrier, who testified that he did not see the accident because in the rear of the car, but that he got to the injured man immediately after it happened, and saw no lumber wagon. Roebuck also noticed that the glass of the headlight on the car was broken, and that pieces of the glass were lying on the guard or fender in front of the car, which tends to support the testimony of the colored woman that the car struck the intestate twice; the first collision knocking him off his feet and causing him to be thrown against the headlight, and then to the street a few feet in front of the car, the second occurring after he was thrown to the street. If he was thrown against the headlight with sufficient force to break the glass, the car must have been going at a high rate of speed when it struck him. J. A. Atkins, another of appellee's witnesses, lives at the place of the accident. He testified that he heard a commotion, and looked in the direction of the car, and as he did so the intestate was in the act of falling on the track in front of it, and that after he fell to the track the car ran up to and against him, but then seemed to be running slow. This testimony also somewhat supports that of the colored woman to the effect that, after the car struck the intestate, its speed was checked, but not enough to prevent its striking him the second time. Atkins did not see a wagon, but he saw the intestate in the act of falling on the track in front of the car. If the fall was caused by his coming in contact with the wagon, it would seem improbable that the wagon could have gotten out of view without his seeing it. A. A. Gordon, also a witness for appellant, was about 50 feet away when the accident occurred. He did not see the car strike the intestate, but heard a shout or loud exclamation, and, turning, saw him being rolled under the guard of the car, and then taken out. He heard some one say the intestate had been knocked on the track by a wagon. He then looked, and saw no wagon anywhere near the point of the accident, but discovered one between Seventh and Eighth streets, a square and a half away. If the intestate was knocked in front of the car by this wagon, it is improbable that it would have gotten that distance in so short a time.

The appellant introduced seven witnesses, including the conductor and motorman. The latter and three other witnesses, two of whom were passengers on the car, testified that the intestate was knocked down on the track in front of the car by a passing wagon loaded with lumber; that as the driver of the wagon attempted to get it off the car track, there was such a sliding of its hind wheels upon the rail, that the lumber projecting from the rear end of the wagon struck the intestate, causing him to fall. The conductor and remaining two witnesses did not see the lumber strike him, but claimed to have seen the wagon at that point just before or immediately after he fell upon the track. The conductor and motorman and two other witnesses testified that the car was running slowly at the time of the accident, that it could not have been stopped in time to avoid striking the decedent after he fell on the track, and that in approaching the intestate it gave the usual signals with the gong.

Manifestly the evidence was conflicting, and perhaps it would not be wide of the mark to say that the weight of it was in appellant's favor; but, while this is true, there was some evidence, and more than a scintilla, to sustain appellee's theory of the manner in which the intestate received his injuries. The case was therefore properly submitted to the jury. It was their duty to weigh the evidence and decide the issues of fact. The question is not what this court would have decided upon the same state of facts, but whether there was such an absence or want of evidence as would authorize it to set aside the verdict of the jury. Upon the whole case we are of opinion that we have not the right to disturb it on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence. It is not contended by appellant that the case should not have gone to the jury, for its counsel concede that there was a scintilla of evidence which authorized its submission to them, but it is insisted that they would nevertheless have found for the appellant but for an error committed by the trial court in giving instruction No. 4, which, it is claimed, conflicts with the other instructions given, to which no objection is made.

In addition to instructions predicated upon the petition, and defining the measure of damages, the court by instruction No. 3 in substance told the jury that, if the decedent was struck by a lumber wagon and thrown in front of the car, so close to it that the motorman in charge of the car by the exercise of ordinary care could not have prevented its coming in collision with the intestate, the law was for the defendant; but instruction No. 4, the only one to which appellant objects, reads as follows: "But although the jury may believe from the evidence that the decedent was struck by the lumber wagon, or by the lumber on the wagon, and thrown upon the track in front of the car, nevertheless, if the jury shall also believe from the evidence that the defendant's motorman in charge of the car could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have prevented the car from coming in collision with the intestate and injuring him, so that he died in consequence, then the law is for the plaintiff, and the jury should so find." This instruction was misleading and prejudicial, because it submitted to the jury a false issue, which there was no evidence to support. The thing complained of in the petition is the running of the car at a very high rate of speed, and that those in charge of it, with "gross negligence and carelessness," ran said car on and against plaintiff's decedent, knocking him down and mashing him under the front guard. If appellee was entitled to recover it was upon the theory that the fast running or dangerous speed of the car caused the decedent's death, and if this manner of operating the car put it out of the power of appellant's motorman to stop it in time to avoid its striking the decedent as he stood upon the track, or after he was knocked down on the track, appellant would be liable. But on the other hand, if while the car was being operated at a rate of speed that was customary and reasonably safe, the lumber wagon suddenly knocked him upon the track in front of the car, and so near it as that the motorman was unable by the use of ordinary care to prevent the car from striking him, appellant would not be liable. There was, however, no testimony that tended to prove that the motorman, between the fall of the decedent upon the track and the striking of his body by the car while lying on the track, could by any sort of care have prevented the car from striking him. Yet instruction No. 4 was calculated to give the jury the impression that there was some evidence to that effect upon which they would be authorized to find against appellant, although they may have believed the decedent was knocked down on the track and in front of the car by the wagon, and that the car, previous to his being knocked down on the track, was not running at a dangerous rate of speed. When the case is retried the court should give instruction No. 4 so modified as to read as follows: "But although the jury may believe from the evidence that the decedent was struck by the lumber wagon, or by the lumber on the wagon, and thrown upon the track in front of the car, nevertheless if they further believe from the evidence that the defendant's motorman in charge of the car could, by the exercise of ordinary care, have prevented it from coming in collision with the decedent but for the negligence, if any, of the said motorman in running said car, at the time the decedent was knocked on the track by the wagon, at a high and dangerous rate of speed, if he did so run it, they should find for the plaintiff."

On account of the error of the circuit court

In giving instruction No. 4, the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial consistent with the opinion.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Leslie County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by the Belknap Hardware & Manufacturing Company against Lucinda Cress and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, said defendant Lucinda Cress appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Mainard, for appellant. Cleon K. Calvert, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. William Cress, a merchant in Leslie county, bought goods of the Belknap Hardware & Manufacturing Company. He failed to pay for the goods, and the company in October, 1906, brought suit against him on the account and took out an attachment, which was levied on a mill. Judgment was recovered in the action for the debt, the attachment was sustained, and the attached property was ordered to be sold; but no sale was made for the reason that the commissioner was unable to get any one to bid for the property, as it was claimed by third persons. Thereupon the company brought this action against William Cress and Lucinda Cress, alleging that the judgment was unpaid; that Cress was insolvent; that nothing could be made out of him by execution, all his property having been attached in other actions; but that on May 2, 1906, and after the indebtedness to the plaintiff was incurred, he had bought of Marion Boggs a tract of land for $350 and had it conveyed to his wife, Lucinda Cress, to hinder and defraud his creditors; that he had paid for the land and that his wife had taken the deed with knowledge of the fraudulent purpose in which she participated with her husband. No answer was filed by William Cress, and as to him the petition was taken as confessed. Lucinda Cress filed an answer denying the allegations of the petition. Proof was taken, and on final hearing the court adjudged the plaintiffs the relief prayed; they having taken out an attachment, which was levied on the land. From the judgment Mrs. Cress appeals.

The proof satisfies us that the circuit court properly held the deed fraudulent; but it is insisted that the plaintiff cannot maintain the action, because there had not been a return of "No property" upon the judgment in the first action and it is urged that an action under section 439 of the Civil Code of Practice, is the only action which can be brought in this state to enforce the satisfaction of a judgment. There was a dictum to this effect in Davidson v. Simmons, 11 Bush, 330, which was referred to in Ritchey v. Buricke's Adm'r, 54 S. W. 173, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 1120; but the question was not before the court in either of these cases, and the latter case went off on another ground. At the time that Davidson v. Simmons was decided, an action could not be maintained to set aside a fraudulent conveyance until the plaintiff had obtained judgment and a return of "No property found"; but now, by section 1907a, Ky. St. 1903, a petition in equity may be maintained to set aside a fraudulent conveyance by a creditor as though it had been brought on a return of "No property," as was before required. There is no reason why a judgment creditor may not sue under this section, as well as a creditor who has not reduced his claim to judgment. A judgment is a debt of record, and at common law an action for debt lies on a judgment as soon as it is recovered; the remedy by execution being merely cumulative. 2 Black on Judgments, § 958. We do not find it necessary to determine in this case how far the common-law rule has been modified by our statutes; but clearly a judgment creditor may sue to set aside a fraudulent conveyance without obtaining a return of "No property." Otherwise, he might be unable to make his debt; for in a case like this other creditors might attach before he could secure an execution and a return of "No property."

There was no substantial error in overruling the exceptions of the defendant to the deposition of Marion Boggs taken by the plaintiff, for the purpose of cross-examination; the plaintiff not having been present when the original deposition was taken. The defendant subsequently, by leave of court, retaken the deposition of Boggs, and so his testimony was fully before the court. Burkhart v. Loughridge, 124 Ky. 50, 98 S. W. 291. Judgment affirmed.

WOODS et ux. v. PINE MOUNTAIN R. CO.
(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 4, 1908.)

CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 47*)—PROCEEDINGS — EVIDENCE — MISREPRESENTATION.

In a suit to cancel a deed to a railroad right of way, evidence held not to show fraudulent misrepresentations of defendant's agent as to the location of the right of way, authorizing cancellation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Cancellation of Instruments, Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Whitley County.

"Not to be officially reported."

Suit by Ceberry Woods and wife against the Pine Mountain Railroad Company to cancel a deed. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

L. L. Peace and R. L. Pope, for appellants.
Benjamin D. Warfield, J. W. Alcorn, and H. H. Tye, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. Ceberry Woods and wife brought this suit against the Pine Mountain Railroad Company to cancel a deed which they had made to the company for the right of way through their farm, on the ground that E. L. Stevens, who was the agent of the company and obtained the deed, falsely and fraudulently represented to them that the right of way ran on the west side of their house as it was then staked off by the company; that they relied upon the statements made to them by Stevens, and believed them to be true, when in fact the right of way ran on the east side of the house, and if they had known the facts they would not have signed or acknowledged the deed. The allegations of the petition were traversed by the answer.

Ceberry Woods gave his deposition, in which he stated that the engineer of the company who surveyed the right of way pointed out to him that the right of way lay on the west side of the house, and that when he signed the deed he in good faith believed that the right of way was located there. But he does not state that Stevens made him any representations at all, or show that the engineer who told him where the right of way was located, had any authority from the company to bind it by any statements he might make as to where the right of way would be located. The plaintiffs also introduced two other witnesses as to what occurred when Stevens was at the house; but their testimony is not sufficient to show any misrepresentations by Stevens as to where the right of way was located. On the contrary, Stevens testified that he did not know where it was located and made no statement about it; that he was furnished by the company simply with the courses and distances, and did not in fact know where the lines were located on the ground. There is, therefore, a total failure to show any fraudulent conduct on the part of Stevens, and the circuit court properly so held.

It appears from the evidence that Woods had given the company a title bond for the right of way; that it had run two lines, one on the east of the house and one on the west; that the one on the west of the house damaged him the most, and it was agreed that if the road ran there the company should pay him $90 an acre for the land, and if it ran on the east side of the house it was to pay him $80 an acre for the land; the right of way through the farm including something over 10 acres. It also appears from the proof that Woods, at the time the deed was made, thought the railroad would run west of the house and claimed $90 an acre, which was paid to him; but he said at the time that he hoped Stevens could get them to use the other line. The road was in fact built on the other line, which had been surveyed before; and from all the proof we are satisfied that the location of the road where it is is not so injurious to Woods as it would be if located on the west line.

Judgment affirmed.

1. WORK AND LABOR (§ 7*) — SERVICES BETWEEN PERSONS IN FAMILY RELATION—IMPLIED CONTRACTS.

Where the relationship of persons raises the presumption that they lived together for mutual convenience, the law will not imply a promise to pay for their services rendered each other, but will require stricter proof to establish such a contract than is required in ordinary cases.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 221*)—PAYMENT OF CLAIMS — PERSONAL SERVICES OF SON—NECESSITY FOR EXPRESS CONTRACT.

There is a natural obligation owing from a son to an invalid mother; and, to recover from her estate for services rendered her, he must show an actual contract for compensation.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nicholas County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Henry Conway and another against William Conway and others for the settlement of the estate of their mother, in which the plaintiffs filed claims with the commissioner, who reported favorably. Fannie Perrine and another excepted to the report, and plaintiffs moved for and obtained a trial out of chancery. There was a directed verdict for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

William Conley, for appellants. Morgan & Darragh, for appellees.

CLAY, C. Appellants, Henry Conway and Johnson Conway, seek in this action to recover for alleged services rendered their mother in nursing and taking care of her for a period of several months prior to her death. Their claims were first filed with the master commissioner in a suit brought by them and the administrator of their mother's estate for a settlement thereof. The commissioner reported in favor of the claims. Appellees, Fannie Perrine and Ben Conway, filed exceptions to this report. Thereupon counsel for appellants moved for a trial out of chancery. This was granted. Upon the conclusion of the testimony for appellants, the court gave a peremptory instruction for appellees.*

The evidence in the case shows that the appellants, Henry and Johnson Conway, resided with their mother for a period of about 2½ years prior to her death. During that time their mother was frequently confined to bed, and needed constant attention. This attention was given by appellants. Indeed, it seems that they did most of the work about the house, such as cooking, washing, etc. They also managed the place upon which they all lived. Two or three witnesses testified that the mother of appellants said she wanted them paid out of the money she had left. She also spoke of having a written contract drawn up. One of the witnesses testified that she said she wanted all her children who waited on her to have something extra. There can be no doubt that appellants performed valuable and efficient services in nursing and taking care of their mother. Now and then a considerable portion of their time was taken up by the attention which she demanded; but there is absolutely nothing in the record to show that any contract was made between appellants and their mother that they should be paid for their services. Even the expressions which she is said to have used to others were not made in appellants' presence. In a long line of decisions this court has held that, where the relationship of the parties was sufficient to raise the presumption that they lived together as a matter of mutual convenience, the law will not imply a promise to pay for the services so rendered. To establish a contract for such compensation requires stricter proof than to establish an ordinary contract. There is a natural obligation owing from a son to an invalid mother. Filial duty, to say nothing of love and affection, should prompt him to do everything in his power for her comfort and welfare. Where he afterwards makes a claim against his mother's estate for such services, he should be entitled to recover only where there is proof of an actual contract that he should be paid. The expressions alleged to have been used by Mrs. Conway were not sufficient to establish such a contract. Foley v. Dillon, etc., 105 S. W. 461, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 222; Wallace v. Denny's Adm'r, 90 S. W. 1046, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 978; Reynolds' Adm'r v. Reynolds, 92 Ky. 556, 18 S. W. 517.

Judgment affirmed.

BOYD v. PERKINS.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Oct. 23, 1908.)

WILLS (§ 502*)—CONSTRUCTION—PRIMA FACIE MEANING OF WORDS "KIN," "RELATIVE."

With the exception of a few special bequests, and a provision for the erection of a monument and a direction that any note owing him by any of his "kin" should be canceled and the amount given to such "relative," a will provided for the distribution of the estate among testator's relatives "equally as provided by statute, as if no will had been made," thus embracing only blood relatives. Held, that the words "kin," "relative," and "relatives" referred prima facie to blood connections only, so that the husband of testator's niece was still liable on notes given to the testator.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Whitley County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Robert Boyd, Junior, executor of Robert Boyd, Senior, against K. D. Perkins. Judgment of dismissal and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

H. C. Clay, for appellant. H. H. Tye, for appellee.

SETTLE, J. The appellant, Robert Boyd, Jr., as executor of the will of Robert Boyd, Sr., sued the appellee, K. D. Perkins. In the court below upon five notes of $500 each, which the latter had executed to Robert Boyd, Sr., before his death. The notes were given for and were secured by a lien upon real estate in the city of Williamsburg, Whitley county. Appellee filed answer, admitting the execution of the notes, but alleging affirmatively that they were canceled and bequeathed to him by the will of the testator. A demurrer was filed to the answer, which the court overruled, and, appellant failing to plead further, judgment was rendered dismissing the action. Hence this appeal.

The will being copied into the answer, and that pleading presenting all the facts necessary to the determination of the controversy, we must look to the provisions of the will to ascertain whether the defense presented by the answer should have pre-valled. The will contains, among others, this provision: "That at my death any note or obligation that any of my kin may owe me is hereby cancelled, and the amount is given and bequeathed to such relative." The testator died childless, and by the terms of his will the large estate of which he was the owner, with the exception of two small bequests to personal friends, went at his death to blood relatives named or referred to in that instrument. Appellee does not claim to have been related by blood to the testator, but avers in his answer that he married Malinda Boyd, who was a niece of the testator. Malinda Boyd died several years before the testator died. Appellee was, therefore, only a nephew by marriage of the testator; so the question is: Was he one of the kin or relatives to whom was bequeathed by the clause of the will mentioned notes owing to the testator?

Appellee filed with his answer two letters written him by the testator about nine years before the execution of the will, and shortly after the death of his (appellee's) wife, in which he was treated or recognized by the testator as his nephew. We cannot see that these letters throw any light upon the intention of the testator as expressed by his will. They were merely business letters, and it was but natural that the writer should have addressed them to appellee as "Dear Nephew," without meaning thereby to attach any more importance to their relationship than would result from a mere desire to avoid formality. Webster's Dictionary defines the word "nephew" as "the son of a brother, or a sister; or of the brother-in-law, or a sister-in-law." By Bouvier's Law Dictionary it is defined thus: "'Nephew' the son of a brother or sister. But in a bequest would not include, without special mention, nephews and nieces by marriage." Schouler on Wills (2d Ed.) § 536, says: "'Nephew' means in English law the son and niece, the daughter, of a brother or sister; and greatnephews or greatnieces are not embraced by the terms, and, as a gift is naturally to blood relatives, a nephew or niece by marriage—that is, the nephew or niece of the testator's husband or wife—is prima facie excluded, as also would be the wives or widows of a blood nephew." In the first edition of Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (volume 12, p. 521), the word "kindred" is thus defined: "A man's 'kindred,' in the proper signification of the word, means such persons as are related to him by blood." In Bouvier's Law Dictionary the word "kin" is defined thus: "Legal relationship"; and the word "kindred," "Relations by blood. A husband or wife of the deceased is therefore not his or her kindred." In 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 738, we find the following definitions of the word "relation": "The definition commonly given of 'relation' is a person connected with another by consanguinity or affinity, but, in view of the decisions, it would seem that the word has not technically so extensive a meaning as this, and is more properly confined to connections by consanguinity alone."

In Supreme Council v. Bennett, 47 N. J. Eq. 39, 19 Atl. 735, it is said: "The phrases 'related to,' 'relations,' and 'next of kin,' whether used in a statute, will, or contract, have, by a perfectly uniform course of decisions, been held to include only relations by blood, and not connections by marriage, not even a husband and wife." Huling v. Fenner, 9 R. I. 411; 2 Jarman on Wills, 661; Schouler on Wills, § 537.

From the foregoing definitions of the terms "kin," "kindred," "relative," and "relation," we are led to conclude that the words "kin," "relative," and "relatives" used in the will in question will not prima facie include a mere nephew by marriage, and we will not assume that it was the intention of the testator to include appellee among those to whom was bequeathed "any note or obligation that any of my kin may owe me." Furthermore, there is nothing else in the language of the will to indicate that appellee was to be made one of its beneficiaries. On the contrary, it is evident from its language as a whole that the terms "kin" and "relatives" as used in the will were applied by the testator to blood kin alone. With the exception of special bequests to J. W. Alcorn and J. A. Craft of $500 each, that to Robert Boyd, Jr., the provision with respect to the notes on relatives, and that for the erection of a monument at the testator's grave, the will gives the remainder of the testator's estate to his blood relatives, for its language is, "I will and bequeath that the remainder of my estate be distributed among my relatives * * * equally as provided by statute, as if no will had been made"—and the estate under the statute would have gone only to blood relations. It is our opinion, therefore, that the lower court erred in overruling the demurrer to the answer and dismissing the action.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with the opinion.

SYMMES v. ROSE et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 12, 1908.)

1. PLEADING (§ 252*)—AMENDMENT—PETITION—ABANDONMENT OF PRIOR PETITION.

Where the first cause of action alleged was for breach of defendant's agreement to buy land on which plaintiff held an option, plat and sell it, and divide profits with plaintiff, and, on demurrer being sustained to the petition, plaintiff amended the petition and alleged facts to show an implied promise to pay him for services as agent in buying the land, by his amendment plaintiff elected to abandon the cause of action alleged in the original petition by asserting another cause of action inconsistent therewith.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 737½; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 369*)—PETITION—SEPARATE CAUSES OF ACTION—ELECTION.

A cause of action for breach of defendant's agreement to buy land on which plaintiff held an option, plat and sell it, and divide the profits with plaintiff, being inconsistent with allegations of an implied promise to pay plaintiff for his services as agent in buying the land, if the two causes of action were asserted in the same petition, or one of them was asserted by amendment, the trial court should have required plaintiff to elect on which he would stand.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1199; Dec. Dig. § 369.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 417*)—RULING ON DEMURRER—OBJECTIONS—WAIVER BY AMENDMENT.

Where, upon a demurrer to the petition being sustained, plaintiff amended and went to trial on his amended petition, he cannot complain, on appeal, of error in sustaining the demurrer, or assert that the original petition was his real cause of action; that petition having been abandoned by his amendment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 1401; Dec. Dig. § 417.*]

4. PLEADING (§ 252*)—VARIANCE—EVIDENCE ADMISSIBLE—CONFORMITY TO PLEADINGS.

Where, though evidence might have been admissible under the original petition, that petition having been abandoned by amendment, and the evidence being irrelevant under the amended petition, it was properly excluded.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Davless County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by H. H. Symmes against R. E. Rose and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.

R. G. Hill, for appellant. Sweeney, Ellis & Sweeney, for appellees.

O'REAR, C. J. Appellant claims that he held an option on a valuable piece of land near Owensboro, and contracted by parol agreement with appellee R. E. Rose that the latter would furnish the money to buy it and when it was platted into town lots, put on the market, and sold, the profits would be divided between the two. He sued appellee for a breach of the contract, alleged the foregoing agreement, and that appellee had wrongfully taken the title to his wife and refused to comply with the agreement. A demurrer was sustained to the petition. By various amendments appellant set out facts showing his employment by appellee as a real estate agent or broker to buy the land for the latter, upon which an implied promise to pay for the services was predicated. Upon an issue joined upon the latter allegations the case went to trial before the circuit judge without a jury. The court found the fact to be that appellant was not representing appellee in the matter, but was representing other interests. We think the evidence sustains the finding.

Appellant complains on this appeal that the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to his original petition. However that might be, we are of opinion that by his subsequent amendment appellant elected to abandon the ground of suit asserted in the original petition, and elected to try out his case on the claim of employment and for compensation as buying agent for appellee. If it be conceded that he stated a cause of action against appellee in the original petition, and that the circuit court erred in sustaining the demurrer to it, appellant voluntarily abandoned that cause by asserting in the same action another cause of action inconsistent with the first. If both had been asserted in the original petition (as may in fact have been the purpose of the pleader), or if both had been asserted in the same action, one in the petition and the other in the amended petition, being inconsistent one with the other, the trial court should have required appellant to elect which of them he would prosecute. He did elect, by the practice he pursued, to stand upon the latter. Having lost that on the trial on the merits, he will not, on appeal, be heard to complain that the one he abandoned was his real cause of action, and that the court erred in its interlocutory rulings on the sufficiency of the pleading.

Appellant complains, also, that the trial court erred in rejecting certain evidence offered by him on the trial. The rejected evidence might have been relevant upon an issue joined upon the first cause of action attempted to be asserted, but was not relevant upon the one which was being tried, and for that reason was properly rejected.

Perceiving no prejudicial error, the judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF BARDWELL v. SOUTHERN ENGINE & BOILER WORKS.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 5, 1908.)

1. SALES (§ 286*)—WARRANTY—RIGHT TO RECOVER PRICES.

Under a contract of sale of an engine, with guaranty that the material and workmanship entering into it shall be first class, and that any defective part will be replaced without charge, the existence of defects not preventing the operation of the machinery, but which could be cured by supplying other pieces of machinery in place of the defective ones, will not prevent recovery of the purchase price, the purchaser, though having a report of its expert as to defects, failing, on demand, to give the seller in-

2. MANDAMUS (§ 112*)—CITY DEBT—COMPULSORY TAX LEVY—CONSTITUTIONAL LIMIT.

A city having contracted a debt, which, under Const. § 158, it had no power to contract, because its indebtedness already exceeded the limit fixed therein, its officers cannot be required to levy a tax to pay the debt.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 254*)—CONTRACTS—REMEDIES OF CONTRACTOR.

Where a city has bought an engine which it had the power to purchase, except that its debt already exceeded the limit fixed by Const. § 158, and as between it and the seller the latter, under its contract, has a lien on the engine for the deferred payment, the city, which will not, and cannot be compelled to, pay, may not, though using the engine as part of its electric light plant, retain it, and give the seller the option merely to rescind the contract, and return the partial payment made; but the seller may enforce his lien by sale.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Carlisle County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the Southern Engine & Boiler Works against the city of Bardwell. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Nichols & Son, for appellant. John E. Kane and W. H. Biggs, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. In June, 1905, the appellant city of Bardwell purchased from appellee an engine to be used in operating its electric light plant. It contracted to pay for the engine $1,550. Six hundred dollars of this amount was paid in cash, $450 in an old engine, and for the remaining $500 the city executed its note due in June, 1906. The note, as well as the contract, contained the stipulation that the city had received the engine from the Southern Engine & Boiler Works "with the express agreement and understanding that the title of said machinery is now and shall remain in the said Southern Engine & Boiler Works until the note is paid in full; and it shall have the right in case of nonpayment at maturity of said note, or at any time it deems itself insecure, or if the property is sold or removed from the district where located, to enter and retake immediate possession of said property wherever it may be and remove the same." The contract also contained the following guaranty: "The material and workmanship entering into the construction of this engine shall be first class in every respect, and any defective part will be replaced by us without charge. We also guarantee this engine to run smoothly with close regulation under varying loads and steam pressure and to be as economical in the use of steam as any engine of its class." Failing to pay the note at maturity, the appellee instituted this action against the city. It asked for judgment for its debt, interest, and costs, and that it be adjudged a lien on the engine to secure the payment of the same. To this petition the city answered that the engine was not constructed of first-class material, but that much of the material entering into its construction was defective in many respects, and also alleged that the workmanship was inferior, and that, by reason of these defects, the engine was not worth over $500 when delivered to the city. It made its answer a counterclaim, and asked that the note sued on be canceled, and that it have judgment over against the company for $550. To this pleading the engine company replied that it had repeatedly offered to fully perform its guaranty by replacing without charge any defective or inferior parts, but that the city had refused to permit it to do so, and it renewed its offer to fully perform its contract obligation. A rejoinder was filed by the city, in which it stated that it was willing to accept such an engine as the company warranted the engine purchased to be, but that, if the company would not do this, then it offered to rescind the contract, providing the company would return to it the $1,050 paid on the purchase price and surrender the note sued on. Subsequently the city filed an answer, setting out that at the time the contract was entered into, and the note sued on executed, it was indebted largely in excess of the constitutional limit as fixed in sections 157 and 158 of the Constitution, and that the indebtedness assumed in the purchase of the engine was unauthorized and the note executed as evidence of it void. The case, after being prepared for trial, was submitted to the court, and a judgment rendered in favor of the engine company for the amount of its note and interest; and it was further adjudged that, to secure the payment of the same, it had a lien upon the engine. Of this judgment the city complains.

In respect to the question that the city had no authority to purchase the engine because its indebtedness at the time exceeded the limitation provided in the Constitution, we may say that the evidence indicates that the contention of the city upon this point is correct. So that we will consider the case as if the city had no authority to buy the engine or create any indebtedness for that purpose.

Upon the issue presented as to whether or not the engine fulfilled the guaranty, the evidence is conflicting. Indeed, the weight of it tends to support the conclusion that the engine in some particulars, especially in material, was not what it was guaranteed to be. The engine was installed as a part of the electric plant in July, 1905, and the evidence shows that it operated the plant continuously from the time it was installed until the last depositions in the case were taken in the summer of 1907. Presumably the city as it superseded the judgment is yet using the engine for the purpose for which it was bought. Soon after the engine was installed, the city notified the engine company that the engine was not rendering satisfactory service, and pointed out several defects in its material and construction. In response to this letter, the company sent one of its agents to inspect the engine. After making an inspection, he reported to the company that the engine fully came up to the stipulations contained in the contract, and that he found no defects either in material or construction, although a number of witnesses who testified for the city, some of them being experienced machinists, were able to discover defects in both these particulars. It may, however, be here remarked that the defects in material or construction, although causing some inconvenience and annoyance, as well as additional expense, did not seriously interfere with the running of the engine, or prevent it from performing the work it was desired it should do. Subsequent to this, and before the institution of this action, in October, 1906, considerable correspondence passed between the city and the company in respect to other indebtedness of the city to the company, and also concerning the engine. Finally, in June, 1906, for the purpose of definitely ascertaining whether or not the engine fulfilled the contract, it was agreed between the city and the engine company that two experts, one to be selected by each of the parties, should examine the engine and report the result of their inspection. The correspondence between the parties leading up to the selection of these experts clearly shows the attitude of the engine company. In July, 1906, it wrote to the city that it was perfectly willing to make good any defects that existed in the engine, and offered to send an experienced and competent machinist to examine it and supply any defects, and stay with it until the city was satisfied that it was the kind of an engine the city bought. It further wrote that it sold the Coylls engine to be in first-class condition, and that was the kind it proposed to make it if it was not such. In reply to this, the city wrote that it wished to have a competent man go over the machinery with the expert from the company, and agreed to abide by what this man reported. In July, 1906, these experts met and inspected the engine. At this time it had been in use by the city for about one year.

The expert selected by the city reported to it as follows: "As requested by Mr. Ponder, a member of your board, I made an examination of the Coylls engine at electric light plant at Bardwell, Ky. I found it running smoothly and a steady light from lamp spoke well for speed regulation. The cylinder head and two of valve bonnets are honeycombed, and should be replaced by better castings. Your engineer said that (the engine was running and I could not examine it) the cross-heads come so close or strikes the gland when the stuffing box is full. This should be remedied by the builders before engine is accepted. He also complained that the stuffing box was back so deep in the frame that he could not get to it while running. This, of course, is annoying to the man running the engine, and may cause him to stop sometimes to adjust the glands; but I can see no remedy for this. Aside from the defective casting and the closeness of the cross-heads to the cylinder head, I consider it a well-built, substantial engine." The expert selected by the company made the following report to it: "Met Mr. Harrison, their expert from Cairo, this evening, and, after going over the engine into details, could only find a few minor faults as to defective castings. The only one we found was a cylinder head which had a spongy place in it about the size of a dime right in the fillet, which was disclosed by oil seeping through. Found the crank end stem broken across lower half of housing, would not say it broke from defective casting from nature of break. I would say was broken by being caught in some manner or dash pot rod had been lengthened out which would cause it. Found grab claws had been taken off and set crews put in, which makes them look very bad. The only other fault he had to find, and that was in the design, was piston rod nut ran too close to stuffing box. He suggested that we replace cylinder head, also face off piston rod nut, and stuffing box gland, which would give more clearance, and that he would make written report to board to that effect. In his opinion that would make engine first-class job; and I would suggest we furnish new pair of grab claws to replace those that have been ruined. Also set of die plates."

Immediately upon receiving the report from its expert, the company wrote the city the following letter: "The machinist sent by Southern Engine & Boiler Works to examine the engine sold you some time ago has returned, and made his report to the company. He reports that he found the engine in comparatively good condition, and for all practical purposes no defects in same that would in any way impair its usefulness. He reports that there is a defective casting in the cylinder head which will permit oil to ooze through; that he found that the grab claws had been taken off, and some set screws put in their place; and also the end of the crank where grab claws had been broken. I now write to say that a new cylinder head will be replaced and a new pair of grab claws put on, as well as a new crank end for Action by M. B. Wilson against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. J. A. Rardin, A. D. Cole, and W. T. Cole, for appellant. W. D. Cochran, Le Wright Browning, and J. G. Wadsworth, for appellee.

BARKER, J. The appellant, M. B. Wilson, instituted this action to recover from the appellee, the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company, damages for injuries accruing to him by his inadvertently stepping into a hole filled with hot water, by which he severely scalded his leg. His cause of action is based upon the alleged negligence of the corporation in leaving the pool exposed without guards to prevent the unwary from falling into it. Issue was made upon the alleged negligence of the defendant, and the contributory negligence of the plaintiff was pleaded in bar of his right to recover. The issues were completed by reply controverting the allegation of contributory negligence, and, the case coming on for trial before a jury, after the plaintiff's evidence was all in, the trial court sustained the motion of defendant for a peremptory instruction to the jury to find a verdict in its favor. To review this ruling, the plaintiff has appealed.

The appellant, M. B. Wilson, was employed by the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company as a watchman and engine tender at its roundhouse in Russell, Greenup county, Ky. The duties of his employment required his presence at the roundhouse from 6 o'clock in the evening until the same hour in the morning. At about 8 o'clock on the morning of December 31, 1906, Wilson left his place of work, and started to a restaurant outside of appellee's yard, for the purpose of getting something to eat. The restaurant to which he was going was not on appellee's property, nor owned or controlled by it. When at some distance from the roundhouse, and while crossing the railroad tracks in the yard, the appellant stepped into the hot water, with the result that his left leg was scalded and burned. The testimony shows that at the point where appellant was injured the water had accumulated into a pool having collected there by reason of leakage from a pipe which was used to carry steam from the engine room to the place in question, from whence it was conveyed by rubber hose to passenger coaches standing in the yard in order to warm them. Upon the night in question a Pullman car was standing upon the track, and from four to six feet away an engine was standing. Appellant attempted to go through the passageway between them, and while so doing stepped into the pool, and was injured as above set forth. The evidence for the appellant showed that the employés of the corporation were permitted, and did frequently go to the restaurant in question and get meals during the night. It will be observed that, while the relation of master and servant still existed between the corporation and the plaintiff, yet he was not in the active discharge of any duty he owed to the corporation when he left the roundhouse and went to the restaurant. He was going because he was hungry and desired a meal. The master was therefore at the time under no duty to watch over and guard him against any danger he might encounter on his way to and from the restaurant.

In principle this case is very similar to that of Smith v. Trimble, 111 Ky. 861, 64 S. W. 915, where it is said: "Appellant, a workman of a contractor preparing certain rooms of appellee's house, was injured by stepping onto a balcony leading from an upper porch to an adjacent room, when the balcony fell, precipitating him to the ground, and injuring him. It was not necessary to use this balcony in going to and from the rooms upon which he was at work, but he did use it, without the knowledge or consent of appellee, for his (appellant's) greater convenience in calling to a workman below. The falling of the balcony was primarily caused by its unsafe and weakened condition, unknown to appellee. * * * The question presented here is: What was appellee's duty to appellant under the circumstances? We are of the opinion, and so hold, that appellant while engaged in that work in using such parts of appellee's premises as were reasonably necessary to enable him to do his work was on the premises under the assurance in law by appellee that such parts so necessarily used were reasonably safe for the purposes of such use. But beyond that appellee owed appellant no duty greater than to a stranger or trespasser. And when appellant, without invitation or knowledge of the owner, went into or upon other parts of the premises not necessary for the performance of his labor, he assumed all the risks of doing so. He was neither required, expected, nor allured to be at the place where he was injured, and consequently appellee was under no duty to him to provide there a place of safety." In Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Hocker, 111 Ky. 707, 64 S. W. 633, 65 S. W. 119, it appears that the plaintiff, a telegraph operator in the employment of the railroad company, left his office and went out into the company's yard upon a call of nature, and while there was injured by the alleged negligence of the corporation in backing a train of freight cars upon him without giving any warning of its approach. In reversing the case, and directing that a peremptory instruction be given, the following language was used by the court: "In this case appellee had no other duties to discharge than to receive and dispatch telegrams at his place in the telegraph office. No duty to the company called him to its yard; and the fact that he had the right to cross the tracks at one place to go to the closet did not give him the right to cross where he was injured, or to use the track as a place to urinate, and did not impose upon the servants of appellant in charge of the switch train the duty to keep a lookout for him at that point. * * * It seems to us from the undisputed facts of this case that as appellee was not in his place of business, or in the discharge of any duty imposed upon him by his employment, the appellant company owed him no duty except to avoid injuring him after it had discovered his perilous position." In the case of Mitchell-Tranter Co. v. Ehmett, 65 S. W. 835, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 1788, 55 L. R. A. 710, the following facts appear: The plaintiff went upon the roof of the building in which the defendant operated its rolling mills for the purpose of making certain repairs there. He went at the request of a fellow servant during the noon hour. When he went upon the roof, he fell through a hole therein which had negligently been left open by other servants of the corporation. This court held that, although the general relation of master and servant was in existence at the time of the injury, yet, inasmuch as the plaintiff was not at a place where his duty called him, the corporation owed him no duty, and he could not recover for the injury sustained. In the case of Shadoan's Adm'r v. C., N. O. & T. P. R. R. Co., 82 S. W. 567, 26 Ky. Law Rep. 828, the facts were as follows: Two of the appellee's trains were standing facing each other and from 30 to 50 yards apart. Appellant's intestate, a brakeman upon one of the trains, had gone forward to throw a switch, and after doing so had climbed into the engine cab of the train to which he did not belong to get a drink of water, and while there was injured by the collision of the two trains. They, owing to some defect in the setting of the brakes, and being upon a rather steep grade, ran together. In that case we said: "Assuming that the collision of the trains was the result of the negligence of appellee's servants, we think the trial court ruled correctly in granting the peremptory instruction complained of. Appellant's decedent was on train No. 35 for his own convenience, and not in the discharge of any duty to appellee. In the case of the L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Hocker, 111 Ky. 707, 64 S. W. 638, 65 S. W. 119, one of the employés of the railroad company, for his own convenience, had gone between cars in its yard, where he was injured (it is alleged) by the gross negligence of its employés in backing a train against the cars between which he was standing. In the opinion it is said: 'It seems to us from the undisputed facts of this case that as appellee was not in his place of business, or in the discharge of any duty imposed upon him by his employment, the appellant company owed him no duty except to avoid injuring him after it had discovered his perilous position.' " In the case of L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Pendleton's Adm'r, 104 S. W. 382, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 1025, the following state of facts existed: The intestate was a young man in the employment of the railroad corporation in the car repair department. Being anxious to qualify himself for the position of brakeman, he voluntarily undertook to assist the yard crew in doing switching, and while so engaged was killed when riding upon a moving car which came in contact with another car which had been negligently left on an adjacent track. In the opinion rendered in that case, it was expressly assumed that the decedent, at the time he was killed, was assisting the switching crew by permission, and that he had often done so before with the consent of the foreman of the switching crew. It was also expressly assumed that, if the decedent had been in the discharge of a duty owed by him to the company, the negligence of the company was such that his administrator would have had a cause of action for the death of the decedent. In reversing the judgment, and denying the right of the plaintiff to recover for the injury, Judge Carroll, in writing for the court, among other things, said: "The trespasser or the volunteer who is injured in or about the performance of labor that he undertakes cannot look to the owner of the premises to compensate him for the injury or damage, unless it is inflicted after his peril is discovered. And when a person employed to perform certain services goes entirely without the line of his duty, and assumes the performance of other labors for his master, without his direction or authority, he occupies no better position than if the relation of master and servant did not exist in respect to any employment between them, as, when the master engages a servant to perform specified service, he is only responsible to him for some breach of duty committed within the scope or limits of the employment for which the servant has been engaged. Thus in Thompson on the Law of Negligence, § 4677, it is said: 'An employé who undertakes without the order or request of his employer, or the representative of the employer or contrary to his orders, or in compliance with the orders or requests of another employé who has no authority from the employer to give such orders or to make such a request, to perform work outside the scope of his employment or upon dangerous premises, where the terms of his employment do not require him to do or be, * * * is deemed to assume the risk attendant upon his voluntary undertaking, and cannot recover for injuries occasioned by any defect in the premises, machinery, or tools to which he thus voluntarily exposes himself. The reason of the rule is obvious. The master undertakes to exercise reasonable care to the end of keeping his premises, his machinery, his tools, and his appliances in a reasonable condition of

J. M. Collins, for appellants. M. Hargett, for appellee.

SETTLE, J. This suit was brought on four promissory notes of $500 each, executed by Mary A. Foley and William Foley, her husband, May 25, 1895, payable one, two, three, and four years from date, respectively, and each bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from date, "payable annually until paid." These notes were secured by mortgage upon real estate, and the petition sought the enforcement of the mortgage lien for their satisfaction. Mary A. Foley died before the institution of the action, and her infant children were made defendants therein, all duly brought before the court, and a guardian ad litem appointed to defend for them, who filed his report, showing that they had no defense to the action. Judgment was rendered in conformity to the prayer of the petition; and, as directed therein, the real estate covered by the mortgage lien was sold by a commissioner in satisfaction of the several notes referred to, the aggregate amount of which and costs of the action were $3,376.90. Exceptions were filed to the report of sale, but they were overruled, and the sale confirmed. The infant defendants prosecuted an appeal from the judgment confirming the sale, but this court affirmed the judgment of the lower court. Nearly a year after the filing of the mandate of this court in the circuit court, but before there was any distribution of the proceeds of sale, the guardian of the infant defendants appeared in court, and offered to file an amended answer and counterclaim, in which it was alleged that the judgment under which the real estate was sold contained usury to the amount of $248.04, and asked that the judgment be purged of this usury. The lower court, upon the objection of the appellee, refused to allow the amended answer and counterclaim to be filed, to which the guardian of the infants excepted; hence the present appeal, which presents two questions for consideration: First, did the court err in refusing to allow the amended answer and counterclaim to be filed? Second, does the judgment contain usury?

If the second question is answered in the negative, an answer to the first will be unnecessary. It is the contention of appellants that no installment of interest, which fell due after appellee had the right to enforce the collection of the note on which it was computed, should bear any interest; in other words, that only such installments of interest as fell due before the maturity of each note should bear interest. The notes sued on in this case provide that the interest shall be payable annually until paid. This provision in each of the notes fixes the rights of the parties, and authorized the court below to compute, as was done, the interest allowed by the judgment; that is, to allow simple interest, not only upon the principal, but also interest on each installment of interest for each year from May 25, 1896, until the date of distribution. Mastin v. Cochran, 76 S. W. 343, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 712.

RIFFE v. LIDDELL'S TRUSTEE et al.
(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 10, 1908.)
TRUSTS (§ 189*)—EXPRESS TRUSTS—RIGHT OF TRUSTEE TO SELL.

Premises were conveyed to a son in trust, on condition that his mother have a life estate, and at her death the premises to be sold and the proceeds equally divided among the four children, including the son. Thereafter the mother and son sold the premises and joined in a deed thereof, and it did not appear but that the price was adequate. Held, that the purchaser was not justified in refusing to accept the deed on the ground that the mother was still living, and the son had no power to sell.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Ann Liddell's trustee and others against Margaret Riffe. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. W. Hawkins, Jr., for appellant. S. W. Adams, for appellees.

NUNN, J. On the 26th day of December, 1901, Ann Liddell and her husband, Andrew Liddell, conveyed a certain parcel of real estate situated in the town of Erlanger, Kenton county, Ky., to their son, Andrew J. Liddell, in trust, on the following conditions: "To permit his mother, Ann Liddell, to occupy the said home and lot, free of rent during the remaining years of her life, at the end of her life to sell and divide the proceeds of the sale into four (4) equal shares, to wit, one share to Mrs. Anna L. Crozier, one share to Mrs. Clara J. Peal, one share to my son, Charles Liddell, and one share to my son, Andrew J. Liddell, all of which I depend upon my dutiful son, Andrew J. Liddell, to perform." On January 7, 1908, Andrew J. Liddell and his mother, Ann Liddell, sold this piece of real estate to appellant for the price of $2,680, and tendered to her a deed of conveyance in fee simple for the property, which she refused to accept on account of the condition contained in the deed copied above; that is because Ann Liddell had the right to occupy the house and lot free of rent during the remainder of her life; that she was still living, and the trustee, Andrew J. Liddell, had no power to sell it during her life. The lower court determined that the deed tendered to her passed a good title, and she has appealed from that judgment.

The conveyance to Andrew J. Liddell, trustee, placed in him the title to the property subject only to the right of his mother to occupy it as a home as long as she lived. His brothers and sisters had no title, either in fee or in remainder. They were only to have certain shares in the proceeds when it was sold. Ann Liddell, the mother of Andrew J. Liddell, joined him in this conveyance to appellant; and the deed contains the following language: "The said Ann Liddell joins in this deed for the purpose of conveying and releasing all interest she may have in said real estate and for the further purpose of releasing and waiving her right to occupy said property or lot as a home or otherwise during her lifetime as provided in the deed above referred to herein." We cannot see any reason why she cannot surrender her home which is provided in the conveyance referred to, and join in the conveyance; and it will certainly be to the interest of the brothers and sisters of Andrew J. Liddell, the trustee, to receive their interest in the proceeds of the sale at this time rather than to wait until their mother dies. There is no intimation in the record that the price to be paid for the property by appellant is not sufficient.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

UNITED STATES TRUST CO. v. POUTCH et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 10, 1908.)

TRUSTS (§ 191*) — CONSTRUCTION OF DEED — POWER OF SALE.

Under a deed to decedent as trustee for his wife and children, with full power of control, covering land paid for by him, and providing that he and "any successor appointed by him" could sell the property, on decedent's death without appointing a successor, the court could appoint a trustee to exercise the general power to control the property for the wife and children, but not to exercise the power of sale; that being a personal power vested in decedent and his appointees.

O'Neal & O'Neal, for appellant. Wm. J. Steinert, for appellees.

NUNN, J. Prior to the year 1900 Marcus Doerhoefer resided in the city of Louisville, Ky., with his family, consisting of a wife and several minor children. It appears that he purchased 19 parcels of real estate and caused the conveyances for same to be made to himself as trustee. The habendum clause of each of the deeds is in substance the same. We copy one of them, to wit: "To have and to hold unto the party of the second part the aforesaid tract or parcel of land, with the improvements thereon and appurtenances thereunto belonging, with covenant of general warranty and on the following trust, namely: The party of the second part shall take possession of and control of all the aforesaid property, collect the rents thereof, and after paying taxes and all other necessary charges against the same, including repairs, he shall pay the net income thereof to Mary Doerhoefer, wife of Marcus Doerhoefer, for and during her natural life, for the support and maintenance of herself and second party's children, and after the death of said Mary Doerhoefer said trustee shall use and expend the net income of said property, for the support and maintenance of her children; but said children shall not have the right to require or compel the second party to render or make any account or settlement of moneys received by him or expended by him, as such expenditures are left to his discretion, and the second party is hereby given full and complete power to sell said property, or any part thereof, or any of the investments, and reinvest the proceeds in any other property to be held on the foregoing trust, and has full power to sell any of the same for reinvestment, and the proceeds shall be reinvested in the foregoing trust, and the purchaser shall not be required in any event to look to the application of the purchase money. In the event of the death of the said second party and his wife and children without leaving issue, then the property herein conveyed shall revert to and become a part of the estate of said Marcus Doerhoefer, and the second party shall have the right by deed or will to appoint his successor in this trust, with all the powers herein given said trustee, and, in the event said wife should die before said Marcus Doerhoefer, then the property herein conveyed shall revert to and become the estate of said Marcus Doerhoefer, the said second party, and any successor appointed by him is given full, complete, and perfect power to sell and convey in fee simple said tract or parcel of land above described, or make any reinvestment, and the purchaser need not look to the application of the purchase money." Marcus Doerhoefer died intestate without naming any one to succeed him as trustee. His widow, for herself and children, filed an ex parte action requesting the court to appoint a trustee with the same powers as had the original trustee. The court granted this request and appointed appellant. Soon after its appointment it became doubtful of its power to sell the real estate and reinvest the proceeds, and of other powers and duties in connection therewith. It therefore filed this action to obtain the advice of the chancellor with reference thereto. The court appointed a guardian ad litem to represent the interest of the infant children, and he filed an answer controverting the power of the court to give appellant, the trustee, the right to sell and dispose of this real estate. The lower court sustained his contention, and appellant appeals.

The only question to be determined is: Is the power of sale and reinvestment given Marcus Doerhoefer, the original trustee, a personal power conferred upon him by reason of some special confidence reposed in him and to be exercised by him alone; or is it a power annexed to the office of trustee, and as such to be exercised by any one who might be appointed by the court to discharge the duty of the trust? To help elucidate this question it is necessary to consider how it happened that Marcus Doerhoefer was made the trustee with the powers named in the deed. It appears the vendors in the deeds were strangers to Doerhoefer's wife and children. They had no special interest in them. Marcus Doerhoefer paid the purchase price of the property and caused the deeds to be made with the language recited. He settled this property upon himself as trustee, with full power to manage, control, rent, and receive the rents for the benefit of his wife and children. This was a general power conferred upon himself, which the court could appoint another to perform at his death; but with reference to a sale of the property and a reinvestment of the proceeds the deeds contain this language: "The second party [meaning Marcus Doerhoefer] and any successor appointed by him is given full, complete, and perfect power to sell and convey in fee simple all or any part of said property." We construe this language as giving a personal power and discretion to Doerhoefer to make the sale, or to any one appointed by him, and in our opinion the court has no power to give the trustee appointed by it the right to sell this real estate, for the reason, as we understand it, the language of the deed in effect reserves this right to Doerhoefer, or to some one appointed by him as his successor in office. It is evident that, when he settled upon himself this property as trustee, he never intended that it should be sold, except by himself or some one appointed by him. See Berry on Trusts (5th Ed.) vol. 1, § 20.

The authorities presented by counsel for appellant do not militate against the conclusion reached. The opinion that seemingly comes nearest supporting his position is the case of Price v. Swager's Trustee, 4 S. W. 34, 9 Ky. Law Rep. 89. In that case, by the last will of Joseph Swager, O'Leary was appointed his executor and trustee, with direction to lay off certain lots and streets in a tract of 13 acres of land on a certain road in Jefferson county, and to sell and convey such portion or parts or the whole of said lots as may be considered beneficial to his estate, and reinvest the proceeds in improving the lots unsold, etc. O'Leary refused to accept the trust. One Hobbs was then appointed by the court to take the place of O'Leary, and was, by an order of court, given the power given in the will to O'Leary. Hobbs proceeded to divide the property and make sales of the lots; but one of the purchasers refused to accept his deed. This court determined that the deed was valid. Swager directed his trustee to do certain things. It is true that the trustee had some discretion about the details; but by the will he was given general powers and directions to do certain things. The other cases referred to by appellant are somewhat similar to the Swager Case. In the case at bar Doerhoefer retained in himself the power and discretion of selling the property, and stated, in effect, that no one else should have that power except the person be appointed by him.

For these reasons, the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

HARNEY v. FAYETTE COUNTY FISCAL COURT et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 10, 1908.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 780*)—PERSONS ENTITLED TO REVIEW—INTEREST IN SUBJECT-MATTER—DISMISSAL.

Under Civ. Code Prac. § 757, providing that, if it appear that appellant's right to prosecute the appeal has ceased, the appeal shall be dismissed, where, pending appeal in a suit by a taxpayer and resident of a county against the county fiscal court and the county jailer to enjoin the court from appropriating county funds for certain purposes, and compel the jailer to take charge of the courthouse and perform the acts required of him by law, such taxpayer became a nonresident of the county and no longer paid taxes there, the appeal must be dismissed.

R. S. Crawford, for appellant. Geo. R. Hunt, for appellees.

HOBSON, J. L. D. Harney, suing for himself and other taxpayers of Fayette county, brought this suit against the Fayette fiscal court, the members of the court personally, and the jailer of Fayette county, stating in effect in his petition that he was a taxpayer and resident of the county, and that the fiscal court was paying out annually a large sum of money for fuel, light, water, and other attention to the offices in the courthouse, without authority of law. He prayed that the fiscal court be enjoined from appropriating any of the funds of the county for these purposes, and that the jailer be required by mandamus to take charge of the courthouse and perform the acts required of him by law. The defendants filed an answer, in which they set out what they had done, pleading a special act of the General Assembly as their authority. The plaintiff filed a reply to the answer, the defendants demurred to the reply, the court sustained the demurrer, and, the plaintiff declining to plead further, the petition was dismissed, and Harney appealed to this court. After the record was filed in this court, J. T. Jones filed in this court his petition, in which he stated that since the appeal was granted Harney had become a citizen and resident of Lincoln county, Ky., that Jones was a resident and taxpayer of Fayette county, and that Harney had become a nonresident of Fayette county since the rendition of the judgment in the circuit court. Jones asked that he be made a party appellant, and that the appeal should stand for hearing as though prosecuted by Harney. This motion the court overruled. Thereafter the appellee entered a motion that the appeal be dismissed on the ground that Harney has no further interest in the matters litigated and has ceased to be a representative of the class of persons for whom he seeks redress. The case has been submitted upon this motion and on the merits.

An action under the Code must be prosecuted by the real party in interest, and where one person sues as the representative of a class he must be a fair representative of the class. As Harney no longer lives in Fayette county, and is no longer a taxpayer there, he is in no sense a fair representative of the taxpayers of Fayette county, whom he proposed to represent. He was a taxpayer of the county and a fair representative of the class when he brought the action; but, his right to represent the class having ceased pending the appeal, to allow him to prosecute the appeal would be to allow him to litigate a matter in which he has no interest. By section 757 of the Civil Code of Practice it is provided that, if it appear that the appellant's right to prosecute it further has ceased, the appeal shall be dismissed. As Harney's right to prosecute the appeal ceased upon his becoming a nonresident of Fayette county, the appeal, under this section, cannot be maintained.

We therefore conclude that the appeal must be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

CAWOOD v. HOWARD.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Oct. 30, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1042*)—HARMLESS ERROR—DISMISSAL OF COUNTERCLAIM.

In an action to quiet title, where it appeared that plaintiff's grantor, after conveying the land to plaintiff who did not record his deed, again conveyed it to defendant whose deed was of record, defendant alleged an unrecorded title bond obtained from the grantor prior to plaintiff's deed, and that defendant's deed was given in pursuance thereof. Both parties proceeded upon the theory that plaintiff, to recover, must show fraud of defendant and his grantor because defendant's deed was recorded before plaintiff's, and the whole case was developed on that issue. Held, that the dismissal of a counterclaim claiming defendant's ownership and asking judgment therefor, relying on the bond for title, was not prejudicial, since it was not necessary to plead the bond and deed to defeat plaintiff.

W. F. Hall, for appellant. J. G. and J. S. Forester, for appellee.

BARKER, J. This action was instituted by the appellee in the Harlan circuit court for the purpose of obtaining a judgment vacating a deed from Hiram Cawood to John Cawood, which was dated and recorded January 7, 1907, because it cast a cloud on his title to land described in his petition, and of which he claimed to be the owner. The facts are these: On the 25th day of August, 1902, Hiram Cawood, who was the owner of the land in question, conveyed it by deed to Nathan Howard, the appellee.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

This deed the appellee did not record until after January 7, 1907. Having ascertained that his grantor, Hiram Cawood, had conveyed the same land to his son, John Cawood, the appellee, as said before, instituted this action to remove the cloud from his title occasioned by the putting to record the deed from the father to the son. The defendant, John Cawood, answered, denying ownership of the property in plaintiff (appellee) and alleging that he had, for a valuable consideration, purchased the land from his father in 1901, and obtained a title bond thereto; that the consideration for the purchase was $250; that he did not at the time record the title bond, but, having paid the consideration, he subsequently obtained the deed dated and recorded January 7, 1907. Having interposed his deed and bond for title as a defense to plaintiff's action, he also alleged in the form of a counterclaim ownership of the land in question, and prayed that the property be adjudged to be his, and that his title be quieted. In this counterclaim he relied upon the bond for title, but did not make it an exhibit. The plaintiff took out a rule requiring the defendant to file the bond in question. The defendant filed a response which set forth that the bond was lost and could not be found. This response was adjudged insufficient by the court, and thereupon an order was entered dismissing the counterclaim. Afterwards the case came on for trial on the issues between the plaintiff and defendant as to the title of the former, with the result that the chancellor held the conveyance of Hiram Cawood to his son to be void, and that the property belonged to the plaintiff. From this judgment, John Cawood has appealed.

We do not find it necessary to enter into a discussion of the merits of the judgment of the court in dismissing the counterclaim because of the failure of defendant to file the bond mentioned in his pleading. The whole question of the relative merits of the two titles was necessarily tried out on the issue as to whether or not the plaintiff had a title to the land under his deed from Hiram Cawood, the common vendor. In order to establish his title to the land, the plaintiff was bound to show the fraud of the father and son in the conveyance of the land to the latter, because the son's deed was recorded prior to the recording of plaintiff's deed. Both parties acted upon this theory, and the whole case was developed on the issues joined, with the result, as before said, of a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. We are of opinion, therefore, that the court did not prejudice the defendant's position, even conceding that he wrongfully dismissed the counterclaim, as it was not at all necessary for the defendant to plead the bond and deed from his father to him as a counterclaim in order to defeat the plaintiff, assuming these documents to be without fraud and valid. In other words, we will consider the record as if the court had not dismissed the counterclaim, which is certainly all the appellant could demand on this branch of the case.

The question, then, remains whether or not the judgment of the court was correct in sustaining the validity of the deed from Hiram Cawood to the appellee, Howard. The defendant (appellant) insists that the petition was insufficient on demurrer because it failed to allege that the appellee (plaintiff) was in possession of the land at the time he instituted the action. This objection to the petition is based upon the theory that the plaintiff's action is brought under section 11, Ky. St. 1903, which authorizes a party owning and in possession of land to institute an equitable action to quiet his title. If the action is based on section 11, the objection is well taken, because the petition does not allege that the plaintiff was in possession of the land at the time he instituted the action. But the defendant is in error as to the action being instituted under section 11. The allegations of the petition show that the plaintiff's action is for a vacation of the deed from Hiram Cawood to his son, and to thereby remove a cloud from plaintiff's title. This is different from the action under section 11 to quiet title, although the effect is the same. The land in question seems to be wild, mountain land, which is in the actual possession of neither party; and therefore the plaintiff could not bring an action to quiet his title under section 11, Ky. St. 1903, nor could he bring a suit in ejectment against the defendant, because the latter was not in possession; and yet here is a deed duly recorded, the effect of which is to prevent the plaintiff from selling his land, and makes it valueless for that reason. Appellant's position, if sound, would present a wrong without a remedy. But it is not sound. The chancellor always had jurisdiction to vacate and set aside a fraudulent deed, and thus remove a cloud from the title of the rightful owner of land. And this is entirely independent of the statute, being a part of the well-known and firmly settled jurisdiction of equity. While this results in quieting plaintiff's title, it is not technically within the purview of the statute. This principle has been settled by this court in many cases, and is now quite beyond question. Fox v. Cornett, 124 Ky. 139, 92 S. W. 959; Asher, etc., v. Uhl, 122 Ky. 114, 87 S. W. 307, 93 S. W. 29; Herr v. Martin, 90 Ky. 377, 14 S. W. 356; Magowan v. Branham, 95 Ky. 581, 26 S. W. 803.

As to the merits of the case, we think the chancellor rightfully reached the conclusion that the transaction between Hiram Cawood and his son was fraudulent. The old man stands confessedly in a most un-envious light, because he has either defrauded his son or the appellee on his own statement; he having conveyed the same land to both parties for a valuable consideration from each. The original title bond was not produced, and the deed from the father to the son was drawn up several years subsequent to that of appellee. Appellee had no notice of the existence of the bond or the deed. On the other hand, we think the evidence that the son knew of the conveyance to appellee is sufficient to uphold the judgment. Appellee shows that the son lived only a half mile from the land in dispute; that after he purchased it he placed men upon it to cut the merchantable timber therefrom, and they were constantly engaged in the business of cutting and hauling the timber for some two years. It is impossible to believe that the son, living thus near, did not see and know what was going on; and, if he did, it is not believable that he allowed the plaintiff to cut off and carry away the timber, which was at that time, perhaps, the most valuable part of the land, in derogation of his right as the real owner thereof. The plaintiff testified that, before the defendant placed his deed on record, he tried several times to buy the property in question from him (plaintiff), and, this testimony is corroborated by another witness. Plaintiff also testified that Hiram Cawood, the common vendor, several times made propositions to purchase the land from him. We think it worthy of notice that John Cawood had the bond for title and the deed from his father to him recorded on the same day, and withdrew the bond at once, and that it was immediately afterwards lost. Both the witnesses to the bond were dead, and it can therefore be seen, if the defendant was seeking to defraud the plaintiff, he completely covered up detection arising from any obvious defect in the bond. The recording enabled him to produce a certified copy of the bond, in the handwriting of the clerk, and this could be used, as far as his purposes were concerned, with all the effect of the original bond; but it would entirely deprive the plaintiff of the opportunity to show that the names of the dead witnesses signed to it were forged, if such was the fact. On the other hand, if the transaction was fair and free from fraud, there was no necessity for placing the bond for title on record after the deed, which was the consummation of the bond, was duly recorded. The bond gave no notice that the deed did not give; and the fact that the son kept the bond, as he says, in his trunk during the several years prior to the day it was recorded, during all of which time it was extremely necessary to his interest to have it recorded, accentuates the fact that he deliberately recorded it at a time when it was not necessary that this should be done. The recording of the bond, however, was necessary on the hypothesis that a fraud was to be committed, and the original bond was to be lost to prevent inspection; for, as said before, it enabled the defendant to use a certified copy, which in the handwriting of the clerk, would present no defects, if such existed, which would appear on the face of a fraudulent bond. The fair face of the copy in the clerk's handwriting would tell no tale, and yet it would avail defendant to establish his case as well as the original.

Considering the intimacy of the relation of father and son, the extreme youth of the son at the time the bond was said to have been made, and all the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction, we are not willing to say that the chancellor erred as to the facts in reaching the conclusion that the transaction between the father and son was fraudulent and without real consideration. It follows, therefore, that his judgment vacating the deed from Hiram Cawood to John Cawood as fraudulent and void is affirmed.

JONES v. YANTIS.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 10, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 148*)—RIGHT OF REVIEW—PARTIES—PROPER PARTIES—ONE NOT A PARTY BELOW.

One not a party to an action below cannot appeal from the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 925; Dec. Dig. § 148.*]

2. MORTGAGES (§ 439*)—FORECLOSURE—SALE—EFFECT.

Appellant deeded property to a creditor, he agreeing by a separate writing to reconvey if she paid him a certain sum, with interest. Appellant thereafter was committed as a lunatic, and, the amount of the debt not being paid within the agreed time, the mortgagee conveyed to another, who brought ejectment against appellant's sister, who had possession and had been appointed as committee for appellant; her defense being that the deed was in effect a mortgage, that the notes secured were usurious, that she had furnished half the purchase price of the mortgaged property, and that appellant held it in trust for herself and her sister, which the purchaser from the mortgagee knew. The action was afterwards transferred to the equity docket, and a sale of the property was directed to pay the mortgagee's debt. Appellant was not a party to either proceeding below. Held, that the sale did not deprive appellant of her title in the house and lot.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 439.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fayette County. "Not to be officially reported."

Action by Margaret Thurman and husband against Maggie Jones and others to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for S. S. Yantis, directing a sale of the property, Lizzie Jones, who was not a party below, appealed. Appeal dismissed.

Henry C. Hazelwood, for appellant. B. T. Southgate and Chas. Kerr, for appellee.

NUNN, J. Appellant, Lizzie Jones, was indebted to several persons; S. S. Yantis being one of them. She obtained money from him with which to pay her other creditors. The whole amount of her indebtedness, including what she owed appellee, amounted to something over $1,500. She executed a conveyance to appellee of her house and lot in the city of Lexington, expressing the amount named as the consideration. At the same time appellee executed to her a separate writing, in which appellee agreed that if she repaid to him the sum named, with its interest, by a certain date, he bound himself to reconvey the property to her. Some time after this she was adjudged a lunatic and sent to the asylum. She left her sister and some other relatives in the house. The time named in the separate writing in which she was permitted to redeem the property lapsed, and Yantis conveyed the house and lot to Margaret Thurman and her husband, and they instituted this action in ejectment against Maggie Jones, the sister of Lizzie Jones, and the other parties in possession of the house and lot. Maggie Jones was appointed as committee for her sister, appellant, and she answered, setting up the writing executed simultaneously with the deed, showing in effect that Yantis only held a mortgage on the house and lot, and alleged that the note executed to Yantis contained usury, and also alleged that she had furnished one-half of the purchase money with which to buy the house and lot, and that Lizzie Jones, her sister held the title to one-half of the house and lot for herself, and held the other half as trustee for her, and further alleged that Mrs. Thurman and her husband, knew of this fact when they accepted the conveyance of the property from Yantis. The parties to the action, by agreement, had the action transferred to the equity docket, and a judgment was rendered in effect declaring the deed from Lizzie Jones to Yantis a mortgage and directing a sale of the property for the payment of Yantis' debt and interest.

Lizzie Jones, appellant, recovered her sanity, and returned from the asylum, and is prosecuting this appeal. She was not a party to the action in the lower court. Her first appearance is in this appeal. It is a well-established rule that one not a party to an action cannot appeal from a judgment rendered therein. We are of the opinion that the sale made under the judgment could not deprive her of the title to the house and lot.

For these reasons, the appeal is dismissed.

GEORGETOWN WATER, GAS, ELECTRIC & POWER CO. v. FORWOOD.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 6, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 285*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ACTION—EVIDENCE.

In an action by a servant for injuries alleged to have been caused in escaping from the master's telephone booth in which he was imprisoned, evidence held sufficient to go to the jury on the question whether his injuries were received as alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 285.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 102*)—DUTY TO FURNISH SAFE PREMISES.

While the master is not an insurer, he must use ordinary care to make the premises reasonably safe for the servant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 171, 173; Dec. Dig. § 102.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 107*)—DUTY TO FURNISH SAFE APPLIANCE—TELEPHONE BOOTH.

A telephone booth so constructed that the door cannot be opened from the inside is not a reasonably safe appliance for the use of a servant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTION—QUESTION FOR JURY—ORDINARY CARE.

Whether a servant imprisoned in a telephone booth which could not be opened from the inside used such care in escaping as might be expected of an ordinarily prudent person under the circumstances is a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 233*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ACTION—NEGLIGENCE.

A servant imprisoned in a telephone booth negligently maintained by the master, so that it could not be opened from the inside, may use reasonable effort to get out, exercising such care as might be reasonably expected of an ordinarily prudent person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 233.*]

6. DAMAGES (§ 132*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

Where a bookkeeper's forefinger on the left hand was injured resulting in a permanent stiffening of the finger, affecting somewhat the use of the hand, and he suffered intensely for several weeks, but continued to work for his employer two or three weeks after the accident, and the hand was healed and gave little trouble after 60 days, a recovery of $4,500 was excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. § 379; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

7. WITNESSES (§ 383*)—CONTRADICTION.

A witness may be contradicted by proof of his statements inconsistent with his testimony, but he cannot be contradicted by proof of statements as to collateral or immaterial matters, and hence testimony in a personal injury case that a witness for defendant had made a statement that the suit was nothing but blackmail was inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1224; Dec. Dig. § 383.*]

Nunn, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Scott County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Personal injury action by William H. Forwood, by his next friend, against the Georgetown Water, Gas, Electric & Power Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

Jas. F. Asken and Bradley & Bradley, for appellant. John W. Ray, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. The Georgetown Water, Gas, Electric & Power Company has its machinery on the first floor of its building and its office on the second floor. In October, 1906, William H. Forwood was the bookkeeper. His place of business was in the office, on the second floor. There was a telephone in the office, and it was a part of his duty to answer the telephone when the general manager was out of the office. He left at 6 o'clock in the evening. There was a telephone in the machinery room, and, when he left, it was his duty to cut off the telephone in the office and turn on the phone in the machinery room, so that the engineer could answer calls on the phone during the night. The phone in the machinery room was placed in a booth, so that a person using the phone could close the door and not be interrupted by the noise of the machinery. The door to this booth had an ordinary lock on it, but the engineer had taken off the knob on the inside of the door, and had put it on another lock in the room. This left no knob on the inside of the door to be turned in opening the door. Things had been in this condition for some months; the employees in the engine room when they had finished with the phone using a screwdriver or some instrument of that sort to open the door when they got through using the phone. Forwood had never used this phone, but on October 30th, after he had finished his day's work, and had started down through the engine room, he heard the bell in this booth ring. He went to answer the call. Somebody asked for a young lady who worked in the office. He said that she had left. He then rang off, and turned to go out, and could not get out. There was no knob on the door which he had shut in order to hear the person talking to him over the phone. He then rang the telephone, thinking that he could ring the bell on the outside, but it did not ring. He then called to the engineer, but could not make him hear. He tried to get the door open and could not do it. He rattled the door and tried to burst it open, and could not. Finally he got the booth loose from the wall and got out at the back. This he did by pushing for some time against the wall. After he got out of the booth, his left hand was hurting him a little, but he did not think much about it. He returned to his work as usual the next day. The bone in the finger began to ache, and the finger swelled, and about the 6th or 7th of November he went to a doctor about it. For some days before this he had been applying a liniment to the finger. On the 10th or 11th of November the doctor lanced the finger, and scraped the bone. He had suffered very intensely for several days before this operation, but he was somewhat relieved by it; but the trouble in the finger was not cured, and later the doctor took out two small pieces of bone, and two other small pieces worked out. The injury was to the left forefinger at the joint, and by reason of it the finger became stiff. He continued to be treated by the doctor until some time in February, when the trouble was healed, and he was left with a stiff finger. He brought this suit to recover for his injury; and, upon a trial of the case before a jury, a verdict and judgment was rendered in his favor, fixing the damages at $4,500, and the water company appeals.

The booth was a box something like three feet square and eight feet high, made of flooring plank; the door being made of the same material as the box. It was set against the wall, and set upon the floor with no bottom to it. The proof is conflicting as to whether or not the booth set up close against the wall, the proof for the defendant tending to show that there was a space between the edge of the box and the wall. The plaintiff testified that he did not think of calling the exchange, and asking that some one be sent to open the door, and that it got hot in the box before he pushed it out from the wall and got out. The defendant proved by a number of witnesses that the plaintiff said on different occasions that he did not know how he hurt his hand. The doctor who treated him also testified to this, but the plaintiff himself testified on the trial that he did not know how he hurt his hand in the box, but that he knew that he hurt it in there. We cannot say on this proof that there is no evidence that the injury was received by the plaintiff in getting out of the box. It is true the plaintiff in his direct examination did not say positively that he hurt his hand in the box, but he did make this statement on the cross-examination. It is also true that, when he was asked why he did not tell Dr. Lewis how he was injured, he said: "I didn't know for sure; no, sir." Taking the witness' testimony as a whole, there was a scintilla of evidence to go to the jury; for he testified that he noticed his hand hurting him when he got out of the box. The doctor found a small splinter in the finger which had been healthy before the injury. We cannot say on the evidence that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant. If the box fit close to the wall, and fresh air could not get into it as fast as a man could breathe it, it was not a safe place for a man to be shut up in; and the evidence for the plaintiff tended to show these facts, and also to show that in a short time a man would become unconscious if the box was close. The master is not an insurer, but he is required to use ordinary care to make the premises reasonably safe for the use of the servant. Under this rule a telephone booth should not be so constructed that it cannot be opened from the inside. The purpose of having the door was manifestly to shut out the noise of the machinery, and the plaintiff, therefore, properly shut the door that he might hear the person talking over the phone. When he found himself shut up in the box with no means of opening it, it was a question for the jury whether he used such care as might be expected of an ordinarily prudent person under the circumstances.

It is insisted, however, that the causal connection between the negligent act of the master in furnishing an insufficient booth and the injury received in getting out of it is broken by the intervention of the act of the party injured. In other words, it is insisted that his own act is the direct and immediate cause of his injury, and not the condition of the booth. If the plaintiff was fastened up in the booth he had a right to try to get out. His effort to get out was but the effort to escape from the box in which he was temporarily fastened up. He had a right to use reasonable effort to get out of the box, exercising such care as may be reasonably expected of an ordinarily prudent person. If the plaintiff's testimony is true, the primary negligence was that of the master; and the master cannot escape liability for any injury resulting from this negligence if the plaintiff used ordinary care.

The damages assessed are palpably excessive. The only permanent injury which the plaintiff received is the stiffening of the forefinger of the left hand, and, while this affects somewhat the use of that hand, a verdict for $4,500 is palpably excessive. It is true that he suffered very intensely for several weeks, but he continued to work for the water company for two or three weeks after November 1st; and the hand was healed and gave him little trouble after say 60 days. In N. N. & N. V. Co. v. Walker, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 175, a verdict for $1,250 was held excessive where one joint of the right thumb had been mashed off. In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Law, 21 S. W. 648, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 850, $2,000 was held excessive for an injury to the left thumb making amputation necessary. In L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Foley, 94 Ky. 220, 21 S. W. 866, $5,000 was held excessive for the loss of two fingers. Many other similar cases have been decided; and in a number of cases verdicts for less than $1,500 have been rendered in cases before this court for injuries more serious.

On another trial the court will omit from its instruction to the jury all reference to future pain and suffering, as there is nothing in the evidence to warrant the conclusion that future pain and suffering will be endured. The court will also on another trial exclude the evidence of J. P. Jackson as to what the witness Hauss said to him to the effect that the suit was nothing but blackmail. A witness may be contradicted by proof of statements that he has made inconsistent with his testimony on the trial, but he cannot be contradicted as to statements about collateral or immaterial matters. The statement of Hauss to which Jackson testified was but an expression of an opinion based on the information he had received, and it was no more competent to prove that Hauss expressed this opinion to Jackson than it would have been to have asked Hauss, when on the witness stand, if he did not then entertain that opinion. The opinions of witnesses are not material. They are to testify to the facts which they know. Loving v. Commonwealth, 80 Ky. 507; Kennedy v. Commonwealth, 14 Bush, 340; Ross v. Commonwealth, 55 S. W. 4, 21 Ky. Law Rep. 1344.

There was evidence that it was not in the line of Forwood's duty to answer calls on the phone in the engine room, but that this duty devolved on the engineer; and on another trial the second instruction will be modified so as to read as follows: "Unless the jury believe from the evidence that the injury to the plaintiff's hand was received in the booth, and was the result of the booth not being reasonably safe as defined in No. 1, and it was a part of his duty under his employment to answer calls on this phone, the jury should find for the defendant." In instruction No. 1 the court will omit the words "and built the same very tight," also the words "and was in fact almost air tight." In lieu of the words "and that such imprisonment was dangerous to his life or health," the court will use the words "and that such booth was not reasonably safe for the purpose for which it was intended." The court will also omit at the conclusion of No. 1 these words, "unless they believe that the plaintiff contributed to the accident by his own negligence as described in another instruction"; for this idea is expressed in the foregoing part of the instruction, and need not be repeated. In lieu of instruction 4, the court will tell the jury that, although the booth was not reasonably safe for the purpose for which it was intended, as defined in No. 1, yet if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, when he found himself shut up in the booth, did not use such care as may be reasonably expected of a person of ordinary prudence under the circumstances, and but for this would not have been injured, they should find for the defendant.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

NUNN, J. (dissenting). The evidence of J. P. Jackson as to what witness Hauss said was not introduced for the purpose of showing Hauss' opinion with reference to appellee's case, but it was for the purpose of showing the feeling and bias entertained by Hauss against appellee; and in my opinion it was competent for that purpose. Hauss had given damaging testimony against appellee, and appellee had the right to show that the witness entertained such bias to go to the credit of Hauss as a witness. To say of a party to a suit that he is engaged in blackmailing, is, at least, some evidence of a bias and ill feeling against the party, and the jury had the right to hear this evidence that it might understand what weight and credit to give the statements of Hauss.

Wherefore, I dissent from the opinion of the court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fayette County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by L. D. Harney against the city of Lexington. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. S. Crawford, for appellant. J. Embry Allen, for appellee.

HOBSON, J. L. D. Harney brought this action against the city of Lexington to recover damages in the sum of $2,000 for the flooding of his property with water. The circuit court sustained a demurrer to the petition. He declined to plead further, and the action having been dismissed, he appeals.

The material allegations of the petition are as follows: "Plaintiff says that he is the owner of three lots located on Carlisle avenue, in said city, and that on each of said lots is erected frame cottages. He says that he resides in one of said cottages and leases the other two. He says prior to the injuries hereinafter complained of said lots were dry and not subject to overflow of water, and were well drained by the natural surface and the ditches along said avenue. The plaintiff says it is the duty of the defendant to provide drains and means of carrying away the surface water and waters from rains and melting snow that may be and are collected into the ditches along the streets, and to prevent the same from being thrown onto the property of persons fronting and abutting on its streets. Plaintiff says that during the years 1907 and 1908 the said Carlisle avenue was, and now is, one of the streets in charge and under control of the defendant, the city of Lexington. The plaintiff says that during the latter part of the year 1907, and up to and including the present time, the defendant, through and by its agents, servants, and representatives, had neglected and failed to keep open the ditch or drain in front of plaintiff's property and adjacent thereto along said Carlisle avenue, but have allowed and permitted same to become filled and obstructed with earth, rock, and other debris whereby said drain or ditch was and became obstructed, and was not of sufficient capacity to convey and carry off the water and other substances conveyed and thrown into said ditch, and by reason thereof the surface water collected in said ditch was thrown onto plaintiff's property in and about his dwelling and tenement houses, and conveying thereon earth, mud, rocks, brush, and other filth and debris collected by the surface waters and thrown into said ditch or drain from the intersecting streets and property of others, covering up the grass, flowers, and his garden, overflowing his cisterns, injuring and damaging the gardens, coal and wood houses, and other outbuildings, leaving the ground wet and muddy, and creating foul and disagreeable odors poisoning the air in and about his residence, causing sickness to himself and his family, and rendering his tenement houses untenable and greatly affecting the market value of his property."

In Thoman v. Covington, 62 S. W. 721, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 117, this court said: "If the surface water accumulated at the point in question and overflowed her premises independent of any act of the city, she could not maintain an action against it therefor. The city must do some act which produces the injury to enable the injured party to recover against it. The sewers may have been inadequate to carry off the surface water which accumulated, still may not have had anything to do with it collecting at the point in question. To maintain an action, it was incumbent upon her to show that the sewers, not only failed to carry off the surface water so as to relieve her premises from it, but that they were the cause of it accumulating there." Again in Campbell v. Vanceburg, 101 S. W. 345, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 1343, the court said: "When territory within a city is permitted by the authorities to remain in the condition it was when annexed—in other words, if the city does not undertake to make improvements or changes or alterations in existing improvements, or to build streets, sidewalks, drains or gutters, or reconstruct old ones—it will not be liable for any damage caused by the overflowing of the premises, because, if it has not interfered in any way with the natural condition of affairs, the overflow cannot be attributed to its act. A city is not liable for its failure to make new improvements or alter or reconstruct old ones. It may leave things just as it found them."

It will be observed that the petition does not show that the city made the drain complained of, or that it did any act in relation to it. For all that appears in the petition which must be read against the pleader, the drain may have been simply a natural drain or slope of the surface of the ground, which took off the water until it became filled up with debris washed down into it. The city must determine when and in what manner its streets shall be improved, and, while it is responsible to the property owner for the damages done by insufficient improvements which it makes, it is not liable merely for failing to improve the street or for suffering it to remain in the condition in which it found it. The circuit court therefore properly sustained the demurrer to the petition.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barren County.
"To be officially reported."

Action by A. W. Pedigo against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. H. Moorman, Benjamin D. Warfield, and Sims, Du Bose & Rodes, for appellant. Baird & Richardson, for appellee.

SETTLE, J. Appellee recovered of appellant in the court below a verdict and judgment for $365 damages for injuries inflicted upon several horses, of which he was the owner, while in one of appellant's cars and being transported by it from Glasgow to Louisville for sale at that place. It was, in substance, alleged in the petition that the injuries received by the horses resulted from the negligence of appellant's agents and servants in charge of the car and train of which it was a part, and that its agents and servants "so negligently and carelessly operated and managed the car and line of railroad as to injure, lacerate, tear, bruise, scar, and damage said horses"; the amount of damages claimed being $500. The answer merely traversed the material averments of the petition.

There were but two issues made by the pleadings. (1) Were the horses or any of them injured, and to what extent, while in appellant's car and under its control? (2) If injured, were such injuries caused by the negligence of appellant's agents and servants charged with the duty of operating the car and train in transporting them from Glasgow to Louisville, and delivering them to the consignee in the last-named city? As to these issues, the evidence was all one way. It clearly established appellee's contention that at least four or five of the nine horses were injured after the arrival of the train in Louisville, and while they were still in appellant's charge.

Appellant insists it should have been granted a new trial, and that it is entitled to a reversal, because the recovery was excessive. The injuries consisted of cuts, bruises, and other wounds upon the legs, breasts, and heads of the horses, which were sufficiently serious and permanent to disfigure and lame some of them, prevent the sale of two of them, and compel the appellee to sell others at considerably less than they would have brought if uninjured. If a jury had been waived and the law and facts submitted to the trial judge for decision, he would probably have limited the recovery to a sum less in amount than was allowed by the verdict of the jury, but, while the amount of damages allowed by the jury was liberal, we are not prepared to say that it was so excessive as to indicate passion or prejudice on the part of the jury. On the contrary, in view of the evidence, we regard the verdict as the result of the exercise of an honest judgment upon their part. Hence we are not at liberty to disturb it upon the ground urged. Ky. & Ind. B. & R. Co. v. Nuttall, 96 S. W. 1131, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 1169; L. & N. R. Co. v. Mitchell, 87 Ky. 327, 8 S. W. 706; L. & N. R. Co. v. Smith, 84 S. W. 755, 27 Ky. Law Rep. 257. The manner in which appellee's horses received their injuries seems to be clearly shown by the evidence. Shirley, who was in charge of four horses of Warder, shipped in the same car with appellee's horses, testified that he rode to Louisville in the car with them, and that appellee's horses were injured after the train reached Louisville by the negligent and reckless handling or "kicking" of the car by appellant's servants in the switching yard after dark. He was strongly corroborated by Olliver and Phillips, both of whom were then present; Olliver being in charge of appellee's stock. According to the statements of all these witnesses, the car was "kicked" so hard that it knocked it several feet, jarred a man off a box in the car, threw Phillips and Shirley against each other, turned over a lantern, and broke an iron guy rod supporting the car. Shirley further testified that, when the car was "kicked," he heard a clattering among the horses, and that the injury to the car from the kicking was such that some repairing of it had to be done by appellant's servants before it could be removed to the proper place for unloading the horses, and not until they were unloaded did he, Olliver, and Phillips discover that they had been injured. It is manifest, therefore, that appellee's horses were injured by the kicking of the car at Louisville, and the evidence as to the manner in which it was done by appellant's servants amply justified the conclusion reached by the jury that in so striking the car they were guilty of negligence. So, in view of the evidence, appellant's contention that it does not support the verdict cannot be sustained. It is equally patent from the evidence that injury to the horses did not result from the causes for which the contract of shipment provides appellant shall not be liable, for it clearly demonstrates that the injuries they sustained were not caused by the inherent viciousness of the animals or any of them.

In Stiles, Gaddle & Stiles v. L. & N. R. R. Co., 110 S. W. 820, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 625, this court, quoting with approval from the opinion in C. N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Sanders & Russell, 118 Ky. 115, 80 S. W. 488, said: "And the rule as now established by the great weight of modern authority is that railroad companies are common carriers of live stock with substantially the same duties and responsibilities that existed at common law with respect to the carriage of goods, except that they are not liable as insurers against loss and injury resulting from the inherent nature, propensities, or proper vices of the animals themselves." So in Kentucky the rule is, as at the common law, that a railroad company or other common carrier undertaking to transport live stock becomes an insurer of its safe delivery, except where injury to or the loss of such live stock results from the act of God or the public enemy, or from the inherent nature, propensities, or viciousness of the animals themselves. In C. N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Sanders & Russell, supra, it was held that: "By section 196 of the Constitution of Kentucky they [common carriers] are prohibited from contracting for relief from any liability imposed upon them by common law. The provisions of the bill of lading relied on in the second paragraph of appellant's answer, that appellee should water and attend the stock at their own risk while in transit, and that they should send a man along to look after them, does not relieve the carrier from the duties imposed upon it by law to look after the stock. Their only effect is to shift the burden of proving negligence from the railroad company to the shipper." Ray's Negligence, 241; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Hawley, 10 Ky. Law Rep. 117; C. N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Grover, 11 Ky. Rep. Law 238. And we may add that the provisions of the bill of lading or contract relied on by appellant in this case as exempting it from liability did not relieve it of the duty imposed upon it by law to safely transport and deliver appellee's stock, in view of the evidence that the injuries they sustained were caused by its negligent manner of operating the train, and not from the inherent nature, propensities, or viciousness of the animals themselves.

We cannot safely say that the trial court abused its discretion in overruling appellant's motion for a continuance. The affidavit filed in support of the motion names only one witness, Hudson, the consignee of appellee's stock, and the statements attributed to that witness were permitted to be read as a deposition. The statement was made in the affidavit that there were other witnesses who would furnish testimony in behalf of appellant; but their names were not mentioned, or statement made as to what facts beneficial to appellant were in their possession. Appellant's chief complaint in the affidavit is that it had not been given sufficient time to investigate appellee's claim, or to prepare its defense. It appears, however, that appellee's claim was made known to it several days before suit was instituted, and fully two weeks before the beginning of the term of court at which the case was tried, but it does not appear that appellant took any steps, by the issue of subpoenas or otherwise, to procure the attendance of witnesses. It is not wide of the mark to say that appellant's counsel or agents ought at least to have been able to see the train crew or yard switchmen by whom the car containing appellee's horses was handled after its arrival at Louisville. They were doubtless in possession of such facts with respect to the operation of the car and condition of the horses as would have acquainted appellant with everything that was done in operating the car and delivering the horses to the consignee, yet the affidavit did not advise the court whether they were seen, or an effort made to see them. In brief, the affidavit was not sufficiently specific in its showing of diligence to justify us in holding that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing the continuance.

There were but two instructions given by the court. The first advised the jury in what state of case they might find for the plaintiff. The second defined the measure of damages. Both are substantially correct, though the first might have been made to present the law in more elaborate form.

Finding no cause of reversal, the judgment is affirmed.

O'Rear, C. J., and Nunn, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bath County.

"To be officially reported."

Proceedings between A. J. Thaxton's guardian and another and Ella Walters' administrator. From an adverse judgment, the former parties appeal. Affirmed.

McMillan & Talbott, for appellants. C. W. Goodpastor, for appellee.

SETTLE, J. Mrs. Ella Walters died June 5, 1907, in Bath county, Ky., intestate. F. S. Allen, by an order of the Bath county court, was appointed and duly qualified as administrator of her estate. She owned at the time of her death real estate worth $1,500, personal property of the value of $5,000, and was indebted to various persons amounting in the aggregate to $1,200. The intestate was twice married, and was survived by her second husband, Richard Walters, and also by a son born of the first marriage A. J. Thaxton. The latter being an infant, E. M. Ingle was appointed and duly qualified as his statutory guardian. In this case the infant, A. J. Thaxton, and his statutory guardian, assert against the administrator of the estate of Ella Walters, deceased, for the use of the former, claim to the articles of personal property declared by subsection 5, § 1403, Ky. St. 1903, exempt from distribution and sale, and directed to be "set apart to the widow or infant child or children by the appraisers of the estate of an intestate. * * *" The same subsection provides: "If there is an infant child or children, and no mother surviving, there shall be set apart for the support of such infant child or children, the articles aforesaid; and if such articles are not on hand, then other articles or money shall be set apart in lieu thereof; but in no case shall appraisers set apart to either widow, child or children, property or money in lieu of the articles allowed by law, of greater value in the aggregate than $750.00. Widows without children shall have the property aforesaid set apart to them, the same as if they had infant children residing in the family, except there shall not be anything set apart for the support of infant children, if there be none residing in the family with the widow. * * *" The administrator denies the right of the infant to the property claimed, and upon the issue thus formed, and a written agreement presenting the facts relating to the controversy, the case was submitted for the circuit court's decision. By the judgment rendered that court rejected the claim of the infant, and awarded the administrator his costs against the guardian; and from that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The question presented has never been passed on by this court, and, while the construction given the statute by appellants' counsel is plausible, we are forced to concur in the conclusion reached by the circuit court as to its meaning and effect, viz., that its sole object was to make an allowance to the widow and infant child or children of the intestate husband and father out of his property in addition to what they otherwise receive. Howland's Adm'r v. Harr, etc., 123 Ky. 732, 97 S. W. 358. When the statute in question was enacted, the husband, upon the death of the wife, became the owner of her entire surplus personal estate, regardless of whether she left issue; while she as the survivor took one-half of the husband's surplus personal estate, if he died without issue, but only a third of such surplus if he left issue. Perhaps this advantage given the husband and his presumed ability as the head of the family and legal custodian of his children to protect and support them caused the Legislature to omit from the statute the same special allowance out of the wife's personal estate to him and her children provided for the widow and children out of his property. The wife upon the death of the husband becomes the head of the family, and the duty that had previously rested upon the husband to provide a support for her and children falls upon her; but the deprivation to her and them by the death of the husband and father of the protection and support which he, as the head of the family, had been wont to provide them, and her presumed inexperience and consequent inability to perform as he had done the duties of which while living he had relieved her, doubtless gave occasion for the special provision made by the statute for her as widow, or, in case of her not surviving the husband, for his child or children. It will be observed, too, that the special provision made by the statute for the benefit of the widow and child or children applies to the exclusion of the husband's creditors, when his personal estate is insufficient to pay his debts. Since the enactment of the statute, supra, the law of this state with respect to the property rights of husband and wife have been so amended as to give the husband upon the death of the wife one-half of her surplus personal estate, and to her as the survivor one-half of his surplus personal estate. Section 2132, Ky. St. 1903. But this change does not repeal or conflict with subsection 5 of section 1403, which contains the provision setting apart certain property therein enumerated to the widow of an intestate, if living, or, if not, to his child or children. Whether the Legislature acted wisely in excluding the husband and children of the intestate wife from the benefits conferred by subsection 5, § 1403, Ky. St. 1903, is a matter we are not called upon to determine. The proper construction of the statute is all that concerns us, and we think its language allows of no other meaning than that we have given it.

If we were to construe the statute as counsel for appellants contend—that is, so enlarge its meaning as to hold that its provisions apply to the surviving husband, as well as the surviving wife of an intestate—such a construction would defeat the infant appellant's claim in this case; for the statute plainly directs that the property exempt from distribution or sale shall be set apart to the widow where there are no infant children of the intestate, or if there are children, and they do not reside with her. The property cannot be set apart to the infant child or children of the intestate where there is a "mother surviving." So if, for the purpose of arriving at the construction demanded by appellants, we were to substitute the word "widower" or "surviving husband" wherever the word "widow" occurs in the statute, and the word "father" where the word "mother" occurs, the construction would result in giving the property in question to Richard Walters, the surviving husband of the intestate and stepfather of the infant appellant, to the exclusion of the latter. An illustration of our meaning is furnished by the case of Alexander's Guardian v. Alexander's Adm'r, 86 Ky. 688, 7 S. W. 156. Lucien Alexander died, leaving his widow and a child five years old by a former wife surviving him. The child lived with its grandparents, and, when the appraisers were called on to set apart the exempt property, the circuit court required them to give one half of it to the widow and the other half to the infant. Upon the appeal this court held that the widow was entitled to the whole of the exempt property; and that, as the infant did not reside with her, it was not entitled to the property thus set apart or any interest therein, although it was but a stepchild of the widow, and she was under no obligation to support it.

After all, the question of whether or not the infant appellant would, if the mother had died a widow, be entitled to the exemption claimed, as against her creditors, is not here directly involved; but the main and direct question is whether the exemption allowed by the statute should be made to apply to the husband and children of the intestate wife, as it does to the widow and children of an intestate husband. To this question we have, and we think correctly, given a negative answer; but, as previously stated, had an affirmative answer been given to it, the infant appellant would not thereby be benefited as under the authority of Alexander's Guardian v. Alexander's Adm'r, supra, his stepfather would in that event be entitled to the exemption.

Finding no error in the judgment complained of, it is hereby affirmed.

Appel from Circuit Court, Breathitt County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by William M. Combs' executor against the Jackson Baptist Church. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions to dismiss.

A. H. Patton and J. M. Stevenson, for appellant. Kash & Kash, J. J. C. Bach, and W. W. McGuire, for appellee.

SETTLE, J. The appellee, Breck Combs, executor of the will of Wm. M. Combs, deceased, by an action instituted in the Breathitt circuit court against appellant, the Jackson Baptist Church, its trustees and congregation, sought to recover of the church a claim of $150 owing by it to the estate of the testator secured by a lien upon the church lot and building, and the further sum of $2,204.05, alleged to be due upon account for moneys loaned appellant by the testator, and all of which was expended in the erection of the church building. Judgment was asked against the church for both debts, and also for the enforcement of the lien upon the lot and church building in satisfaction of the demand of $150. Shortly after the institution of the action appellant paid and satisfied the lien debt of $150, and thereupon filed an answer denying liability upon the account of $2,204.05, and averring that the whole thereof was a gift or contribution from Wm. M. Combs to appellant for the erection of the church building. Depositions were taken by the parties, and the case otherwise prepared for trial in all respects as an action in equity, although the payment by appellant of the $150 lien debt eliminated from the case the only matter of equitable jurisdiction. Upon the hearing the circuit court gave appellee judgment against appellant for $1,712.29, with 6 per cent. interest from August 8, 1903, until paid, and costs, thereby in effect deciding that the difference between that sum and the amount of the account sued on had been donated by Wm. Combs to the church. Appellant complains of so much of the judgment as requires it to pay $1,712.29, interest, and costs; hence this appeal.

It appears from the record that the Baptists of the city of Jackson who were prior to the summer of 1902 without a house of worship then undertook the work of erecting a suitable brick church. Not being people of wealth, they found it necessary to yield to the very proper custom of accepting financial assistance from members of other churches and persons not connected with any church. Among those rendering such assistance was Wm. M. Combs, an aged and wealthy resident of Jackson, who, though not then a member, was a strong believer in the doctrines of the Baptist Church and a generous contributor to its various enterprises, particularly church erection. Mr. Combs became quite active in urging the building of the Jackson Baptist Church. At the beginning he, by deed, conveyed the church a lot for its house of worship valued at $300, donating to it one-half of this sum and retaining in the deed a lien upon the lot for the remaining $150. He was elected a member of the building committee, and, as the work of building the church progressed, dictated the policy of the committee, and practically controlled the arrangement of the building, its material, and cost. At such times as the committee was without funds he would pay the bills out of his private means, often telling them he intended the amounts thus paid as donations to the church. Before the building was fully completed, a series of revival meetings were held in it, following which the old man was received by baptism into the church, and his name enrolled as a member of the congregation. At one time he paid to a Cincinnati firm a bill of $300 for pews supplied the church, and at the same time also paid the cost of putting in the building two extra windows near the pulpit. Combs kept an itemized account of his expenditures on and for the church, interest being calculated on each item; and this account he delivered after the completion of the building to J. S. Head, cashier of the Jackson Deposit Bank, also a member of the building committee, without explanation of his purpose in so doing, or any direction as to the disposition to be made of it. The statement remained in the possession of Head for more than a year after the death of Wm. M. Combs, and until it was taken in possession by his son and executor, the appellee, Breck Combs, who brought suit upon it as previously stated.

The question for decision is: Were the various expenditures made by Wm. M. Combs upon the church building contained in the statement referred to donations or gifts to the Jackson Baptist Church, or merely loans it was expected to repay? We must, of course, look to the evidence for an answer to this question. The only competent evidence furnished by the record strongly conduced to prove that all the expenditures made by Wm. M. Combs upon the church building in question were intended by him as donations or gifts to the Jackson Baptist Church. Several witnesses testified that he more than once, in substance, declared during the work of erection that the expenditures were gifts from him. Some of these declarations accompanied payments of money expended by him on the building, while others did not; but practically all were made while the building was under way and in conversations with respect to such matters as the cost of it, where the money was to be obtained to complete it, or how much had been or would be contributed by him. A notable instance of such declaration of a gift was made by the donor when he paid for the pews and extra windows. His attorney of years' standing, McGuire, in his deposition admits this payment was a gift.

Besides, several of appellant's witnesses, who were present when the pews were paid for, so testified. Indeed, the circuit court refused to give appellee judgment against appellant for the amounts expended by Combs upon the pews and extra windows upon the ground that they were gifts. Yet we find these items with all other expenditures made by Combs to the church building charged upon the statement left by him with Head. If the sums expended upon the pews and extra windows, appearing as charges on the account against appellant, were nevertheless, as proved and admitted, gifts, what reason is there for concluding that the other items of charge contained in the account were not also gifts?

In addition to the evidence referred to, such witnesses as Revs. J. B. Bow, A. S. Patry, and G. W. Argabright, all ministers of high standing in the Baptist Church, testified that in conversations with Mr. Combs shortly before and just after the completion of the church he, in substance, told them that what he had expended thereon had been donated, or that the church would not be called on to pay it. To Mr. Argabright he explained that he had to make his children believe he had loaned the church the money he expended on the building, but that he was in fact giving it to the church. With Dr. Bow, his intimate friend Bailey, who served with him upon the building committee, and his nephew, G. P. Combs, a deacon of the Jackson Baptist Church, Wm. M. Combs agreed that he would make a gift to the church of what he had expended and would expend upon it, if they would erect a marble slab upon its wall containing the words: "Wm. M. Combs Baptist Church." They promised to do this, and did in fact afterwards place the marble slab in the wall containing the indicated inscription. To W. H. Whittaker, a barber into whose shop Wm. M. Combs went with a bundle of papers in his hand, he said he had just been to the bank to discount some notes that were outstanding against the Baptist Church; that the people were afraid they were going to lose the church, but that they need not be afraid, (for) he intended giving it to them; that he built one small meetinghouse in the country named for him, and wanted a larger one in town. It appears from the evidence that Combs had several years previously helped to build a country Baptist church which contains a tablet with an inscription similar to that on the tablet placed in the wall of the Jackson church; and that in erecting the country church he had kept, as in the building of the Jackson church, an itemized account of the sums contributed by him to the work, which was all given the church. It is a singular fact that, though Mr. Combs kept a ledger or account book in which entries were made of his many business transactions, no entries were ever made therein of the sums he expended upon the Jackson Baptist Church. They seemed to have been kept wholly upon the sheet of paper he handed Head of the building committee. Why was this amount kept upon a sheet of paper, and not upon his books, and why was the sheet of paper containing the account handed to Head with them, or in whose bank he had no other papers? There is some force in the argument advanced by counsel for appellant that the statement was simply to show the church the amount he had put in the building, and that it was never entered upon his ledger because he did not wish his executor upon coming into possession of the ledger to find it there, and think it his duty to collect it. The only evidence introduced by appellee that tends in any way to show that the sums expended by Wm. M. Combs upon the Jackson church were loans, instead of gifts, were the statements found in the depositions of some of his children and those of McGuire and Snowden, to the effect that the decedent had in conversations with them declared them loans. The purpose of these declarations was explained by the deposition of Minister Argabright to whom the decedent said that he had, in order to satisfy his children, allowed them to think the sums he had given the church loans. The lower court very properly sustained exceptions to what the witnesses named said as to these declarations of decedent for such self-serving declarations, unless made in the presence of the opposite parties, were no more competent in behalf of the executor than they would be in behalf of the decedent, if living. Clv. Code Prac. § 606; N. Y. Life Ins. Co. v. Johnson's Adm'r, 72 S. W. 762, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1867, and cases there cited. In view of the exclusion of the evidence of these declarations of the decedent, we are at a loss to know upon what the lower court based its judgment; for all other evidence in the case authorized a judgment in behalf of appellant, as it clearly manifested such acts and declarations on the part of the decedent, accompanying and following the expenditures upon the Jackson church, as proved that they were gifts and were accepted by the church as such. In addition, it was not unreasonable that the decedent should have made so generous a contribution to the erection of the Jackson Baptist Church. He had reached a ripe old age, accumulated a large estate, liberally provided for his children, and had still more to leave them; and having lived out of the church until the last year of his life, it was but natural that he should have desired to do large things for the church of his choice before being overtaken by death. According to the evidence, he felt great pride in what he had done for the church, and was gratified beyond measure that the congregation placed in the wall of the church a tablet of marble that would perpetuate the memory of his generosity as long as the Jackson Baptist Church may exist.

Being of the opinion that the judgment of the lower court is against the weight of the evidence, it is hereby reversed and cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the petition.

CONNOR v. NATIONAL ROOFING & SUPPLY CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—REVIEW—VERDICT—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

A verdict on conflicting evidence as to the meaning of an ambiguous phrase in a contract, introduced without objection of appellant, and on proper instructions, will not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3935; Dec. Dig. § 1002.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 146*)—ACTIONS FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT—COUNTERCLAIM—ALLEGATION OF DAMAGE.

In an action on a building contract by a subcontractor against a general contractor, a counterclaim, merely alleging that plaintiff did not do its work according to the contract, and that defendant was damaged thereby in a certain sum, without alleging how he was damaged, does not state a cause of action, since under the rule that every intendment in a pleading is taken against the pleader, it must be assumed that the one for whom the work was done accepted and paid defendant for it without requiring him to make good the defects, in view of which defendant would sustain no damage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 294-296; Dec. Dig. § 146.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 8*)—CONCLUSIONS.

An allegation that plaintiff was damaged in a stated sum is a mere conclusion.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, Third Division.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by the National Roofing & Supply Company against J. W. Connor. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Morton K. Yonts, for appellant. William W. Crawford, for appellee.

BARKER, J. This action was instituted by the National Roofing & Supply Company, a corporation engaged in the business of roofing and concrete construction work, against J. W. Connor, for a balance of $1,504.98, alleged to be due it from him under a written contract. Connor is a general contractor, who had obtained the contract for building the West Louisville Brewery. In the summer of 1905 he requested bids of appellee on certain portions of his work, with the result that the following contract in writing was entered into between the parties litigant: "Louisville, Ky., Aug. 18/05. Mr. J. W. Connor, City—Dear Sir: Revised Bid for the West Louisville Brewery. We propose, confirming our conversation and verbal contract of this morning, to erect the Hollow Tile on Floors and Insulation Walls, to emplace a 1" thickness of pitch over same, to plaster the walls, construct concrete foundation walls, concrete walls for machinery, cinder concrete floors, reinforced concrete walls, reinforced concrete floors with asphalt top and gravel concrete floor, according to the plans and specifications prepared for the same, for the sum of five thousand and seventy-eight dollars and eighty cents ($5,078.80). It is further agreed that if the sand and concrete gravel can be purchased for a less sum than $1.10 for sand and $1.25 for gravel per cubic yard, the difference is to be credited to Mr. J. W. Connor. Respectfully submitted, National Roofing & Supply Co., per R. M. Turpin." Appellee alleged in its petition that it had performed all of its contract with appellant, and that the latter had paid it all of the contract price except the sum of $1,504.98, which he refused to pay, and which it alleged was due and unpaid. Appellant in his answer denied the full completion of the contract by appellee, and traversed the indebtedness as alleged in the petition. In the second paragraph he alleged that the work done by appellee was so unskillfully performed that the asphalt and cement work cracked and leaked, and the floors were not laid with the proper pitch so as to carry off the water to the drain pipes, and that by reason of this defect the water stood in pools upon the floor. Several other defects were minutely pointed out, by all of which he alleged that he had been damaged in the sum of $3,000, which he set up as a counterclaim, and for which he prayed judgment. The appellee placed in issue the affirmative allegations of the answer, and a trial before a jury resulted in a judgment in favor of the appellee for $1,504.98, credited by $500 allowed as damages on the counterclaim.

The appellant's defense that the appellee did not complete its contract according to the terms of the writing sued on is based upon a difference of construction of the paper by the respective parties to it. The following words of the contract contain the matter of contention: "To erect the hollow tile on floors and insulation walls." Appellee construes these words to mean that he was to erect the hollow tile on the floors and the hollow tile on the insulation walls; whereas the appellant contends that the words mean that appellee was to erect the hollow tile on the floors and to erect the insulation walls. If the appellee's construction is correct, then it is not seriously denied that it has fulfilled its part of the contract in so far as the completion of the work is concerned; but if the appellant's construction is correct, then it is admitted that the appellee has not completed the contract according to its terms. While we think it would be difficult for appellant to show that the words in question do not plainly mean what the appellee contends for, we need not stop here to investigate that question. Evidence for and against the respective contentions was introduced without objection, certainly not from the appellant, and the court instructed the jury correctly, as is expressly admitted by appellant in his brief, and they found in favor of the contention of appellee. We think their verdict is clearly right; but, if we were less sure of the soundness of that position, we would not feel at liberty to invade the province of the jury, who were properly instructed, as is admitted, and who found adversely to appellant.

On the subject of the counterclaim the appellant obtained a judgment for $500. He was not entitled, under his pleading, to recover anything, as his counterclaim clearly fails to state a cause of action against appellee, and the court should not have submitted his right to recover to the jury; but, as appellee is not complaining of this error, we need not linger upon it. The allegations as to the counterclaim are as follows: "The defendant states that pursuant to said contract of date August 18, 1905, the plaintiff undertook to do the work of construction of the hollow tile on the floors of the West Louisville Brewery, but has failed and refused to construct and build the said hollow tile in said floors in accordance with the terms of said specifications and plans, and has failed to construct the said hollow tile in said floors in a skillful and workmanlike manner, and has so constructed the said hollow tile in said floors that the floors have cracked and become uneven, and large fissures have appeared in the said floor; that the said floors have no fall to the drainage, but in many places conduct the water away from the drains, thereby forming cesspools instead of conducting the water toward the drain, and the plaintiff has failed and refused to place any coves around the walls of said building, as required by the plans and specifications, and has failed to erect the cove around the columns, as required by said plans and specifications, to prevent the water running through the same, and has failed and refused to construct the foundation in the way and manner required by said plans and specifications, and has so laid and constructed the said foundation in such an unskillful and unworkmanlike manner that the same are badly cracked, and has damaged the said building thereby, and defendant states that the plaintiff has broken the terms of his contract and agreement in the failure to carry out the said contract in the way and manner and in the details above mentioned, and has thereby damaged the defendant in the sum of $3,000, and defendant states that this claim arises out of the said original contract, by reason of the unskill-ful and unworkmanlike and improper manner of carrying out the terms of said contract, which he has lately discovered, and is now able for the first time to show in pleading and proof, and that defendant has been damaged thereby in the sum of $3,000, and defendant makes this answer his counterclaim over against the plaintiff in the sum of $3,000, and prays that plaintiff's petition be dismissed, and for judgment over against it in the sum of $3,000, for his costs herein, and for all other proper relief."

Now, bearing in mind that the appellant, Connor, was the general contractor, and the appellee, the roofing company, was a subcontractor for a part of the work, it is perfectly plain that the foregoing allegations do not state a cause of action against the appellee. It is true he alleges certain defects in the work, which he specifically points out, and also alleges that this defective work has damaged him in the sum of $3,000. But how has it damaged him? He does not allege that the West Louisville Brewery Company did not accept the defective work and pay him for it; and, for ought that appears to the contrary, the brewery company may not have considered the work defective at all, and it may have paid the general contractor, Connor, every dollar of the contract price, and yet every word of the counterclaim may be true. Under the well-settled rule of pleading that every intendment is taken against the pleader we must assume that the brewery company has received and paid for the work, because of the failure of the appellant to allege that it has not done so. There is no allegation in the pleading tending to show that the appellant has been called on to make good the bad work of the roofing company, or that he will be called on so to do. The allegation, that the defendant has been damaged in the sum of $3,000 is a mere conclusion of the pleader, and avails him nothing on this issue. The appellant got $500 more than he deserved, and has nothing of which to complain.

Judgment affirmed.

TUCKER v. WITHERBEE et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 6*)—DEED AS MORTGAGE—"MORTGAGE"—"CONDITIONAL SALE."

A deed was a mortgage, and not a conditional sale, where it was given to secure payment for a horse, recited a consideration of "$110 cash or its equivalent," a horse, describing it, contained the ordinary recitals of a warranty deed, and recited that the grantee should hold the land for 1½ years and reconvey on payment of $118.00 "being purchase price hereof and necessary recording fee."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

2. MORTGAGES (§ 6*)—DEED AS MORTGAGE.

While parties competent to contract can agree upon terms that will amount to a conditional sale, where a deed is intended to secure a debt, and the relation of debtor and creditor exists between the parties, the legal inference is that a mortgage and not a conditional sale was intended; courts being inclined in doubtful cases to treat a transaction as a mortgage rather than a conditional sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

3. MORTGAGES (§ 608½*)—DEED AS MORTGAGE—ESTOPPEL.

Though a deed was given in 1893 and provided for a reconveyance within 1½ years, the grantor was not estopped by laches in 1907 to sue to have the deed adjudged to be a mortgage, his failure to tender the debt and demand a reconveyance being no more important than the grantee's laches in failing to sue to enforce his lien.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1815; Dec. Dig. § 608½.*]

4. MORTGAGES (§ 608½*)—DEED AS MORTGAGE—TENDER OF DEBT—NECESSITY FOR.

In suing to have a deed adjudged to be a mortgage, grantor need not tender the amount of the debt, since the grantee has a lien as security for his debt, and may look to that if grantor is insolvent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1815; Dec. Dig. § 608½.*]

5. QUIETING TITLE (§ 12*)—POSSESSION OF LAND—NECESSITY FOR.

That plaintiff is not in possession of the land does not prevent him from suing to have a deed adjudged to be a mortgage, to cancel a deed by the grantee to a third party, and to quiet plaintiff's title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Chancery Branch, First Division.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Ed. Tucker against S. O. Witherbee and another. From a judgment dismissing the petition, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Kinney & Thomas, for appellant. O'Neal & O'Neal, Helm & Helm, and Benjamin D. Warfield, for appellees.

CARROLL, J. In 1893 Tucker purchased a horse from Witherbee for $110. To secure the payment of this sum, he executed to Witherbee a deed, conveying to him a small parcel of land. The deed recites: "The said party of the first part for and in consideration of $110.00, cash, or its equivalent, to wit: one sorrell mare blazed face and both hind feet white, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, does hereby sell, grant and convey to the party of the second part, his heirs and assigns forever, the following described property, to wit: * * * To have and to hold the same with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging unto the party of the second part, his heirs and assigns forever; and the said party of the first part hereby warrants the title to the property hereby conveyed unto the said second party, his heirs and assigns forever. It is further agreed by the parties hereto that said Tucker is to pay taxes due on said land for 1892, 1893, 1894, and recording fee of this deed. The said Witherbee hereby agrees to hold said land for one year and a half, and to sell same to Tucker at the end thereof, provided he shall then pay him cash $118.60, being purchase price hereof and necessary recording fee." This instrument was in due time put to record in the proper office. In 1904 Witherbee sold a part of this land to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. In 1907 Tucker brought this action against Witherbee and the railroad company, setting up that he was the owner of the land and entitled to the possession of it, and asking that the deed made to the railroad company be canceled, that his title be quieted, and that Witherbee be required to answer and assert any lien he had against the land.

At the time Tucker executed the deed to Witherbee the land was uninclosed, and no person resided on it. Nor was any of it inclosed at any time until the railroad company inclosed the part purchased by it. A general demurrer was sustained to the petition, and, declining to plead further, judgment was rendered dismissing it.

The appellant Tucker insists that the writing was a mortgage, and that Witherbee's remedy was the same as that of any other mortgagee; that if he wished to collect his debt, he should have brought suit to enforce his lien upon the land. The contention of appellees is that the writing was a conditional sale, with the privilege upon the part of Witherbee to redeem the land at any time before the expiration of 18 months from the date of the writing, and, having failed to redeem it within that time, the title vested in Witherbee. The relation of debtor and creditor existed between the parties at the time the writing was executed. It shows on its face that it was intended merely as security for the purchase price of the horse, and that it was contemplated by the parties that this price should be paid within the time named. The paper has many of the distinguishing features of a mortgage, and we think it was in fact so intended to be. In doubtful cases the inclination of the courts is to consider the transaction a mortgage rather than a conditional sale, because such construction will more frequently attain the ends of justice and prevent oppression. It is safer to say that a paper having the characteristics of a mortgage is in fact a mortgage than to say it is a conditional sale; and the courts will not look around for reasons in case of doubt to construe a paper to be a conditional sale, when it can with as much, if not more, propriety be said to be a mortgage. The question is in many cases a very narrow one, and often the line between conditional sales and mortgages is not well defined. There is no doubt that parties competent to contract can agree upon terms that will amount to a conditional sale, as is illustrated by the case of Prince v. Bearden, 1 A. K. Marsh. 169, and Conway v. Alexander, 7 Cranch (U. S.) 218, 3 L. Ed. 821. But, where the instrument is intended as security for the payment of a debt, and the relation of debtor and creditor exists between the parties, the legal inference is that a mortgage, and not a conditional sale, was intended. The rule is very well stated in Boone on Mortgages, § 39: "A court of equity will often pronounce that to be an equitable mortgage which at law would be considered a conditional sale, and in all doubtful cases a contract will be construed to be a mortgage rather than a sale, because such a construction would be most apt to attain the ends of justice and prevent fraud and oppression. As a general rule, a deed absolute in form, if intended to secure the payment of money, and the relation of debtor and creditor exists between the grantor and the grantee at the time of its execution, will be treated as a mortgage. But, where no such relation exists, and the grantor and grantee at the time of the execution of the deed agree in writing that the grantor shall have the option to repurchase in a given time at a certain price, the transaction will be deemed a conditional sale. Each case of this character must, however, be decided in view of the peculiar circumstances which belong to it, since the only safe criterion is the intention of the parties." And so in Jones on Mortgages, § 258, it is said: "Whether a conveyance is a mortgage or a conditional sale must be determined by a consideration of the peculiar circumstances of each case. A glance at the numerous adjudications in controversies of this kind will suffice to show that each case must be decided in view of the peculiar circumstances which belong to it and marks its character, and the only safe criterion is the intention of the parties to be ascertained by considering their situation and the surrounding facts, as well as the written memorials of the transaction." In Honore v. Hutchings, 8 Bush, 687, the court used this language: "The distinction between a conditional sale and a mortgage as drawn by Greenleaf is that 'where the debt forming the consideration of the conveyance still subsists, or the money is advanced by way of a loan, with a personal liability on the part of the borrower to repay it, and by the terms of the agreement the land is to be reconveyed on payment of the money, it will be regarded as a mortgage; but, where the relation of debtor and creditor is extinguished, or never existed, there a similar agreement will be considered as merely a conditional sale.'" In Tygret v. Potter, 97 Ky. 54, 29 S. W. 976, in considering the question whether a writing evidenced a conditional sale or a mortgage, the court said: "It is often difficult to determine the intent of the parties with reference to conveyances of this character. It is a well-settled rule of equity that, when doubt arises as to whether the writing is a sale or mortgage, that doubt is resolved in favor of the debtor and the writing construed to be a mortgage." To the same effect is Edrington v. Harper, 3 J. J. Marsh. 353, 20 Am. Dec. 145; Sebree v. Thompson, 104 S. W. 781, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 1146.

It is also urged in support of the judgment below that Tucker was guilty of such laches as amounts to an estoppel or waiver upon his part of the right to insist that the paper shall be construed to be a mortgage. It is true that Tucker might at any time have tendered the money which the conveyance secured and demanded a reconveyance, but his failure to do this does not estop him. His laches was not any greater than that of Witherbee, who might at any time have brought suit to enforce his lien and obtained a sale of the land to satisfy his debt.

Nor was it necessary that Tucker in bringing this suit or before should have tendered the amount due Witherbee. Witherbee has a lien as security for his debt, and may look to that if Tucker is insolvent. Nor is the point well taken that the action cannot be maintained, because Tucker, although suing in part to quiet his title, was not in possession of the land. The relief sought in part is a cancellation of the deed made by Witherbee to the railroad company, and upon this point we deem it sufficient to cite the cases of Herr v. Martin, 90 Ky. 377, 14 S. W. 356; Packard v. Beaver Valley L. & M. Co., 96 Ky. 249, 28 S. W. 779; Eversole v. Virginia Iron, Coal & Coke Co., 122 Ky. 649, 92 S. W. 593; Fox v. Cornett, 92 S. W. 959, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 246.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the petition, and for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

COMLEY et al. v. AMERICAN STANDARD ASPHALT CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 10, 1908.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 487*)—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENTS—REAPPORTIONMENT—PURCHASERS—LIABILITY.

Purchasers of land, after payment of a street assessment against it cannot complain of a reapportionment, resulting in an additional assessment, because at the time of assessment neither they nor their vendor were parties to the action involving the proceeding, since, if the reapportionment was made according to a former opinion of the Court of Appeals, and equally upon all the property on both sides of the street, it is immaterial when it was made; the purchasers not claiming that the assessment was erroneous, but they are not precluded by the assessment.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 487*)—STREET IMPROVEMENTS — ASSESSMENTS — REAPPORTIONMENT—PURCHASERS—LIABILITY.

Under Ky. St. 1903, §§ 2834, 2839, providing that a street assessment lien shall exist from the date of the apportionment warrant, where an apportionment was adjudged a nullity, the statutory lien for additional assessments existed when the second apportionment was made, and collection of a warrant under the first apportionment did not release the lien as to purchasers of land after the first assessment was paid and before the reapportionment, since they knew that the street had been improved, and that there was a lien against the abutting lots to secure payment of the cost, and they were presumed to know that it was a lien until legal assessment of the cost and payment thereof.

3. COVENANTS (§ 100*)—WARRANTY—BREACH—STREET ASSESSMENTS—REMEDY OF PURCHASER.

If purchasers are required to pay an additional street assessment on a reapportionment after their purchase and after payment of the purchase price, they have recourse against their vendor on her warranty.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Chancery Branch, Second Division.

"To be officially reported."

Action by the American Standard Asphalt Company against J. E. Comley and others. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to their answer, defendants Comley and wife appeal. Affirmed.

E. L. McDonald, for appellants. Wm. Furlong and John L. Woodbury, for appellee.

NUNN, J. In the year 1904 the city of Louisville by appropriate proceedings caused the original construction of the carriage-way of Rosewood avenue, from Baxter avenue to Von Borries avenue. The ordinance provided for the improvement to be made at the cost of the owners of the abutting land as provided by law. After the completion of the improvement and the acceptance of the work by the city of Louisville, the board of public works of that city apportioned the cost of the improvement pursuant to their idea of what the term "according to law" shown in the ordinance meant. Their construction of this term resulted in an assessment against the property on the West side of Rosewood avenue, from Baxter avenue to Von Borries avenue, extending back westwardly to a line half way to Beechwood avenue, and on the east side of Rosewood avenue, from Baxter avenue to Von Borries avenue, extending back to a line midway to Edenside avenue. This court, in an opinion delivered in the case of the City of Louisville v. American Standard Asphalt Co., 102 S. W. 806, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 183, reached the conclusion that the territory on the east side of Rosewood avenue, which was assessed for the cost of the improvement, was so large that it could not be considered a square, within the meaning of the charter of cities of the first class, and the court directed a reapportionment over a new district, comprised of the same territory on the west side of Rosewood avenue and an equal distance on the east side of that avenue. On a return of the case to the lower court this reapportionment was made, as a result of which the Schusters, on the east side, were released from a considerable portion of the cost of the improvement, and consequently the amount from which they were released was placed proportionately upon the property on the west side, which increased the assessment for the cost of the improvement to that extent. The warrants issued by the board of public works for the cost of the improvement, as first assessed, were delivered to the asphalt company, and the persons owning property on the west side paid their assessments and had a release of the liens on their property entered on the record in the office of the board of public works. After this, and before the second assessment was made under the opinion of this court, one Emma Detrich, an owner of one of the lots on the west side of Rosewood avenue, sold and conveyed the lot for a valuable consideration to appellants in this appeal. After this second assessment and apportionment was made, appellee, American Standard Asphalt Company, filed an amended petition, making all the property owners on the west side parties defendant to the action, and asked for an enforcement of their liens upon their property for the additional assessment. Appellants, Comley and wife, resisted the payment of this assessment, and in substance claimed in their answer that they purchased the property after the first assessment and before the second; that they were innocent purchasers of the property; that the first assessment had been made upon the property and paid by their vendor, and the lien was released on the record in the office of the board of public works; that they had no knowledge or information of any claim against their property; that by the exercise of reasonable, ordinary care and diligence they could not have learned of such a claim as has been asserted herein; that they paid a full and valuable consideration for the property, and received the conveyance of the property without any knowledge or notice, either expressed or constructive, of the claim that appellee asserted; and also alleged that by reason of these matters the appellee was estopped from asserting or claiming any lien against their property. The court sustained a demurrer to their answer, and they have appealed.

Appellants present many reasons for a reversal, but we deem it unnecessary to refer to but two of them, as the others were settled by the former opinion of this court in the case referred to. The first reason that we will notice is their claim that the second apportionment of the cost of the improvement of Rosewood avenue was not binding upon them, for the reason that neither they nor their vendor, Emma Deltrich, were parties to the action at the time of this assessment, nor were they made parties until some time after that. It is true that they are not bound or precluded by that assessment; but they fail to state, in their answer, that this assessment was erroneous in any respect. If the reapportionment of the cost of the improvement of the avenue was made according to the former opinion of this court, and made equal upon all the property owners on each side of the avenue, it is immaterial to appellants when it was made, and their complaint with reference thereto is without merit.

The only other question presented for reversal is a question of estoppel of appellee from asserting a lien upon the property of appellants; they being innocent purchasers for value. By section 2834, Ky. St. 1903, it is provided that a lien shall exist for the cost of original improvement of public ways against the respective lots abutting thereon, and by section 2839 this lien shall exist from the date of the apportionment warrant. Appellants contend, however, that appellee is estopped from asserting this lien against their property, for the reason that it collected the amount first apportioned and assessed against their property and caused the lien to be released. This court, in its former opinion, determined that the first apportionment of the cost of the improvement of Rosewood avenue was a nullity, and directed another apportionment to be made. It follows, therefore, that the statutory lien existed when the second apportionment was made, and the collection of the first apportionment warrant did not have the effect to release the lien. Appellants knew that Rosewood avenue had been improved by original construction, and that there was lien against the abutting lots to secure the payment of the cost, and they were presumed to know that it was a lien upon the property until the cost was legally assessed against it and paid by the owner thereof.

If appellants have paid the purchase price for this property, they have recourse for the amount of the assessment against their vendor on her warranty.

For these reasons, the judgment is affirmed.

SPIESS' ADM'X v. BARTLEY.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. PLEADING (§ 180*)—REPLY—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

Civ. Code Prac. § 90, requires the petition to state facts constituting a cause of action. Section 98 permits a reply to contain only a traverse, facts constituting an estoppel against, or avoidance of, a set-off, etc., or of defenses stated in the answer, a counterclaim against a set-off, or a cross-petition. The petition sought to recover the rent of an engine, and the answer denied the indebtedness, and pleaded an award of arbitrators allowing plaintiff a certain amount for the hire of the engine, and the reply admitted that the matters alleged in the petition were submitted to arbitrators and that their award covered the entire controversy, and sought to recover on the award a certain sum, for which judgment was allowed by default. Held, that the reply was a departure from the petition, and set up a new and independent cause of action, which was not permissible under the statutes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 358, 359; Dec. Dig. § 180.*]

2. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 74*)—AWARD—REPUDIATION.

Both parties to an award of arbitrators may repudiate it, and litigate the controversy on the basis of the contract claimed by them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. § 342; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 180*)—REPLY—DEPARTURE—ACTION ON AWARD—PLEADING.

After having submitted their contract rights to arbitrators and a valid award was made, plaintiff should have sued on the award unless both he and defendant repudiated it, and, where defendant relied on the award in his answer, plaintiff should have set it up in an amended petition, and not by reply.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 180.*]

4. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 81*)—AWARD—MERGER OF ACTION.

Upon the submission of the contract rights of the parties to arbitrators and a valid award being made by them, the controversy was merged in the award.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. §§ 428-439; Dec. Dig. § 81.*]

5. JUDGMENT (§ 101*)—DEFAULT—PLEADINGS TO SUSTAIN JUDGMENT—DEPARTURE.

A cause of action set up for the first time in the reply, which was a departure from that alleged in the petition, cannot sustain a default judgment thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Dec. Dig. § 101.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nelson County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Benjamin Bartley against Charles Spiess' administratrix. From a default judgment for plaintiff, defendant appealed. Reversed, with directions.

S. M. Payton, for appellant. C. T. Atkinson, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. Charles Spiess and Benjamin Bartley, having a controversy about the hire of a traction engine owned by Bartley and rented by Spiess, submitted the case in December, 1905, to Edward Bell and Ed C. Dawson, arbitrators, and, in the event they could not agree, to William J. Dawson, umpire. The arbitrators and the umpire in December, 1905, made the following award in writing: "Said Spiess shall pay Bartley $1.75 per day from the 6th day of November, 1905, until the engine is returned to said Bartley at New Haven, Ky., this being a concession of $1.00 per day from the contract price. Said Spiess is to return said engine to New Haven, Ky., and replace main cog-wheel which is broken with a new one; said Spiess to have five days after engine is returned to New Haven in which to replace said wheel." In January, 1906, Bartley, ignoring the submission and award, brought suit against Spiess to recover from him rent for the engine at $2.75 per day, amounting to $195.25, and $35 damages for breakage. To this petition Spiess answered, denying the indebtedness, and in a separate paragraph pleading the award in bar of Bartley's right to maintain an action independent of the award. In February, 1907, the death of Spiess was suggested, and in October, 1907, the action was duly revived against the administratrix. On February 11, 1908, Bartley filed a reply, in which he admitted that the matters and things sued upon in his petition were submitted to arbitrators and an umpire, who in December, 1905, made their award, copies of which he filed with his reply. He averred that the award covered all points in controversy, and settled all matters in dispute, and sought to recover on the award the sum of $217.51, the amount found to be due him under the award according to his method of calculation; and for this amount he asked judgment. On February 14, 1908, the following order was made: "This cause having been heretofore revived against Amelia Spiess, as administratrix of Charles Spiess, and being called for trial, the allegations of the reply, not being controverted, are taken for confessed, and it is adjudged that plaintiff recover of Amelia Spiess, as administratrix, the sum of $217.51, with 6 per cent. interest."

It will thus be seen that in the petition filed appellee sought to recover upon a contract, and that in a reply he abandoned the contract, and sought to and did recover upon the award. There was a departure from the original cause of action—in fact, a new and independent cause of action was set up in the reply. Both of the parties to the controversy might have ignored the award, but they did not do this. Spiess in his answer expressly relied upon it as a bar to a recovery upon the contract. As the submission covered all the matters in dispute between the parties, Bartley should in his original petition have sued on the award, but, failing in this, should have set it up in an amended petition. The controversies between the parties were merged in the award.

The plaintiff cannot in a reply depart from the cause of action stated in his petition, or obtain a judgment by default upon a cause of action set up for the first time in a reply. Under Civ. Code Prac. the cause of action upon which a plaintiff relies to obtain judgment must be set up in a petition, or an amended petition, section 90 providing that "the petition must state facts which constitute a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant"; whilst under section 98 a reply may contain only "(1) a traverse, (2) a statement of facts which constitute an estoppel against or avoidance of a set-off and counterclaim, or defenses stated in the answer, (3) a counterclaim against the set-off, and (4) a cross-petition." The established rules of pleading are not as generally observed as they should be by either the bench or bar, but it would be an unusual departure to permit a judgment by default to be rendered upon a cause of action stated in a reply. Spaulding v. Alexander, 6 Bush, 100.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, with directions to set aside the judgment and permit Bartley, if he desires to do so, to file an amended petition, and the parties may then tender other pleadings necessary to complete the issues.

KENTUCKY WAGON MFG. CO. v. DUGANICS.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 117*)—PLACE OF WORK—FREIGHT ELEVATORS—SAFETY.

A freight elevator was not a reasonably safe place of work, where there was a hole about 4 inches wide and 12 to 16 inches long in the floor, to the knowledge of the foreman, who placed an insufficient patch over it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 208; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 235*)—PLACE OF WORK—INSPECTION.

An employé required to use a freight elevator, but not having the duty of inspection, was not bound to examine the floor of the elevator to determine whether a patch placed over a hole therein was sufficient, but might assume it was sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 710-722; Dec. Dig. § 235.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—INJURY TO FREIGHT ELEVATOR EMPLOYÉ—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—JURY QUESTION.

Whether a hole in a freight elevator floor was so obvious that, by ordinary care, an employé injured thereby could have discovered it, held a jury question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1113-1118; Dec. Dig. § 289.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 688*)—QUESTIONS PRESENTED FOR REVIEW—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL—EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF.

Remarks of counsel in the jury's presence cannot be complained of on appeal, where they are not part of the bill of exceptions appearing only by appellant's counsel's affidavit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2896; Dec. Dig. § 688.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1060*)—HARMLESS ERROR—MISCONDUCT OF COUNSEL.

Judgment for plaintiff in a personal injury action will not be reversed for misconduct of his counsel in stating, when plaintiff was asked as to what doctor waited upon him, that it might be agreed that it was the "insurance company's doctor," referring to the company in which defendant carried employers' liability insurance, where the court admonished the jury that the remark was improper, and where there was abundant proof to sustain the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4135; Dec. Dig. § 1060.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 127*)—MISCONDUCT OF COUNSEL—IMPROPER ARGUMENT.

In a personal injury action by an employé, it was improper for counsel to tell the jury on their voir dire that a certain company insured employers against accidents to their employées, and to state to the jury a conversation between him and defendant's attorney, wherein the latter said that the way to argue a meritless case was to deceive the jury by making them believe that immaterial matters were material, and not to notice material matters, and that he argued all his cases that way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 275; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 125*)—CONDUCT OF COUNSEL—ARGUMENT.

Counsel should never attempt to get before the jury matters beyond the record and having no real bearing upon the case, merely to prejudice the jury; and while one act of such impropriety may be overlooked, if the court properly admonishes the jury not to regard it, it should not be overlooked where he persistently attempts to inflame the jurors' minds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 303-307; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Joseph Duganics against the Kentucky Wagon Manufacturing Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

O'Neal & O'Neal, for appellant. H. J. Scheirick and Johnson & Heatt, for appellee.

CLAY, C. The plaintiff, Joseph Duganics, instituted this action against the defendant, Kentucky Wagon Manufacturing Company, to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the failure on the part of the defendant to furnish plaintiff a reasonably safe place in which to work. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $1,000, and the defendant appeals. A reversal is asked upon two grounds: First, the failure of the trial court to peremptorily instruct the jury to find for the defendant; second, misconduct of counsel.

It appears that appellee is a young German, and unable to speak or understand the English language. In the month of August, 1907, he was employed by appellant as a laborer; his duty being to truck wagon wheels and gear from appellant's paintshop to its warehouse. For this purpose he used a truck 10 feet long and about 2½ feet wide, which ran upon two wheels, placed on either side at the center of same. The truck also had a balance wheel on either end. The truck could be easily turned upon the side wheels, and, while at rest, the heavy end would drop down on the end wheel. Appellant's paintshop was on the ground floor of its establishment, and its warehouse on the third floor. In hauling the truck loads of wagon wheels appellee was required to use a certain elevator, which was about 8 feet wide and 16 feet long. He had been in appellant's employ only about 10 days. On the day before the injury a hole about 4 inches wide by from 12 to 16 inches long had been broken through the floor of the elevator somewhere on the right side thereof, and near the entrance to it. There is evidence to the effect that the existence of the hole in question was reported to appellant's foreman by appellee, and probably by other employées, and that the foreman undertook to patch the hole by nailing over it two strips of pine lumber which were about 3 inches wide, 16 or 18 inches long, and from one-fourth to one-half inch thick. The boards used to patch the hole were ordinarily used to box up advertising matter. After the hole had been so patched, appellee and others working with him continued to use the elevator. On the day the accident occurred, and some time prior thereto, a loaded truck had been run over this patch, and had caused it to splinter and break through. The accident to appellee occurred as follows: He pushed a loaded truck of wagon wheels onto the elevator, and started it to the third floor. The truck so loaded was somewhat higher than appellee's head. It was, therefore, necessary for him to get immediately behind the loaded truck, and push the same by two standards which run from the bed upward, and so held the wheels in their place. It required the whole of one man's strength to push the truck. After the truck was pushed upon the elevator, there were left from 2½ to 3 feet of space between it and the end of the elevator for the appellee to stand on while the elevator was making its ascent. As the elevator reached the third floor, it was necessary for appellee to walk around one side of the truck to the other end of the elevator, so as to raise the safety gate and enable him to wheel his truck off the elevator to the third floor. With this in view, appellee took a step to the side for the purpose of going around to raise the gate, when his right foot went into the hole. In an effort to avoid falling, appellee endeavored to support himself by taking hold of the truck. This caused the truck to swing around so as to throw appellee's left foot over the floor of the elevator, and his foot was thereby caught between the elevator floor and the beams supporting the third floor of the warehouse. His heel was severely crushed, and his ankle wrenched and sprained. Appellee did not know the patch had been broken through, and did not see the hole. It is admitted by John Lodenkemper, appellant's foreman, that the patch put upon the hole was entirely insufficient. One of the witnesses testified that, after he saw the patch which Lodenkemper had put over the hole, he told Lodenkemper that it was a dangerous place. As the evidence shows there was a hole in the elevator floor, that this fact was known to appellant's foreman, and that he put an insufficient patch over it, there can be no doubt of the fact that appellant failed to furnish appellee a reasonably safe place in which to work.

The only question, then, is: Did appellee know of the existence of the hole, or was it so obvious that he could have known of it by the exercise of ordinary care? Inspection was not in the line of his duty, and it was not, therefore, necessary for him to examine the floor of the elevator for the purpose of determining whether the patch which had been put thereon was sufficient for the purpose. When the foreman undertook to patch it, appellee had the right to assume that it was properly done. It appears that his foot went into the hole as the elevator approached the third floor. It also appears that the elevator was somewhat darker at that time, owing to the fact that the second floor was heavily stocked with gear. Under such circumstances, the hole might have easily escaped the attention of any one; and we are unable to say, as a matter of law, that the hole was so obvious that appellee, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have discovered it. This question was one for the jury, and the court properly refused to instruct the jury to find for appellant.

As to the misconduct of counsel, it appears that appellant carried employers' liability insurance. During the examination of appellee as a witness, and while he was being interrogated as to what doctor waited upon him, the attorney for appellee made the following statement: "I guess it may be agreed that it was the company's doctor, or the insurance company's doctor." This statement was objected to, and the court thereupon said: "I sustain the objection. It is not proper." The above is shown by the bill of exceptions.

Counsel for appellant further complain of misconduct on the part of the attorney for appellee in that, after asking the jury on their voir dire if any of them were connected with an accident insurance company, he told the jury that the Travelers' Insurance Company was one of those companies which insured employers against accidents to their employés; and, in response to said statement, one or more of the jurors said in the presence of their fellow jurors and the court that they carried employers' liability insurance in other companies.

Further complaint is made of misconduct on the part of appellee's attorney in stating to the jury a certain private conversation between him and appellant's attorney, wherein the latter said to him that the way to do in arguing a case that was weak and without merit before a jury was to deceive the jury by making them, or trying to make them believe that certain matters were material, which were not material, and take no notice of material matters, and that counsel for defendant did that way in the argument of his cases to the jury. The remarks of counsel in the examination of the jury and in his argument before the jury complained of by counsel for appellant are not a part of the bill of exceptions; they appearing only by affidavit of counsel for appellant. Under the uniform ruling of this court, they cannot, therefore, be considered. Paducah Ry. & Light Co. v. Bell's Adm'r, 85 S. W. 216, 27 Ky. Law Rep. 428; George T. Stagg Co. et al. v. Brightwell, 92 S. W. 8, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 1220; Louisville Railway Co. v. Samuel Gaar (opinion delivered October 27, 1908) 112 S. W. 1130. So far, then, as the bill of exceptions shows, the only misconduct complained of is in the action of counsel for appellee in stating that it might be agreed that it was the company's doctor or the insurance company's doctor. To this remark the court sustained an objection, and admonished the jury that it was not proper.

Under the circumstances of this case, it being shown that appellee suffered serious injuries, and there being abundant proof of negligence on the part of appellant, we will not reverse the judgment for the impropriety of the above remark. We will say, however, that if the bill of exceptions had shown the remark alleged to have been made by counsel in his examination of the jury on the voir dire, and had also shown that counsel in his argument to the jury made use of the private conversation had between him and counsel for appellant, we would not have hesitated to reverse the judgment. Trials must be had before impartial juries and upon the facts adduced in evidence. Counsel should never attempt to get before the jury matters outside of the record and which have no real bearing upon the case merely for the purpose of influencing the prejudice and passion of the jurors. One act of impropriety on the part of an attorney in a case may be overlooked if the court properly admonishes the jury not to regard it, but it should not be overlooked where the record shows a persistence on his part in bringing to the attention of the jury matters which only tend to inflame their minds, and thus render them less able to do justice according to the law and the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

ASHER v. CORNETT.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. ACTION (§ 28*) — CONTRACT OR TORT — WAIVER.

One voluntarily waiving the tort and suing on the implied promise to pay for wrongfully cutting and removing timber on his land makes the action one of assumpsit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. § 206; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

2. VENUE (§ 4*)—NATURE OF ACTION—ACTION ON CONTRACTS—TRANSITORY ACTION.

An action of assumpsit for cutting and removing timber is a transitory one, and is governed by Civ. Code Prac. §§ 78, 79, providing for the venue of transitory actions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

3. VENUE (§ 21*)—RESIDENCE OF PARTIES.

Where defendant in assumpsit did not reside in the county in which the action was brought, and he was not summoned in that county, and he made no defense to the action before objecting to the jurisdiction of the court, the court was without jurisdiction, and a default judgment must be set aside.

4. APPEARANCE (§ 8*)—PROCEEDINGS CONSTITUTING APPEARANCE.

A defendant who prosecutes an appeal from the judgment refusing to set aside a default judgment on the ground of want of jurisdiction of the court, because he did not reside in the county in which the action was brought, enters his appearance, and, on the return of the case on the reversal of the judgment he will be before the circuit court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Leslie County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by A. B. Cornett against A. J. Asher. From a judgment refusing to set aside a default judgment, defendant appeals. Reversed.

N. J. Weller, for appellant. J. H. Jeffries, for appellee.

CLAY, C. The plaintiff, A. B. Cornett, instituted this action against the defendant, A. J. Asher, to recover the value of certain timber taken from lands owned jointly by the plaintiff, defendant, and others. The petition, after describing the tracts of land in question, charged that the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully entered upon said lands, and cut down, removed, carried away, and converted to his own use 2,000 trees of the value of $3 per tree; that the value of plaintiff's portion thereof was $500; that the defendant, by his cutting down, carrying away, and conversion of said timber trees, had promised and agreed to pay the plaintiff the reasonable value and worth of same. The petition then concludes with the following paragraph: "Plaintiff hereby waives the tort, and sues as upon an implied contract for the value of said timber trees, and he says that no part of the value of same has ever been paid to him or to any one for him, and that the value of same has long been due and owing to him." This action was instituted in Leslie county, where the lands from which it is alleged the timber was cut are located. Process was served on the defendant, A. J. Asher, in Bell county. At the first term of the Leslie circuit court after the service of process, judgment by default was rendered against the defendant for the full amount sued for. At the May term of the court the defendant, Asher, moved to vacate and set aside the judgment. This motion was overruled, and the defendant appeals.

For appellant it is urged that this is a transitory action, and, there being nothing in the record showing that he resided in Leslie county when the suit was brought, the circuit court has no jurisdiction. For appellee, it is insisted that this is an action for injury to real property by the cutting and removing of timber therefrom, and, under the rule laid down in Meehan, etc., v. Edwards, etc., 92 Ky. 574, 18 S. W. 519, the venue of the action was properly laid in Leslie county. There can be no doubt that appellee would be right in his contention if he sought merely to recover damages for the cutting and removing of the timber. This he did not do, but voluntarily waived the tort and sued upon appellant's implied promise to pay, thus making the action one of assumpsit. Under the circumstances, therefore, the action was merely a transitory one (Roberts v. Moss, 106 S. W. 297, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 525), and is governed by sections 78, 79, Civ. Code Prac.

As it does not appear that appellant resides in Leslie county when the action was brought, or that he made defense to the action before objecting to the jurisdiction of the court, and as he was not summoned in Leslie county, but in Bell county, it necessarily follows that the Leslie circuit court was without jurisdiction. The court, therefore, erred in refusing to set aside the judgment. However, appellant will be before the Leslie circuit court upon the return of this case, for he has entered his appearance by prosecuting this appeal. Grace v. Taylor, 1 Bibb, 430; Chesapeake, Ohio & Southwestern R. R. Co. v. Heath's Adm'r, 87 Ky. 651, 9 S. W. 832.

Judgment reversed.

KNIGHT v. COLLINS et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 11, 1908.)

WILLS (§ 600*) — CONSTRUCTION — INTEREST GIVEN.

Testator devised land to her husband, with power to sell and to have the proceeds, but charging the land or its proceeds with the maintenance of a nephew, 14 years old when the will was made, and with the expense of preparing him for "any profession he may wish" or testatrix's husband might "think best," and reciting that it was supposed that the charge would take all the land or its proceeds, but that, if it did not, the remainder was left to the husband to give to the nephew or "to dispose of as he may wish." Held, that the husband took a fee-simple title subject only to the charge for the nephew's maintenance and education; that the nephew took no interest in the surplus proceeds; that the "maintenance" contemplated was maintenance during the nephew's minority; and that he, having reached his majority before testatrix's death, is only entitled to such part of the proceeds of the land on the husband's death as may be necessary to educate him for a profession, if he in good faith desires to be so educated.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kenton County.
"Not to be officially reported."

Action by Lewis Dixon Knight against Rosalie Collins and others. From a judgment dismissing the petition, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. D. Rouse, for appellant. John L. Rich, for appellees.

CLAY, C. Sadie M. Collins died in Kenton county, Ky., in the year 1903, leaving the following will:

"I, Sadie M. Collins, wife of Dr. J. D. Collins, of the city of Covington, county of Kenton, and state of Kentucky, being in ordinarily good health, sound in mind and memory, and being desirous of disposing of my property in a manner different from that prescribed by the laws of descent and distribution of the state of Kentucky, do make, publish and declare the following to be my last will and testament:

"Item I. I do not expect to leave any debts, but if I should, I desire my executor hereinafter named to pay same out of the proceeds of the sale of my personal estate.

"Item II. I give and devise to my beloved husband, Dr. J. D. Collins, the undivided one-half of my residence property, situated in Covington, on the corner of the alley, or Lynn street and Madison avenue, the same conveyed to me by A. R. Mullins and wife by two deeds, and the same conveyed to me by J. M. Collins as my separate estate. This undivided half he is to have in fee simple and without any limitation.

"Item III. I give and devise to my said husband, Dr. J. D. Collins, the other undivided half of my said Madison avenue residence property, for and during his natural life, but with the power to sell and convey the same if he thinks necessary or so desires and he may have the proceeds of sale to use and enjoy in his support and maintenance, if he finds necessary or may so wish. The object of this is to invest him with the fee if so desired. At the death of my said husband if the said property is not sold, or if sold and there is any part of the proceeds of the sale left, I will and devise the same to my niece, Elizabeth Coulter Cosby, wife of Geo. K. Cosby, to be hers in her own right.

"Item IV. I give and devise to my said husband, Dr. J. D. Collins, all of my personal property, including bonds, stocks, money and all kinds of personal property, for and during his natural life, but with the power to sell my stock, bonds and other personal property, and to use and enjoy the proceeds of the sale for his support and maintenance, principal as well as income if he so desires, the object being to invest him with the title if so desired. At his death if there is any of said personal property left in kind or the proceeds as converted, out of the same, I give and devise to my sister, Anna Coulter, wife of Lewis Coulter, to my sister-in-law, Jane McMillin, wife of my brother, Carr McMillin, to my step-daughter, Rosalie A. Collins, daughter of my husband by a former marriage, and to my step-sister, Kittie Yancey, daughter of my step-father, Harlow Yancey, by a former marriage, one thousand dollars each, and if there is not enough left to pay same in full, they are to share the remainder pro rata.

"Item V. I have a farm in Kenton county, Kentucky, the same conveyed to me by Wes D. Wilson, special commissioner of the Kenton circuit court, and J. M. Collins as my separate estate. This farm I will and devise to my said husband, but I charge the same with the maintenance and education of my nephew, Dixon Knight, who now lives with me, and is commonly called Dixon Collins. He is a son of Thomas Knight and my niece, Bessie Knight. This farm my said husband has the right and power to sell and convey, if he wishes, and to have the proceeds of the sale, but he is to maintain and educate the said Dixon Knight and prepare him for any profession he may wish, or Dr. Collins may think best for him. It is supposed that this will measurably take the whole of said farm, or the proceeds of its sale, but if it does not, then the rest is left with my husband to give to him, the said Dixon Knight, or to dispose of as he may wish.

"Item VI. These devises evidence my unlimited confidence in my said husband, and as further expression of my confidence in him, I thereby appoint him, the said Dr. J. D. Collins, executor of this my last will and testament, knowing that he will carry out to the fullest extent my wishes herein expressed, and I request the court in which he is appointed and qualified not to require of him any bond for the discharge of his duties. This embraces all the bequest I now desire to make, and I now publish and declare the foregoing to be my last will and testament, and sign and acknowledge the same as my act and deed.

"Given under my hand this April 5-1893.

"Signed and acknowledged in the presence of G. A. Zwick and A. R. Mullins.

"[Signed] Sadie M. Collins."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

The plaintiff, Lewis Dixon Knight, instituted this action against Rosalie Collins in her own right and as executrix of the estate of J. D. Collins, deceased, to recover the proceeds of certain notes which J. D. Collins had devised to Rosalie Collins, and which notes represented a part of the purchase price of the farm referred to in item 5 of the above will. Plaintiff alleged in his petition that under said item J. D. Collins held the title in said farm in trust for the benefit and use of the plaintiff; that upon the death of Sadie M. Collins said J. D. Collins took possession of the farm, and subsequently mortgaged it to secure the payment of a loan of $800, which sum he received and used for his own benefit; that on the 24th day of April, 1906, said J. D. Collins sold and conveyed said property to C. H. Bramlage for and in consideration of $2,896, of which $896 was cash and the balance, $2,000, was represented by four promissory notes of the vendee, payable on or before 10 years after the date of their execution, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from date; that plaintiff at no time received from J. D. Collins anything for his maintenance or education, either from the proceeds of the sale of said farm or otherwise, but that his maintenance and education were paid for by others than the said Collins; that J. D. Collins departed this life in January, 1908, testate; that by the terms of his last will the defendant Rosalie Collins was appointed executrix thereof, and was made legatee and devisee under said will; that she is now holding possession of said notes, and claiming them as her own. The petition concludes with a prayer that the court adjudge that Rosalie Collins holds said notes as trustee for the sole use and benefit of the plaintiff. Thereafter the defendant demurred to the petition, and subsequently filed an answer. The answer, after denying the allegations of the petition, sets forth the fact that Lewis Dixon Knight was 24 years old at the time of the death of Sadie M. Collins; that at that time he had received his education. Plaintiff then demurred to the answer, which demurrer was overruled. The case was then submitted for final judgment, and the petition of plaintiff dismissed. From that judgment the plaintiff appeals.

This case involves a construction of item 5 of the above will. It is the contention of counsel for appellant that the farm in question was given to Dr. J. D. Collins to use for his own benefit, if his necessities so required, after he compiled with and carried out the charge upon said farm, to wit, the maintenance, support, and education of Lewis Dixon Knight; that, having failed to use the proceeds of the farm for that purpose, he was still charged, unless his necessities required him to use the proceeds of the farm himself, to give the same to Lewis Dixon Knight. In support of this contention, counsel cites the case of McCullough's Adm'r v. Anderson, 90 Ky. 128, 18 S. W. 353, 7 L. R. A. 836. That case involved the construction of the following language in the will of Samuel McCullough: "To my most precious and well beloved wife I give, during her life, all my estate, real and personal, whether in possession or in action, with full and ample authority to dispose of the whole of it as she pleases. At her death, should she not have previously made a testamentary distribution of all remaining undisposed of by her, I desire that such remainder shall be distributed as herein directed." In that case this court held that the wife was given a life estate with power to convert it into a fee by disposing of it as she pleased; but that, not having disposed of all of it and converted it into a fee, what remained undisposed of by her should be distributed as directed in the will. It will be observed, however, that there is no similarity between the language in the McCullough will and the language of item 5 under consideration. In the latter no attempt is made to convey an estate for life to Dr. Collins, with power to convert it into a fee; nor is there any direction that any estate undisposed of by him should be distributed absolutely to certain persons. On the other hand, the language of the will is plain and certain. It is susceptible of only one interpretation. It gives to J. D. Collins the fee-simple title to the property in question, subject only to a charge for the maintenance and education of Lewis Dixon Knight. There is no limitation upon Dr. Collins' title. The language of the will is: "This farm I will and devise to my said husband, but I charge the same with the maintenance and education of my nephew, Dixon Knight, who now lives with me, and is commonly called Dixon Collins." In this language there is no limitation over; there is no intimation that the estate conveyed is a mere life estate. But the will does not even stop at this point. It goes further, and says: "This farm my said husband has the right and power to sell and convey, if he wishes, and to have the proceeds of the sale, but he is to maintain and educate the said Dixon Knight and prepare him for any profession he may wish, or Dr. Collins may think best for him." There is nothing in this language to restrict the estate conveyed by the previous language of the will. It confirms our view of the estate previously granted. After giving Dr. Collins the farm, it shows that the testator intended if he sold it that he should have the proceeds of the sale, subject, however, to the charge in favor of Lewis Dixon Knight.

Nor is there anything in the concluding language of item 5 to support the contention of counsel for appellant. That language is as follows: "It is supposed that this will measurably take the whole of said farm, or the proceeds of its sale, but if it does not, then the rest is left with my husband to give to him, the said Dixon Knight, or to dispose of as he may wish." No estate or interest in the surplus was given to Lewis Dixon

Knight. Counsel contends that, if the language of item 5 be construed to give the farm to Dr. Collins in trust for Lewis Dixon Knight, then the language at the close of the will, "or to dispose of as he may wish," may be interpreted as meaning, "or to dispose of as he may wish for the benefit of Lewis Dixon Knight." This would be to impose a limitation upon the power of Dr. Collins that was not placed in the will itself. After giving her husband the power to give the surplus of the proceeds to Lewis Dixon Knight, it is manifest that the alternative right to dispose of it as he might wish included the power to dispose of the surplus in any manner whatsoever without reference to Lewis Dixon Knight. It will be observed that this is not a suit for maintenance or education, but is a suit to recover the proceeds of the farm devised by Dr. Collins, on the ground that all the proceeds not used by Dr. Collins for the purpose of his own support and maintenance belonged to appellant. Indeed, counsel for appellant, in his brief, states the character of the suit brought as follows: "He [plaintiff] does not contend by the action in question that he is entitled to any part of the proceeds of said farm by way of education or maintenance, or preparation for a profession. It does not appear in the record that he desired to prepare himself for a profession, or that he was preparing for a profession, or that he was not enabled to prepare himself for a profession by reason of the failure of J. D. Collins to furnish the funds, but he does claim that under the will of his aunt, Sadie M. Collins, all of the proceeds of the sale of this farm which were not used by Dr. Collins by way of supporting and maintaining himself belonged to him." At the time Mrs. Collins made her will appellant was about 14 years of age. When she died, he was past his majority. It is evident that the maintenance she contemplated was the maintenance of appellant during his minority. It further appears that he had received an academic education. However, appellant had the right to be educated for a profession. There might be some merit in his suit if he had built his case upon this idea; that is, that he desired to be so educated, and that a certain sum would be necessary for that purpose. In this event, there can be no doubt that such education for a profession would be a charge upon the proceeds of the fund, and that it would be the duty of the chancellor to hear proof and determine what would be a reasonable allowance out of such proceeds to enable appellant to prepare for such profession. Upon proper proceedings, appellant may yet obtain such portions of the proceeds of the notes as may be necessary for his education for a profession, if he in good faith desires to be educated for a profession.

It not appearing that appellant desires to be educated for a profession, and he not being entitled to the proceeds of the farm upon any other theory, it necessarily follows that the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

TILTON v. TILTON.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 29*)—ANTENUPTIAL CONTRACTS.

A woman may release her rights in her intended husband's property; but such a contract must be free from fraud or misrepresentation or the practice of deceit on the husband's part, must be reasonable in its provisions, and entered into in good faith by both parties, or it may be set aside.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 165; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 34*)—ANTENUPTIAL CONTRACTS—BURDEN OF PROVING FAIR PROCUREMENT.

If an antenuptial contract, by which a prospective wife released her rights in her prospective husband's property, shows upon its face that it is unjust or unfair to the wife, the burden is upon the husband or his representatives to show that it was fairly procured, and that the wife was not overreached or deceived in its execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 34*)—ANTENUPTIAL CONTRACTS—UNJUST CONTRACT.

In determining the reasonableness of an antenuptial contract by which the wife released her rights in her husband's property, the court may consider the adequacy of provision for the wife, the means and ages of the parties, and the wife's understanding of the meaning of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

4. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 34*)—ANTENUPTIAL CONTRACTS—REASONABLENESS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

An antenuptial contract between a widower of considerable means and a widow who was poor and uneducated, whereby she released her rights in his property, and agreed that any property she might possess at her death should pass to her husband if living, and if dead to his heirs, was so unreasonable and inequitable as to cast upon the husband's representatives the burden of showing that at its execution she understood the nature and extent of her prospective husband's estate, and the value of her marital rights therein, which she was surrendering.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

5. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 34*)—ANTENUPTIAL CONTRACTS.

Evidence held not to show that a woman, when she executed an antenuptial contract releasing her rights in her prospective husband's property, and agreeing to give to him or his heirs all her property at her death, fully comprehended and acquiesced in its terms.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Robertson County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by Nancy F. Tilton against E. L. Tilton, executor of Nimrod A. Tilton, to set aside an antenuptial contract, and to be adjudged the owner of a widow's share in decedent's estate. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with instructions.

Robert Buckler and John P. McCartney, for appellant. J. J. Osborne, Samuel Holmes, and W. J. Osborne, for appellee.

LASSING, J. In 1875 Nimrod A. Tilton, a widower, and Nancy F. Morand, a widow, both residents of Robertson county, Ky., entered into the following contract: "This indenture made and entered into this third day of July, 1875, by and between Nimrod A. Tilton, and Mrs. Nancy F. Morand, both of the county of Robertson and State of Kentucky: Witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the said Tilton to lawfully marry the said Nancy F. Morand, said marriage as aforesaid to take place during the year 1875, and the further consideration that the said Tilton has this day given to the said Mrs. Nancy F. Morand one Singer sewing machine, of the value of $80.00, (eighty dollars) and (one black mare, of the value of one hundred and fifty dollars, ($150.00). Now in consideration of said marriage to take place or happen as aforesaid, and the consideration of said sewing machine and said mare, the receipt of which, that is, said machine and said mare, is hereby acknowledged by the said Mrs. Nancy F. Morand. The said Mrs. Nancy F. Morand for and in consideration of the premises aforesaid, does by these presents release, confirm and forever release and confirm unto the said N. A. Tilton, his heirs and assigns, any dower interest or any other interest whatsoever she may acquire in and to the land or personal property or any insurance policy which the said Tilton may now have upon his life, or any property which he may hereafter acquire in and to which the said Mrs. Nancy F. Morand might be entitled to by reason of said marriage, and it is further understood by the parties hereto that the said N. A. Tilton is in no wise to be responsible for any debts contracted by the said Mrs. Nancy F. Morand after their said marriage or proposed marriage shall have taken place, without the written consent or order of the said Tilton. It is further understood by the parties hereto, that in case there should be no heirs born to the said N. A. Tilton and Mrs. Nancy F. Morand, by reason of said proposed marriage, then whatever property shall remain at the death of Mrs. Nancy F. Morand, shall inure to the said Tilton or his heirs. It is further understood by the parties hereto, that the said Tilton, whenever said marriage shall take place, is to clothe and furnish the necessities of life to the said Mrs. Nancy F. Morand. In testimony whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands, the day and year first above written." At the date of the execution of this contract Nimrod

A. Tilton was living on a farm of some 160 or 170 acres with his four children, the oldest a boy some 17 or 18 years of age, the youngest a girl, possibly 8 or 9 years of age. His wife had died some three months before. Nancy F. Morand had been a widow for some three or four years. She had no children. She had lived in the home of Nimrod A. Tilton, commonly called "Judge" Tilton, for a year or more before the death of his wife, who was quite an invalid. During this time she had attended to the general household duties, in addition to doing the cooking and washing, on a salary of $1.50 per week. After the death of Mrs. Tilton she continued to live in his home and look after the household duties, etc., as she had done theretofore. In the early part of September following she and Judge Tilton were married. They lived together on his farm from that time until his death in 1906. The marriage contract was recorded in the county court clerk's office in October following their marriage. He left a will by the terms of which he gave to his wife the household goods, kitchen furniture, and about $200 in money. By another clause of the will provision is made that, if it is contested, the devisee contesting forfeits all right to any portion of his estate. She renounced the will, and filed a suit in the Robertson circuit court, in which she sought to have canceled and set aside the antenuptial contract above set out, on the ground that it was obtained from her through fraud and misrepresentation, and that it was unjust, inequitable, and a fraud upon her rights as a married woman. She asked that she be adjudged the owner of a widow's share in her husband's estate. Issue was joined upon the allegations of the petition, much proof taken, and upon final hearing the chancellor found against her contention, and dismissed her petition. From that finding and judgment she prosecutes this appeal.

Most all of the proof that has been taken relates to the home life of Judge Tilton, especially during the last few years thereof, when he was sick, afflicted with a cancer, and a good part of the time confined to his bed, almost helpless. Further than to show the devoted, untiring, and constant service which Mrs. Tilton rendered her husband in his sad affliction, this evidence has little bearing on the question before us. Mrs. Tilton and Dr. M. S. Brown are the only witnesses who have testified concerning the execution of this marriage contract. The testimony of Mrs. Tilton, under the well-recognized rule, was incompetent, and the trial judge did not err in excluding it from his consideration. The question in issue must therefore be determined by the contract itself, as read in the light of the testimony of Dr. Brown. At the time of the execution of this contract Dr. Brown was engaged in the practice of law at Mt. Olivet, and Judge Kimbrough was associated with him. He testifies that Judge Tilton came to see him about the preparation of this contract, and talked about the matter over with him, and told him how he wanted it drawn; that he in turn discussed the matter with Judge Kimbrough, his law partner, and had Judge Kimbrough draw up the contract as it now is. After it was prepared, Judge Tilton came to town with Nancy F. Morand, and brought her to his (Brown's) room in the hotel, and there he (Brown) read over the contract to her, and explained it to her, and after this was done, it was signed by Judge Tilton and Nancy F. Morand in his presence. The clerk was caused to come to his room and take their acknowledgments. This done, Judge Tilton and Nancy F. Morand left, and returned to his home. Dr. Brown further testifies that he was at that time a friend of her family. That they were poor people, and he took an interest in her, and on this account was careful to see that she understood what she was doing. That both she and Judge Tilton were, at that time, being criticised in the neighborhood because of her staying at his house and taking care of his home and his children for him after the death of his wife, and in the course of his testimony he said: "There was some necessity for the peace offering in the neighborhood on account of the young people living there, and that she knew of this arrangement. She was going to have a permanent home, and he got a housekeeper, and Mrs. Morand understood these facts from him, and I did from her, and she could not have been mistaken about it." From this testimony of the doctor it is plain that he was undertaking to satisfy Mrs. Morand of the necessity for the execution of the contract. What he meant by "there being some necessity for the peace offering in the neighborhood," is unexplained and unintelligible, unless it is construed to mean that the execution of this contract was to bring about peace and harmony between Mrs. Morand and the children of Judge Tilton. She pleads that she did not comprehend its terms or the effect thereof; that she was overreached and imposed upon.

It is not difficult to understand how, under the circumstances, this could be done. She was a poor, uneducated woman, dealing with a man whom she was shortly to marry. Recognizing that from the force of circumstances by which she was compelled to labor for a living she had been placed in a position where she was being subjected to severe criticism, and, perhaps, more to avoid this criticism than from any sentimental motive, she had agreed to marry Judge Tilton as the only feasible solution of the difficulty in which the situation had placed them. In this way only could the tongue of the scandal monger be silenced. There then arose, as may be inferred from the testimony of Dr. Brown, the objection to the marriage on the part of the children of Judge Tilton. This objection could only be overcome by the execution of a marriage contract. Under these circumstances we find the judge arranging for a draft of this contract, and, when it is completed, taking the woman with him to a room in the hotel, and there, away from her friends or any one to advise her, in the presence of a lawyer of his own choosing, he had it explained to her from his standpoint by his lawyer in his presence, and, after its execution he has the clerk come to this room in the hotel to take her acknowledgment. What had passed between her and Judge Tilton is not known, but one thing is certain, so far as the record shows, she was not advised in the slightest, at or before the time of the execution of this contract, as to what property he owned, or what her property rights were, or what was the real effect of the execution of this paper. Considering the ages and past experience of the contracting parties, together with the short time since the death of Judge Tilton's first wife, we must conclude that their marriage was not bottomed upon sentimental grounds, and this is especially true when considered in the light of the contract before us, for we find in it no single expression of love, affection, or other kindred sentiment. On the contrary it contains propositions so cold in their terms as to be almost cruel. The gift of the mare and sewing machine cited therein need not be considered, for the reason that upon the consummation of their marriage these articles of personalty, under the then existing law, became at once the property of the husband. Nor need we consider those clauses of the contract which expressly provided that he would not be responsible for any debt which she might contract without his written consent, and that he would clothe and supply her with the necessaries of life after their marriage; for the one is but a limitation upon the privilege and freedom which his future wife might enjoy as to purchases for herself, and the other was a recitation of the assumption by himself of a liability which the law imposed upon him. Had the import of either of these provisions in the contract been understood by his prospective wife, it must have been both embarrassing and humiliating to her. Of neither of these clauses, however, does she complain, but it is of that clause of the contract which provides that she shall have no part in her husband's estate (either that which he then possessed or might thereafter acquire), upon his death, although it expressly provides that any property she may possess at her death shall pass to her husband, if living, and if not living, to his heirs. In other words, under this contract, all of her estate passed to him or his heirs upon her death, whereas upon his death she is to receive no part of his estate whatever. It has been repeatedly held that a woman may release her rights in her intended husband's property, but such a contract must be free from fraud or misrepresentation or the practice of deceit on the part of the husband, must be reasonable in its provisions, and entered into with the best of good faith on the part of both. Such an agreement, when fairly made, should be upheld, but if there are circumstances which tend to show that the wife has been deceived or overreached, it should be set aside; and, where the contract shows upon its face that it is unjust or unfair, the burden has invariably been placed upon the husband or his representatives to show that it was fairly procured, and that the wife was not overreached or deceived in the execution thereof. The rule is thus most admirably stated in 21 Cyc., p. 1250: "Courts of equity will take into consideration the adequacy of the provision for the wife, since antenuptial agreements wherein the wife releases her rights in the husband's estate should be reasonable in their terms. To determine the fairness and reasonableness of the agreement all of the circumstances, such as the wealth of the husband, the existing means of the wife, the age of the parties, and the prospective wife's full and clear knowledge and understanding of the nature and meaning of the terms of the contract are properly regarded. Good faith is the cardinal principle in such contracts. If the provision made for the wife is unreasonably disproportionate to the means of the husband, the presumption of designed concealment is raised, and the burden of disproving the same is upon him."

This principle is in perfect accord with the reported decisions of our courts. In the case of Maze's Ex'r v. Maze, 99 S. W. 336, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 679, the marriage contract, unfair to the wife in its terms, was set aside because of the failure of the representatives of the husband to show that it was understood by the wife at the time she signed it. In Brooks v. Brooks, 58 S. W. 450, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 555, the contract was set aside because the wife had been induced to sign it to pacify the opposition of her husband's children by a former marriage, and that it was executed for such a purpose. In Simpson v. Simpson's Ex'r, 94 Ky. 586, 23 S. W. 361, the antenuptial contract, which made some slight provision for the wife, was set aside because, judging from the contract itself and the circumstances under which it had been executed, the wife was overreached. The principles announced in these three foregoing cases are in harmony and accord with the opinions of courts of last resort in other states, notably New York and Pennsylvania. The contract under consideration is very unreasonable, inequitable, and unfair in dealing with the wife. In fact it is more unconscionable and unjust to the wife than any marriage contract to which our attention has been called; and, being such, the law casts upon the representatives of Judge Tilton the burden of showing that at the time of its execution appellee understood the nature and extent of her prospective husband's estate, and the value of her marital rights therein, which she was, by its terms, surrendering. Dr. Brown testifies that he did not know the nature and value of Judge Tilton's estate, although he considered him a man in good circumstances for a Robertson county farmer, yet he did not, according to his testimony, discuss this view of the contract or transaction with Mrs. Tilton. But it is argued that it must be presumed that, having lived in that locality for some time before her marriage, and in his immediate family for more than a year before her marriage, she was bound to know, at least to some extent, the nature and value of his estate. To this we answer that presumptions will not be indulged in order to establish a state of facts that would cast a wife, after more than 30 years' faithful service, penniless upon the world. Neither does the doctor pretend to say that he explained to her what her marital rights were in the property of her prospective husband, and of which this contract was totally depriving her. On the contrary, his whole aim seemed to be to explain to and satisfy her, to use his own language, "of the necessity for the peace offering in the neighborhood on account of the young people living there." When this contract is considered in the light of the circumstances under which it was executed, and the relation in which the parties were situated at the time, their station in life, education, and advantages, we are constrained to the belief that appellee did not understand its terms, but executed same under the mistaken belief that it was a "peace offering," prepared for the express purpose of preventing trouble between herself and the children of Judge Tilton. Such a contract could only be sustained by evidence of the most positive character, to the effect that its terms were fully comprehended, understood, and acquiesced in. No testimony of such a character is introduced in this case.

Lastly it is urged in argument that, after the execution of the contract, appellee had more than two months within which to advise herself as to her rights before she entered into her marriage with the judge, and that therefore she must have been satisfied, else she would have made complaint. This argument is without force. The contract had been signed, and passed from her, and undoubtedly the same influence which induced her to sign it operated to lull her into silence and acquiescence, not only during the two succeeding months, but during the 32 years which followed. The question is not, was she satisfied? but, was she deceived? It was not until after her husband's death that she realized and understood how cruelly she had been imposed upon and deceived in the execution of this contract, and how helpless and poverty stricken it left her in her old age, after a life of service and devotion. Equity to the wife demands that this contract be canceled and held for naught, and appellee awarded that interest in the estate of her husband to which, under the law, she is entitled.

The judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with instruction to the trial court to enter judgment in conformity with this opinion.

ROBERTSON et al. v. ROBERTSON'S TRUSTEE et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. TRUSTS (§ 218*)—MANAGEMENT OF TRUST ESTATE—INVESTMENT—LOSSES—LIABILITY.

In the absence of a statute, a trustee investing trust funds in bank stock is liable for the loss sustained by the depreciation of the stock, notwithstanding his good faith in making the investment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 310; Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

2. TRUSTS (§ 217*)—MANAGEMENT OF TRUST ESTATE—INVESTMENT—LOSSES—LIABILITY.

Under Ky. St. 1908, § 4706, authorizing trustees to invest trust funds in dividend-paying securities of any railroad or other corporation which has been in operation for more than 10 years, etc., a trustee cannot invest funds in bank stock unless the bank has been in operation for more than 10 years.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Shelby County. "To be officially reported."

Action by George T. Robertson and others against Mary Ann Robertson's trustee and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

P. J. Beard, for appellants. J. C. Beckham & Son and Beard & Marshall, for appellees.

BARKER, J. The learned trial judge in his opinion in this case makes the following statement of facts, upon which the legal issues turn, which we adopt as our own: "The defendant S. S. Weakley as trustee of Mary Ann Robertson, in 1901 invested $1,300 of trust funds in his hands in 26 shares of the stock of the Bank of Waddy, which began business in January, 1900. In his settlement in the county court he was credited by this investment. The cestui que trust having died, this action in equity is brought by parties interested in the estate to surcharge his settlement, and make him liable for the bank stock investment, it having become worthless. Upon this record there can be no doubt that the trustee made the investment in perfect good faith, and that it was such as a prudent business man would make in his own affairs, and to secure a certain support for himself and family. The evidence shows conclusively that when the trustee invested the money, the stock was generally regarded as worth as much or more than he gave for it. The directors were regarded as good business men, and men of means and fine business standing were interested in the bank as officers and stockholders. It was then a good dividend-paying stock, and continued to be until July, 1905. The trustee owned stock in the bank, individually; in fact purchased some for himself after the trust investment was made, and not long before the bank made an assignment. Other trustees besides the defendant invested trust funds in the stock of the bank, which was finally wrecked by the cunning dishonesty of its cashier." The question arising for adjudication upon the foregoing statement of fact is whether or not the appellee was liable for the loss of the trust fund in his hands, caused by the investment in the stock of the wrecked Bank of Waddy.

It is clear that the trustee, under the rule prevailing in this state prior to the enactment of the statute which we shall hereafter discuss, would be liable for the loss sustained. In the case of Smith v. Smith, 7 J. J. Marsh. 238, the guardian was held liable for the depreciation of 16 shares of stock in the Bank of Kentucky, which he had purchased with his ward's money; and in Clark et ux. v. Anderson, 13 Bush, 111, it was held that the investment by the trustee of the funds of his cestui que trust in second mortgage bonds of the Louisville, Cincinnati & Lexington R. R. Company was unauthorized, and the loss cast upon the trustee. In that case, Chief Justice Lindsay, speaking for the court, said: "In this state trust funds may be loaned on personal security when it is ample and sufficient (Higgins v. McClure, 7 Bush, 381; Clay v. Clay, 3 Metc. 548), and may be invested in certain public securities (Myer's Supp. 264; Gen. St. 508), with the sanction of a court of equity; but no judicial precedent or statutory regulation will justify their investment in the stock or bonds of private corporations, and bonds secured by a second mortgage on the roadbed and other property of a railway company are peculiarly objectionable." The opinion in Durrett's Guardian v. Commonwealth, 90 Ky. 312, 14 S. W. 189, does not justify the investment by the guardian of his ward's money in the stock of a bank as an original proposition. It is there held that, inasmuch as the funds were originally invested by the ancestor in bank stock, and in this shape came to the guardian's hands, he was justified in selling the bank stock which had begun to depreciate, and in investing the proceeds in other bank stock which appeared a safer investment. In speaking of the duty of a trustee, in the opinion under consideration, it is said: "Mere good faith, while requisite and commendable, is not all that is required of such a fiduciary. He must be competent also. While it is his duty to make the ward's estate as productive as a prudent use will admit, yet he must do so in conformity to law. He must possess such legal knowledge as is needful to the proper execution of the trust." Again: "It is the duty of the guardian to make the estate productive, and he may therefore, in a prudent manner, loan out the money of the ward, taking solvent personal security. In such a case he will not be held liable if a loss results without neglect upon his part in preventing it." The case turned upon the right of the guardian to change the security, and there is nothing said by the court which would authorize the assumption that the trustee, as an original proposition, had the right, as the law then stood, to invest the trust fund in the stock of a private banking corporation. From the foregoing authority it is clear that, unless the trustee is authorized by the statute now in force in this state bearing upon the question in hand, he cannot escape liability in the instance before us. The statute relied upon to justify the investment is contained in section 4706 of the Kentucky Statutes of 1903, which is as follows: "That it shall be lawful for persons or corporations holding funds in a fiduciary capacity for loan or investment, to invest the same in real estate, mortgage notes or bonds, or in such other interest-bearing or dividend-paying securities as are regarded by prudent business men as safe investments, and to make loans with such securities as collateral; but such funds shall not be invested in the bonds or securities of any railroad, or other corporation, unless such railroad, or other corporation, has been in operation more than ten years, and, during that time, has not defaulted in the payment of principal or interest on its bonded debt, or be invested in the bonds of a county, district, town or city that, within ten years, has defaulted in the payment of the interest or principal of its bonded debt; and a fiduciary shall account for all interest or profit received."

It is confidently urged that the foregoing statute authorizes the investment by the trustee of the trust fund in the stock of the Bank of Waddy; it being said that this is permitted, in the following general language succeeding the specific enumeration of the property authorized by name, to wit: " * * * Or in such other interest-bearing or dividend-paying securities as are regarded by prudent business men as safe investment, and to make loans with such securities as collateral." It is contended that bank stock is a dividend-paying security, and is included in the general language following the specific enumeration. But the appellant insists that, even admitting this part of appellee's contention to be sound, the investment in question is included in the prohibition of the investment of trust funds in the bonds or securities of any railroad, or other corporation, unless such railroad, or other corporation, has been in operation more than 10 years, and during that time has not defaulted in the payment of principal or interest on its bonded debt. We are inclined to believe that the contention of the appellant is sound, and that, in order that a trustee may be justified in the investment of trust funds in bank stock, the corporation must have been in operation more than 10 years. We cannot give our assent to the proposition that the investment of trust funds in bank stock is permitted under the general words "or dividend-paying securities," and yet not included in the inhibition of investing in the securities of other corporations, unless such corporations have been in operation more than 10 years. The object of the statute is to render the investment of trust funds as secure as possible on the one hand, and at the same time to widen the field of investment as far as is reasonably consistent with safety. One of the best securities for the integrity of the fund is the fact that the corporation has stood the test of time. This time test is fixed by the Legislature at 10 years, and this was considered necessary to prove the safety and solvency of the corporation in question. There is every reason for fearing for the safety of funds invested in a newly embarked banking venture; but, after time has demonstrated the capacity of the officials to manage the corporation, their honesty and integrity, and also that the business can be made profitable at a given place for a long period of time, then it is that the law considers that trust funds may, with reasonable safety, be invested therein.

We are not willing, on the one hand, to widen by interpretation the field for the investment of trust funds, without also by interpretation holding fast to the safeguards which the Legislature has thrown around such investments. We see no more reason for permitting the investment in bank stock under the general language in the first part of the statute than there is for including it also in the inhibition of the general language following the specific enumeration in the latter part. The doctrine of ejusdem generis applies equally to the two instances. It seems to us that, assuming for the purposes of this case that bank stock is legitimate property for the investment of trust funds under the permissive part of the statute, it is also included in the inhibitory part, and that, before a trustee is permitted to invest the funds of his cestui que trust in stock of private business corporations, these must have fulfilled the requirements of the statute as to the time of their existence. This, it is admitted, the Bank of Waddy had not done; and therefore it follows that the investment was not justified.

For these reasons the judgment of the trial court is reversed, for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 764*) — DEFECTS IN STREETS—SIDEWALKS—USE BY VEHICLES—LIABILITY FOR INJURY.

A city's sidewalks are intended solely for the use of pedestrians, and, while they must be kept in reasonably safe repair for such use, the city is not bound to keep them fit for the use of vehicles also, and if drivers use them for passage of wagons they do so at their peril.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Dec. Dig. § 764.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 764*) — DEFECTS IN STREETS—SIDEWALKS—USE BY VEHICLES—ACQUIESCENCE OF CITY.

The fact that sidewalks had been used by vehicles for many years with the acquiescence of the city would not render the city liable for injuries to drivers because the sidewalks were not fit for vehicles.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 764*) — DEFECTS IN STREETS—SIDEWALKS—USE BY VEHICLES—DUTY OF CITY TO FURNISH ROADWAY.

That the only practicable way for wagons to reach a railroad depot was by using the sidewalk did not render the city liable for injuries to a driver caused by the sidewalk being unfit for such use, as the city was not legally bound to provide a roadway for such purpose.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lewis County.

"To be officially reported."

Action by John M. Webster against the city of Vanceburg. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Allan D. Cole, for appellant. R. D. Wilson, for appellee.

O'REAR, J. The Chesapeake & Ohio Railway freight depot in Vanceburg is situated on Main street, alongside of which is a pavement. The lay of the land is such that in getting freight into the depot for shipment, and in getting it out for delivery in town, teamsters have for years crossed the pavement in taking their wagons and drays up to the depot building to load and unload freight. Appellant, who was a drayman, loaded his dray with baled hay from the depot, or a car by it, and for that purpose and his own convenience had driven his dray upon the pavement. In driving off the pavement the wheels of his dray dropped off at the pavement curbing, one before the other, which was a foot or more lower at that point than the sidewalk. From the jar thus caused appellant was thrown to the ground and sustained a serious injury to his shoulder. He sued the city, because it had neglected to so repair the pavement at that point as to make it reasonably safe for its use by wagons having occasion to go to the freight depot. Upon the evidence showing the foregoing state of facts, the trial court peremptorily instructed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant city, of which appellant complains on this appeal.

The sidewalks of a city are intended solely for the use of pedestrians. While they must be kept in reasonably safe repair for such use, the city is not bound to keep them fit for the use of vehicles also. If drivers of vehicles nevertheless use them for passage of their wagons, they must do so at their peril. Nor does the fact that the pavements have been so used by the acquiescence of the city for many years affect its liability in the matter, so far as vehicle drivers are concerned.

It is argued that the way used by appellant was the only practicable way for wagons to reach the depot. Be that as it may, the city was not legally bound to provide a roadway for wagons to the railroad depot, and is not liable for a failure to do so. If the driver of the wagon saw proper to use ways not provided for such vehicles, he has no legal complaint against the city that they were not fit for the use to which he was putting them. A city's legal duty is not to furnish streets, even where they may be needed; but it is to keep such as it does furnish in a reasonably safe condition for use for purposes for which they are provided—sidewalks for pedestrians; roadways for vehicles and horses.

Judgment affirmed.

BAILEY v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Nov. 12, 1908.)

1. EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 28*)—INDICTMENT—REQUISITES.

Cr. Code Prac. § 124, requires that an indictment be direct and certain as to the party and offense charged, the county where committed, and the particular circumstances thereof, if necessary, to constitute a complete offense; and section 135 declares that it shall be sufficient to allege larceny or embezzlement of money, without specifying the coin, number, or kind thereof. Held, that an indictment charging that defendant, while treasurer, secretary, and general manager of a certain corporation, and intrusted with its money, chattels, and effects, embezzled and unlawfully and fraudulently converted to his own use, with intent to deprive the corporation of the same, its money, effects, and property, a more particular description of which is unknown to the grand jury, to the amount of $500, was sufficient to withstand a demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Embezzlement, Cent. Dig. § 42; Dec. Dig. § 28; Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 279.]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 119*)—CHARGES NOT SUFFICIENTLY PLEADED—SURPLUSAGE.

If an indictment is sufficient to withstand a demurrer as to all facts constituting a complete offense, other charges, not sufficiently pleaded to stand alone, may be regarded as surplusage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 314; Dec. Dig. § 119.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

3. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 120*)—CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE OFFENSE.

Under Cr. Code Prac. § 124, requiring that an indictment shall be definite and certain as to the particular circumstances of the offense charged, an allegation, in an indictment for embezzlement by a corporate officer, as to the effects and property of the corporation alleged to have been embezzled, not specifically described, should be disregarded as surplusage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 315; Dec. Dig. § 120.*]

4. EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 35*)—INDICTMENT—CONSTRUCTION.

An allegation in an indictment for embezzlement that defendant fraudulently converted the money and property in question "to his own use and to the use of other persons," not described, should be limited to the inquiry as to conversion to defendant's own use.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Embezzlement, Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

5. EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 33*)—CORPORATE OFFICER—CONVERSION TO USE OF OTHERS—INDICTMENT.

Under Ky. St. 1908, § 1202, authorizing conviction of a corporate officer for conversion of its property to the use of others, an indictment charging such offense must name the persons to whose use the property has been converted, or otherwise describe them, if unknown to the grand jury, so that they may be identified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Embezzlement, Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 147*)—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—TIME—LIMITATIONS.

There being no limitation against a prosecution of an officer of a corporation for embezzlement of its funds, which is a felony, time is not a necessary element of the offense, further than that the offense must have been committed before indictment found.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 147.*]

7. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 121*)—BILL OF PARTICULARS.

Where an indictment for embezzlement, though sufficient to withstand a demurrer, contained a mere general charge and did not disclose the particular transaction which would be asserted against accused, his remedy was by application for a bill of particulars.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 316; Dec. Dig. § 121; * Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1378.]

8. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 121*)—BILL OF PARTICULARS—REQUISITES.

Where a bill of particulars is applied for in a criminal case, it should not be so loose as to constitute a drag net, so that accused may be surprised at the trial; nor is the commonwealth required to specify exact dates, nor state circumstances with such absolute precision as may hamper it in presenting its case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 316; Dec. Dig. § 121; * Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1378.]

9. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 121*)—BILL OF PARTICULARS—DISCRETION.

Whether a bill of particulars will be ordered in a criminal case rests in the sound judicial discretion of the trial judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 316; Dec. Dig. § 121; * Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1378.]

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1149*)—APPEAL—REVIEW—DISCRETION—BILL OF PARTICULARS.

The discretion of a trial judge in ruling on an application for a bill of particulars in a criminal case is reviewable, and subject to correction if abused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 3041; Dec. Dig. § 1149.*]

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 753*)—PEREMPTORY INSTRUCTIONS—INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Where an indictment against an officer of a corporation alleged embezzlement of its funds by a conversion thereof to his own use, but there was no evidence that he had ever benefited by any of the corporation's money, the court erred in refusing a peremptory instruction to find him not guilty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1727; Dec. Dig. § 753.*]

12. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 132*)—ACTS CONSTITUTING OFFENSE—ELECTION.

Where, in a prosecution for embezzlement, the commonwealth elected to rely on a specified transaction to secure a conviction, it should have been confined thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 431; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

13. EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 44*)—CORPORATE OFFICERS—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

Where defendant, as manager of a corporation, bought certain real estate for it through a real estate agent, the fact that he paid an alleged excessive price, in the absence of proof of a fraudulent purpose, or that accused benefited from the transaction at the expense of the corporation, was insufficient to sustain an indictment for embezzlement charging conversion of the corporation's funds to his own use.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Embezzlement, Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

14. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 371*)—EVIDENCE—OTHER OFFENSES.

In a prosecution of a corporate officer for a particular embezzlement alleged, letters written by him to the corporation's president, admitting other wrongdoing with reference to the corporation's affairs, were inadmissible under the rule that proof of other offenses is irrelevant, subject to an exception when such evidence shows the motive for the particular offense on trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 832; Dec. Dig. § 371.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hopkins County.

"To be officially reported."

I. Bailey, Sr., was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Jonson & Jennings and Waddill & Dempsey, for appellant. James Breathitt, Atty. Gen., Theo. B. Blakey, and Ruby Laffoon, for the Commonwealth.

O'REAR, C. J. This appeal is prosecuted from a conviction; the charge being embezzlement.

Appellant was, and for many years had been, treasurer, secretary, and general manager of the Reinecke Coal Company, a corporation whose place of business was at Madisonville, Ky. The indictment, following substantially the Kentucky statute against the crime of embezzlement, charged that appellant, while such officer of the corporation named, and being intrusted with its money, chattels, and effects, had embezzled, and unlawfully and fraudulently converted to his own use, with intent to deprive that corporation of same, its money, effects, and property, a more particular description of which was unknown to the grand jury, to the amount of $500. A demurrer to the indictment was overruled. Appellant complains that the indictment was too vague and uncertain to apprise him of the particular offense charged and to put him on notice of what the commonwealth would attempt at the trial to prove. While our Criminal Code of Practice requires the indictment to be direct and certain as to (1) the party charged, (2) the offense charged, (3) the county in which the offense was committed, and (4) the particular circumstances of the offense charged, if they be necessary to constitute a complete offense (section 124, Cr. Code Prac.), yet by section 135, Id., it is made sufficient to allege the larceny or embezzlement of money, without specifying the coin, or number, denomination, or kind thereof. Jones v. Commonwealth, 13 Bush, 356; Travis v. Commonwealth, 96 Ky. 77, 27 S. W. 863. An indictment worded as this one is in its main features was held good in Schlitbaum v. Commonwealth, 80 S. W. 784, 26 Ky. Law Rep. 54. If an indictment contains sufficient to stand the test of a demurrer as to all facts constituting a complete offense, other charges which are not sufficiently pleaded to stand alone may be disregarded as surplusage. So that the charge in this indictment as to effects and property of the corporation alleged to have been embezzled, because not specified or described so as to satisfy the requirements of the Code (section 124, supra), that the indictment shall be definite and certain as to the particular circumstances of the offense charged, may be disregarded as surplusage or immaterial matter. Likewise the allegation in the indictment that appellant fraudulently converted the money and property "to his own use and to the use of other persons" should be limited to an inquiry as to the alleged conversion to his own use. An indictment for embezzlement, charging a fraudulent conversion by the officer or agent of a corporation of its property to the use of others, which may be had under the statute (section 1202, Ky. St. 1903), must name the persons to whose use the property was so converted, or otherwise describe them, if unknown to the grand jury, so that they may be identified. Hence the latter clause of the last quotation may also be regarded as surplusage. It follows that the remainder of the indictment, charging appellant with having fraudulently, while an officer or agent of the corporation, having its money intrusted to his custody, converted $500 of its money to his own use, intending to deprive the owner of the same, is sufficiently definite to meet the requirements of good pleading.

It sometimes happens from the nature of the case, of which the one in hand may be a fair example, that even a good indictment may fail to particularize the acts relied upon as constituting the offense, so as to fully and fairly put the accused upon notice as to what will be attempted to be proved against him on the trial, so that he may be prepared to meet it with evidence. There is no limitation against such prosecutions for felony in this state. Hence time is not a necessary element in the declaration, further than that the offense was committed before the finding of the indictment. Appellant was treasurer, secretary, and general manager of the corporation for perhaps 20 years. In that time many thousands of dollars of the corporation's money passed through his hands. A general charge, such as is contained in this indictment, might afford him little or no clue as to the particular transaction which would be asserted against him in the evidence as criminal. Fair play, not to say a regard for that scrupulous care which the state ought to take, and which it does take, to afford one accused of a base crime every reasonable opportunity to face the particular transaction which the grand jury had investigated, and for which he is to be arraigned at the bar of the court, call for something more than a technically good indictment. But the way of reaching the matter is not by demurrer. A bill of particulars, in such case, is the proper practice; that is, a statement filed by the prosecution, in which it is indicated the particular circumstances intended to be relied on as constituting the offense, and to which it will be confined in the further progress of the case. It need not specify exact dates, nor with absolute precision such other circumstances as might hamper the commonwealth in presenting its case; nor should it be so loose as to constitute a dragnet, in which forgotten, unsuspected acts might be brought to the surface, surprising the accused, and operating as a practical matter as unjustly as the most indefinite charge could. The accused should be put fairly upon notice. The commonwealth should have reasonable latitude. The whole matter rests in the sound judicial discretion of the trial judge, and he will order it or not as the circumstances of each particular case may seem to warrant. Like other matters of judicial discretion, his action is reviewable, and subject to correction if abused. Bishop's New Criminal Procedure, 3643; People v. John McKinney, 10 Mich. 54. But, as there was not a motion for a bill of particulars in this case, there was not an exercise of discretion in the matter by the trial court, and consequently no error in its ruling upon the demurrer.

At the conclusion of the evidence for the commonwealth, the defendant moved for a peremptory instruction to the jury to find him not guilty, which was refused. This we think was error, for there was no evidence of his having converted any money of the corporation to his own use. At the close of all the evidence the motion was renewed, and again overruled. The commonwealth had staked its case on a transaction in 1903, wherein appellant on behalf of his corporation had bought a tract of coal land in Hopkins county. It was shown that the vendor, one Brumley, had instructed a real estate agent to sell the land. The latter priced it to appellant for $3,300. Appellant bought it at that price, he claims. At least he paid the real estate agent that sum for it. He had no personal transaction with Brumley. The deed recites the consideration as $2,800. Brumley testified that he was paid only $2,800, of which he paid the real estate agent $50 for making the sale. The latter claims his agreement with Brumley was that the agent was to have for his commission all that he got for the land above $2,750. He admits that appellant paid him $3,800, and that he paid to Brumley only $2,750. Appellant directed the bookkeeper of the corporation to enter the purchase price on the company's books as $3,300. There was no evidence that appellant got a penny of the money. On the contrary, all the evidence was that he paid the real estate agent the whole $3,800. It is claimed that he ought to have known, when he saw the deed, that he could have bought, and was in fact buying, the land for $2,800. But that is not material here. There is no evidence of any fraudulent purpose on the part of appellant in the matter, however improvident it may have later appeared. It was also shown that appellant some months later sold the surface of the land for $2,400 or $2,500, paying the same real estate agent $100 for making that sale. It is not claimed that the sale was not a wise step, or that appellant profited by it personally in any way. The whole of the purchase money was paid to the company. But it is intimated that the real estate man was allowed to make too much out of the transaction. However that was, there being no evidence of fraud in it on appellant's part, it was not embezzlement to the use of another, even though that other had been named in the indictment. But, as we have seen, the indictment did not put appellant on trial for such a charge, and the commonwealth, having elected to rely upon the main Brumley transaction as that upon which it expected a conviction, should have been confined to it.

Certain letters written to O. Reinecke, who was president and principal stockholder of the corporation, written by appellant before the indictment in this case and while he was at a sanatorium at Battle Creek, Mich., suffering from a nervous breakdown, were introduced as evidence against him. They admitted wrongdoing on his part, including the taking of money from Reinecke by appellant in the past; but they did not allude in terms or by necessary implication to the transaction now under investigation, nor did they either allude to any funds of the coal corporation. That they were written concerning the coal company's affairs (but not this one), appellant, while testifying in his own behalf, was forced by the court to admit. This was error, as was the introduction of the letters. Proof that one has committed other offenses is not relevant to establish that he is guilty of a distinct, though similar, offense. An exception is, when the evidence of the other offenses will show motive for the particular one for which he is being tried, the former may be proved. But such was not the purport of this evidence, and such could not have been its natural or legal effect. We think the letters were incompetent on this trial.

So far as this record discloses, the transaction under investigation is really a dispute between Brumley and his agent, in which neither appellant nor the coal corporation appear to be now concerned.

Judgment reversed, and remanded for a new trial under proceedings not inconsistent herewith.

ST. LOUIS & S. W. RY. CO. OF TEXAS v. THOMPSON.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. CONSPIRACY (§ 21*)—CIVIL LIABILITY—JOINT OR SEVERAL LIABILITY—VERDICT.

Where, in an action against a railroad company and certain individuals for conspiracy to expel plaintiff from a brotherhood of locomotive engineers, the jury found against the railway company, but in favor of all the other defendants, the verdict also acquitted the railway company, as a conspiracy cannot be formed by a single person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

2. CONSPIRACY (§ 21*)—JOINT OR SEVERAL LIABILITY—VERDICT.

In a civil action for conspiracy against several, the jury cannot find all guilty, and inflict punishment on but one.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 136*)—QUESTION OF LAW AND FACT.

In an action for conspiracy in expelling plaintiff from a society because of the writing of a certain letter, whether the writing of the letter could be reasonably considered a violation of plaintiff's obligation to the laws of the society was for the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 818-827; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

4. BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS (§ 10*)—MEMBERS—EXPULSION—QUESTIONS—DETERMINATION.

If the members of a beneficial association acted fairly and in good faith in the trial of a member, and believed that a letter written by plaintiff and the circumstances attending it, was a violation of the laws of the order, a finding to that effect would be conclusive on the courts on the question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Beneficial Associations, Cent. Dig. § 17; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

5. CONSPIRACY (§ 21*)—GOOD FAITH—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action for conspiracy to wrongfully expel plaintiff from a society, whether the members acted fairly and in good faith in finding that a letter written by plaintiff was in violation of the constitution and laws of the order was for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

6. BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS (§ 10*)—MEMBERS—EXPULSION—CIVIL LIABILITY—DAMAGES.

Where the members of a beneficial association act fairly and in good faith, on testimony submitted to them in support of charges against a member and find him guilty of violating his obligations or the constitution and laws of the order, their action is conclusive; but, if they act in bad faith, and not in the exercise of an honest judgment, and expel the member, then their action is void, and the member may recover therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Beneficial Associations, Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

7. BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS (§ 10*)—MEMBERS—EXPULSION—GROUNDS.

That a member of a brotherhood of locomotive engineers became a witness against a railroad company, and testified to the injury of the other members, causing the brotherhood at large to lose prestige with the railroad company, was no ground for expulsion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Beneficial Associations, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

8. BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS (§ 10*)—MEMBERS—EXPULSION—DAMAGES.

If a member of a beneficial association was entitled to recover damages for his wrongful expulsion, he might recover as actual damages such sum as would compensate him for his pecuniary loss for mental suffering and humiliation, and the value of his insurance policy and a traveling card, forfeited thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Beneficial Associations, Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

9. CONSPIRACY (§ 20*)—CIVIL LIABILITY—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

In an action for conspiracy to procure plaintiff's expulsion from a beneficial association, plaintiff, if entitled to recover, could recover exemplary damages against those defendants shown to have been actuated by malice in making or prosecuting the charges; it not being required, as in the case of actual damages recovered, that all the defendants should be subjected to the same verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

10. BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS (§ 12*)—MEMBERS—EXPULSION—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—REMEDIES IN ASSOCIATION—EXHAUSTION.

A member of a beneficial association, having been wrongfully expelled, is not required to prosecute all his remedies by appeal within the association before instituting a suit for damages against those responsible for his expulsion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Beneficial Associations, Cent. Dig. § 21; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

11. BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS (§ 20*)—ACTIONS—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

Where there was evidence raising an issue of exemplary damages, in an action for conspiracy, resulting in plaintiff's expulsion from a beneficial association, evidence that plaintiff at the time had a home of his own, a wife, and two children was admissible as bearing on the effect such expulsion might have on his mind and reputation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Beneficial Associations, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

12. BENEFICIAL ASSOCIATIONS (§ 10*)—MEMBERS—EXPULSION—EVIDENCE.

Where a member of a beneficial association was not tried before the association for taking improper fees as a witness, or for falsely representing himself as an expert in actions against a railroad company, evidence that he had done so was inadmissible to support a finding of the association that he was guilty of other charges.

Error from Court of Civil Appeals of First Supreme Judicial District.

Action by W. Z. Thompson against the St. Louis & Southwestern Railway Company of Texas. Judgment for plaintiff against the railway company alone, affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (108 S. W. 453), and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

E. B. Perkins and Marsh & McIlwaine, for plaintiff in error. John M. Duncan and H. E. Lasseter, for defendant in error.

BROWN, J. Thompson instituted this suit in the district court of Smith county against the St. Louis & Southwestern Railway Company of Texas, the Grand International Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, J. J. Bartholomew, W. H. McCorkle, G. L. Mc-

Cardell, M. M. Bartholomew, and R. J. McCool to recover of them damages occasioned to the plaintiff by wrongfully and maliciously causing him to be expelled from the said order of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. Omitting the detail of facts, we will make this brief statement, which will be sufficient for the purposes of this opinion. There was a division of the order of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers at Tyler, No. 201, and the plaintiff, Thompson, and the different individual defendants, were each and all members of that division. The petition charged that the railway company, acting by Green, a general officer of that corporation, J. J. Bartholomew, W. H. McCorkle, G. L. McCardell, M. M. Bartholomew, and R. J. McCool, entered into a conspiracy and combination whereby they agreed and undertook to secure the expulsion of the plaintiff from the said Brotherhood, and, in pursuance of that confederation and conspiracy and to accomplish that purpose, the said individual defendants made out, deposited, and filed with the said Division No. 201 of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers at Tyler the following charges against this plaintiff: "Specification of charges. For writing to Mrs. A. H. Penniman, and urging her to sue the Cotton Belt Railway for the death of her husband. For going on the witness stand in the Bolton case and testifying against the Cotton Belt Railway Company to the injury of the other brothers, and causing the brotherhood at large to lose prestige with the Cotton Belt Railway Company." It is alleged that the said charges were false, and that they were knowingly and maliciously made and presented to the said division. Thereafter the said Division No. 201 of the said Brotherhood notified the petitioner, and placed him upon trial on the said charges. It is alleged that the prosecution of him in the division was maliciously done by the said defendants, and that the members of the said division had no reasonable ground to believe that he was guilty of said charges, and did not believe that he was guilty thereof, but that the said proceeding was prosecuted against him for the unlawful purpose of deterring him from appearing when summoned as a witness in cases against the Cotton Belt Railway. Upon a trial had before the said division, the charges were sustained and the petitioner was expelled therefrom. Petitioner appealed from the said decision to P. M. Arthur, Grand Chief Engineer, who, notwithstanding the unjust and false charges made against the plaintiff, sustained the action of said division. And, in pursuance of said expulsion, the plaintiff's name was printed as one who had been expelled from the said order in a journal of the said International Brotherhood, and was circulated largely in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, greatly to his humiliation and detriment. The plaintiff in his petition alleged with particularity the different elements of injury that he sustained by reason of the action of the said division procured by the malicious and willful conspiracy and combination of the defendants. Among other things, he alleged that he held a policy of insurance in the said order for $1,500 upon which he had paid large sums for a number of years, which by the rules of the order was forfeited upon his expulsion and as consequence thereof. He also alleged that, as a member of said order, he was entitled to and had a traveling card which entitled him to ride free upon the trains of the different railroads in the United States, Canada, and Mexico, which was also forfeited as a consequence of said expulsion. He alleged mental suffering and humiliation by reason of the unjust and unlawful action of the said defendants. The case was tried before a jury, which, after being out for some time, presented to the court the following question: "Hon. R. W. Simpson, District Judge. Dear Sir: A part of the jury is not clear as to whether they can find for the defendant separately, as well as collectively. Therefore we ask your advice on this point. Very respt., G. H. Aikins, Foreman." And to this the court replied in writing as follows: "Gentlemen of the Jury: In answer to foregoing question, you are charged as follows: If you should find for all the defendants, your verdict will be 'We the jury find for the defendants.' If you should find in favor of some defendants and against others, your verdict should state against which defendants you find, naming them, and in favor of which defendants you find, naming them. R. W. Simpson, Judge Presiding." The jury returned this verdict: "We, the jury, find for plaintiff in this case a verdict for twenty-five hundred dollars ($2,500.00), five hundred ($500.00) as actual damages, and two thousand ($2,000.00) as exemplary damages against the defendant the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company and for the other defendants. G. H. Aikins, Foreman." The railroad company moved in arrest of judgment, because, the jury having found by their verdict that the other defendants were not guilty of conspiracy, no judgment could be entered against the railroad company. The same proposition was presented by motion for a rehearing. Both motions were overruled, and, upon appeal to the Court of Civil Appeals of the First District, that court affirmed the judgment of the trial court.

The railroad company did not and could not actually participate in the act of expelling the defendant in error from the order, and can only be held liable for the results of that action by reason of the fact that it had entered into a conspiracy with the individual defendants named to procure some action by the Brotherhood against Thompson. The jury distinctly found for the defendants other than the railroad company, and thereby acquitted all other defendants from having entered into a conspiracy with the railroad company. There is no room for construction of this verdict, for it is expressed in plain language that the railroad company is the only guilty party defendant to the suit. Under the allegations in this case, the railroad company could not have accomplished the injury which was done to Thompson by its own action, but necessarily must have acted through other guilty parties. It therefore follows that an acquittal of all other defendants acquitted the railroad company of the charge made against it. A conspiracy cannot be formed by one person. Collins v. Cronin, 177 Pa. 35, 11 Atl. 869. In the case cited a father and son were charged with a conspiracy to defraud creditors of the son. "It was alleged that Cornelius Cronin has confessed fraudulent judgments to his son John for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and cheating the creditors of the former, that executions had been issued upon these fraudulent judgments, and his property sold and bought in by the son at much less than its value. This, if true, would have been a fraud upon the plaintiff and other creditors. The jury found that it was not true under proper instructions from the court; for how could fraudulent judgments spring into existence between a father and son without collusion, combination, and conspiracy? And, if the judgments were bona fide, then the son was merely using the legal remedies to collect an honest debt due from his father." In that case, as in this, it was contended that the conspiracy or combination between the parties was not necessary to make the father liable, but the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania distinguished the case then before them from one cited as authority in the following explicit manner: "Under the facts of that case the combination or conspiracy was nothing. One of the defendants could have traduced the character of the plaintiff as a teacher, as well as a number of them, and, if he had done so, he was clearly liable in damages for his own act, even although the other defendants had no part in it. It is an act capable of being performed by one defendant alone. But in the case in hand the conspiracy was everything. Without it plaintiff had no cause of action, for the plain reason that the acts charged in the declaration were of such a nature that they could not be committed by one defendant alone." This clearly distinguishes the case now under consideration from those cited by attorneys for the defendants in error. The gravamen of the action in this case is the injury done; that is, the wrongful expulsion of defendant in error from the order of the Brotherhood of Engineers. The railroad company could not have effected that act alone. It could only do it, as we have said before, by the action of its codefendants through a conspiracy entered into by and between the railroad company and the other defendants. The verdict of the jury in effect finds as to the other defendants that the expulsion was not wrongful or was not procured through the combination charged. Therefore the railroad company could not be guilty and all others innocent.

It is insisted with much earnestness by the attorneys of the defendants in error that the jury might have found all the parties guilty, and yet inflict the punishment upon one of them. Let us test the correctness of this proposition by writing the verdict so as to express the implied proposition of the defendants' counsel. Suppose the jury had said: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff against the defendant railroad company, and also against the other defendants, but we assess the damages alone against the railroad company for $2,500." Would the gentlemen contend for such a verdict, or would any court sustain such a discrimination? If it would not sustain it as written out, it cannot sustain it as necessarily implied in the argument of the attorneys for the defendants in error.

It is insisted that suit might have been brought against the railroad company alone in this case. Grant that to be true (we do not intend to intimate to the contrary), the result would be the same, for, in order to recover against the railroad company, the same allegations and proof would be necessary to recover against it as is required in this case; i. e., it would be necessary for the plaintiff to prove the conspiracy between the parties, the unlawful action of other defendants in agreeing to carry it out, both as to making the charge and as to the action of the division, and, if plaintiff should fail to make such proof, he could not recover against the railroad company. If that company had been sued alone and the case submitted on special issues, and the jury had answered that the other defendants did not enter into the conspiracy, or that the expulsion was lawful, no judgment could be entered against the railroad company, although the jury should find against it. We conclude, therefore, that the court erred in giving the charge in answer to the request of the jury, and also erred in overruling the motion in arrest of judgment and the motion for a new trial, for which errors this case must be reversed.

The trial court erred in submitting the issues in this case to the jury by using the following language: "Then, if you further find from the testimony that the writing of the Penniman letter could not reasonably be considered a violation of plaintiff's obligation to the laws of the Brotherhood," etc. The court should have decided that question. If the members of the Brotherhood who tried Thompson, acting in good faith and in fairness towards Thompson, believed and held that the writing of the letter to Mrs. Penniman and the circumstances attending it did or did not constitute a violation of the constitution and laws of the order, that finding would be conclusive of the question. Whether or not the members of the order acted fairly and in good faith towards Thompson in placing this construction upon the letter and the circumstances attending it was a question of fact for the jury, and was so submitted to them. If the members of Division No. 201 of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers in good faith fairly and honestly passed upon the testimony submitted to them, and found Thompson guilty of violating his obligation, or the constitution and laws of the order, then their action would be final and conclusive of the matter, and the plaintiff could not recover in this case because of his expulsion from that order, nor for any of the consequences flowing from it, although they may have found him guilty on the second charge also. If, however, the members of that order did not act in good faith, and did not exercise their honest judgment in coming to the conclusion that, by writing the Penniman letter, Thompson was guilty of a violation of his obligation, or the constitution and laws of the order, but used it as a pretext by which to expel him on account of the second charge made against him, then their action would be void, and Thompson would be entitled to recover.

The second charge, whereby Thompson was arraigned for having gone on the witness stand in the Bolton case and testified, did not furnish any ground for his expulsion from the order. If the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers had in their constitution or by-laws provided in so many words that a member who should testify in court in any case where he was called as a witness should be expelled, such provision would be a nullity, and would not be enforced in any court. If Thompson was wrongfully expelled through procurement of the Cotton Belt Railroad Company by a conspiracy and combination with other defendants named because he wrote the Penniman letter, or if he was expelled because he had done what was charged against him in the second specification alone, and not upon the first charge, then he would be entitled to recover against the railroad company, and against such of the other defendants as conspired and acted with it and against the order which expelled him for all damages which naturally flowed from such expulsion.

If the plaintiff shall be found entitled to recover against the defendants, his recovery should be for actual damages; that is, that sum of money which would compensate him for the pecuniary losses sustained by him as a result of his unlawful expulsion, and also such sum as would compensate him for the mental suffering and humiliation that was caused to him by reason of said expulsion and by reason of the publication of the same in the journal of the order. In this connection, we will say that the value of the insurance policy and traveling card alleged to have been forfeited by the expulsion would be proper elements of actual damages to be assessed in his favor. If the defendants or either of them were actuated by malice in making the charges against Thompson, or in procuring the same to be made and in prosecuting the same before the order thereby procuring his expulsion, then the plaintiff may in the discretion of the jury recover exemplary damages against either or all of the said defendants in such sum as the jury may believe should be assessed against the said defendants or either of them. It is not necessary, as in case of actual damages recovered, that all of the defendants should be subjected to the same verdict because some of the defendants may have acted without malice, but in combination with others, and as to such defendants there would be no right to recover exemplary damages.

It is contended that the plaintiff could not maintain this action because he did not appeal from the decision of P. M. Arthur, Grand Chief Engineer, to the Grand International Division, but this is not a proceeding to restore him to his membership. It is a suit for damages occasioned by his expulsion, and one in which his property rights, as well as personal rights, are involved. We are of opinion that it was not necessary for him to have prosecuted his appeal further than he did before instituting his suit for damages. Benson v. Screwmen's Ben. Ass'n, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 66, 21 S. W. 562; Bauer v. Sampson Lodge K. P., 102 Ind. 262, 1 N. E. 571. On application for mandamus to restore plaintiff to membership, the court would not take jurisdiction until the applicant had exhausted his remedies under the laws of the Brotherhood. The same reason does not apply in a suit for damages. The right to apply to the courts for redress of such injuries as in this case exists in favor of all citizens, and could not be abridged by any association except by the consent of the member. The defendants have no ground upon which to stand in demanding that the remedy of appeal should be exhausted before they are called upon to repair the injury they have inflicted upon Thompson. The continuance of his membership in the Brotherhood does not concern the defendants.

It is assigned as error that the court permitted Thompson in testifying to state that at the time of this transaction he had a home of his own, and a wife and two children. There was evidence which raised the issue of exemplary as well as actual damages, and it was permissible to prove those facts so as to determine what effect upon his mind and upon his reputation such a proceeding might have. The testimony was admissible from this standpoint. 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 1096; Cahill v. Murphy, 94 Cal. 29, 30 Pac. 195, 28 Am. St. Rep. 88; Rhodes v. Naglee, 66 Cal. 681, 6 Pac. 863; Dixon v. Allen, 69 Cal. 527, 11 Pac. 179; Klump v. Dunn, 66 Pa. 141, 5 Am. Rep. 355. In the case last cited the court said: "The position in life and the family of the plaintiff are always important circumstances as bearing upon the question of damages, and have always been held to be admissible in evidence for that purpose." The fact that Thompson testified as an expert when he was not or that he received pay for his testimony to which he was not entitled is irrelevant to any issue presented in this case. The charges upon which he was tried do not allege against him either the taking of improper fees or that he falsely represented himself as an expert. Therefore such evidence would not be admissible to support the finding and conclusion of the Division No. 201 upon either one of the charges prosecuted before it.

It is therefore ordered that the judgments of the district court and Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and the cause remanded.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 538*) — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS.

A confession alone, though defendant was not under duress, would not sustain a conviction.

Appeal from Henderson County Court; J. R. Blades, Judge.

Joe Sowers, Jr., appeals from a conviction. Reversed and remanded.

Miller & Royall, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Appellant was convicted of theft, and his punishment assessed at a fine of $25 and three months' imprisonment in the county jail.

The evidence in this case is not sufficient. It shows that the state relied for a conviction upon the confession of appellant, who was under duress at the time the confession was made. The county attorney admitted the testimony of certain absent witnesses to be true in order to avoid a continuance, and said witnesses' testimony shows that the defendant was under duress. Therefore we hold the testimony is insufficient. A confession alone would not be sufficient to sustain a conviction, if appellant was not under duress.

The evidence being wholly insufficient, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

Appeal from District Court, Lamar County; Ben. H. Denton, Judge.

A. A. Pierce was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of rape upon a child 7 or 8 years of age, and given a life sentence in the penitentiary.

Appellant was a man about 74 years of age, and lived in the house of the family of which the little girl was a member. The little girl was placed upon the stand and testified in substance that appellant had intercourse with her. Her mother testified that, after she ascertained the fact that the occurrence had taken place, she examined the child, and had a physician also examine her. The mother testified that the private parts of the little girl were swollen and sore, and, to use her expression, "she walked spraddle-legged" for four or five days. The doctor testified that the little girl was abnormally developed for a child of her age, so much so that he could have placed his two fingers in her private parts with but little pain to the child, and that her private parts had been entered by something, and that they were considerably distended. The brother of the little girl testified that he saw the appellant and his little sister lying on the bed; that she was lying on her side and appellant lying on his side, with the little girl's clothes up and with his private parts out; and that he was pushing against her and making movements as if in the act of copulation. Appellant made two statements while under arrest, one to the magistrate and the other before the grand jury. Both were reduced to writing and signed by him. He denied, in these statements, that he had had intercourse with her, but admitted that he had her on his lap at the time in question, with his hand under her dress and on her private parts. Appellant also stated that this was the extent of his criminal conduct. We are of opinion that this testimony is sufficient under our authorities.

Exceptions were taken by appellant to the introduction of his conversation or statements to the justice of the peace, as well as before the grand jury. Several objections were made, none of which, we think, were well taken. With reference to the statements to the justice of the peace, it was shown that they were made after being duly warned, reduced to writing, and signed by appellant. This was in compliance with the act of the Thirtieth Legislature (Laws 1907, p. 219, c. 118). With reference to this particular statement, it was shown that the written statement itself had been lost, and search had been made for it, but it could not be found. Evidence of its contents were adduced before the jury. Objection was also urged to this. We are of opinion that the proper predicate was laid for proving the contents of the instrument. It is shown clearly that the instrument had been lost and could not be found, and that diligent search had been made for it. With reference to his evidence before the grand jury it is shown that it was at his request, and that he went voluntarily before that body to make a statement, and did make it, and that it was reduced to writing and signed by him. We think this was admissible under our decisions. The question has been discussed frequently, and this character of evidence given before a grand jury has been held admissible. See Grimsinger's Case, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 1, 60 S. W. 583; Wisdom's Case, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 579, 61 S. W. 926. These cases collate the authorities and discuss the question rather fully.

As the record is presented, we are of opinion that there is no such error shown as would require a reversal of the judgment; and it is therefore affirmed.

ROBERTS & CORLEY v. FERINGER.
(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 14, 1906.)

BILLS AND NOTES (§ 92*)—CONSIDERATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Where plaintiffs, acting as agents for the owner of certain land, leased it by a lease obligating defendant to pay plaintiffs $40 a month for three years, and defendant executed a note to plaintiffs for rent to accrue in addition to other indebtedness to plaintiffs, the note was without consideration to the extent of such rent, notwithstanding plaintiffs' authority to collect the rents; defendant being under no obligation therefor, except to the owner of the premises.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 167; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County; W. H. Pope, Judge.

Action by Roberts & Corley against G. Feringer. Judgments for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Glasscock & White, for appellants. Fleming & Fleming, for appellee.

KEY, J. Appellants brought this suit against appellee for an alleged balance due upon a promissory note and to foreclose a mortgage upon certain personal property. The face of the note was $2,127.50, and it bore interest at 10 per cent. per annum. After the defendant had pleaded certain payments, the plaintiffs, in a supplemental petition, admitted payments reducing the amount due to $1,613.80 and 10 per cent. thereon as attorney's fees, which was stipulated in the note. After filing a general demurrer, the defendant in his answer alleged:

"And if required to answer further herein, and not otherwise, defendant says that he executed the note sued on in making a certain agreement or contract with the plaintiffs, of which the execution and delivery of the said note was a part. That the plaintiffs had charge of the premises now occupied by the defendant, and agreed that they would have executed and delivered to the defendant a lease therefor for a term of three years, and that they would make certain repairs on the residence and barn situated on said land, to wit, that they would cell and repair the residence, and paint the same, and would repair the barn, and would also place all pasture fences in first-class condition. That the defendant on his part promised and agreed, in consideration of the plaintiff executing and delivering, or procuring the execution and delivery of, a lease of said premises, and making the aforesaid repairs, to pay $40 per month, payable monthly for a term of three years beginning January 1, 1903. That the said repairs agreed to be made by plaintiffs were of a reasonable value of $10 per month. That the plaintiffs have failed and refused to have executed and delivered a lease to this defendant of said premises, but that they did have defendant execute and deliver to the owner of said premises a certain writing, signed by himself, wherein he agreed to keep the place for three years; but under the terms thereof he was compelled to remove therefrom any time within 30 days' notice from the owners thereof, and plaintiffs failed and refused, and still refuse, to make the repairs agreed on as aforsaid on the said premises, and their failure to make the said repairs damaged the defendant in the sum of $10 per month during the time he occupied said premises, and by reason of their failure to perform their promise as to making said repairs, they became liable and promised to pay the defendant the sum of $330.

"That on or about the date of the execution of the said note sued on, the plaintiffs and defendant contracted and agreed to close by a note all the indebtedness due by defendant to plaintiffs, and all sums that were to become due by virtue of the rental contract herein to the plaintiffs, or to their principal, and which was in any event to be paid to the plaintiffs, and the defendant, acting in accord with said agreement, executed and delivered the said note sued on, and the real consideration was not exceeding $812.21, the full amount and only indebtedness of the defendant to plaintiffs at that time did not exceed $812.21, and defendant believes and charges that this indebtedness did not amount to this much, but is positive that it was no more than said $812.21, and the remainder of the consideration of said note was said advanced rent placed therein. That the defendant at the time knew that he owed said plaintiffs not exceeding $812.21, and plaintiffs, acting in and through C. C. Roberts, stated to the defendant, at the time of the execution of the said note, that the same included the rent to be paid on the said premises. That, since the execution and delivery of the said note, defendant has made payments aggregating the sum of $2,082.25 on said note in cash, the payments being made on or about the following dates, to wit: 4/8/03, $152.25; 5/5/03, $80; 6/12/03, $80; 8/21/03, $80; 9/5/03, $100; 10/10/03, $100; 11/4/03, $100; 12/10/03, $100; 1/14/04, $100; 2/9/04, $100; 3/11/04, $100; 4/9/04, $100; 5/20/04, $100; 3/7/04, $100; 7/13/04, $100; 9/15/04, $100; 10/25/04, $100; 5/5/03, $80; 12/7/04, $80; 12/21/04, $80; 1/23/05, $40; 4/10/05, $50; 5/17/05, $50. And in cattle the defendant has made the following payments to the plaintiffs on said note: On or about June 11, 1905, 24 head of cattle, $360, and on or about March or April, 1905, two cows, $50, which prices were agreed upon and the property was delivered to plaintiffs, and said amount should have been credited upon said note. That on or about the 1st day of April, 1903, defendant repaired fencing for the plaintiffs, for which the plaintiffs promised and agreed to pay him the sum of $73; that on or about the 1st day of April, 1903, the defendant furnished butter and eggs to the plaintiffs, amounting to $5.85, and on or about the 1st day of April, 1903, the defendant did hauling for the plaintiffs for a reasonable value of $25; and that all of the said fencing and hauling was done at the request of the plaintiffs, and were of the reasonable value above set out, and the butter and eggs were sold at the request of plaintiffs and were of the reasonable value of $5.85, and each of which three items the plaintiffs promised and agreed to pay the defendant.

"That the plaintiffs on the 26th day of September, 1905, notified the defendant that his lease or rent contract was canceled, and ordered him to move from said premises, which he has done, and by reason of the said removal, after the request and order of the principal, acting in and through their agent, plaintiffs herein, the plaintiffs became liable and promised to pay the defendant the sum of $120 advanced rent that was theretofore placed in the said note as before stated. That, though demand has been made for damages for the failure to make repairs, as agreed upon, and that defendant be allowed a credit on said rent contract for $120 for the unexpired time thereof, and for services of the defendant in doing the fencing and hauling as set out, and for said butter and eggs, and plaintiffs have failed and refused and still refuse to pay the defendant said damages and sums for said services as set out. All of the above payments and other indebtedness as set out against the plaintiffs in favor of the defendant are proper charges against the plaintiffs and aggregate the sum of $2,966.10, and the same being credited on the note sued on, according to the rules of partial payments, leave a balance of $603.85, which by reason of the matters and things hereinbefore set out the plaintiffs have become liable and promised to pay the defendant.

"That if the said amount for advanced rent was not placed in the said note as a part of the principal thereof, plaintiffs fraudulently, willfully, and knowingly misrepresented the facts as to what was covered by said note, in this: That the said plaintiffs knew that the defendant owed them not exceeding $812.21, and knew that the defendant would not execute a note for the amount of the note sued on to close up the small amount due by defendant to plaintiffs at that time, and they, the plaintiffs, for the purpose of deceiving him, the defendant, told him that all of the rent to become due on said premises was placed in said note. Defendant, being an illiterate man, relied on their representations, and thereby was induced to execute and deliver the same to them. If said rent was not placed in said note at its execution, plaintiffs falsely represented then and there that all he owed, together with said rent, amounted to the face of the said note; and defendant, relying upon said representations, was damaged in the sum of $1,500, together with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from the date of the execution of the said note, and by reason of the said fraud became liable and promised to pay the same to the defendant. That the defendant did not discover that plaintiffs denied that said rent was placed in said note as a part of the consideration thereof until the — day of —, 1905. That if the said advanced rent to be due to plaintiffs or their principal was not a part of the consideration of the said note, then the plaintiffs are due and liable to this defendant a sum equal to the difference between the indebtedness at the time of the execution of the said note, to wit, not exceeding $812.21, and the amount as before alleged which is due by reason of the payments made as herein set out, and by reason of the other obligations aforesaid from plaintiffs to defendant as set out hereinbefore, to wit, the sum of $2,596.10, together with interest on said sum from the time each payment was made, now due and payable from plaintiffs to defendant.

"That defendant charges the said writing, which was signed by defendant, to be in the hands of the plaintiffs, and notifies the plaintiffs to produce the same at the trial of this cause, together with all letters and correspondence between them and any other parties relative to and connected with, and referring to in any way the execution and delivery of and consideration for said note, and also one chattel mortgage, executed and delivered to defendant by plaintiffs on or about the 11th day of January, 1902, filed for record January 18, 1902, and No. 1,904 according to the chattel mortgage register of Jefferson county, Tex., and in default of which secondary evidence will be offered as to contents of said instrument."

The defendant in his prayer asked for judgment against the plaintiffs for a balance alleged to be due him, for cancellation of the chattel mortgage sued on by the plaintiffs, and for general and special relief. The defendant verified his answer, stating under oath that the facts alleged therein as to the consideration of the note sued on were true.

At the trial the plaintiffs by their counsel admitted all the payments set up in the defendant's answer, and the court submitted to the jury the following question only: "Did the note of $2,127.50, herein sued upon, include as a part of its consideration the rentals under said Cartwright & Roberts lease?" By their verdict the jury answered that question in the affirmative, and thereupon the court rendered judgment in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiffs for the sum of $144.19, and canceling the note and mortgage sued upon, and the plaintiffs have prosecuted this appeal.

The defendant submitted testimony which amply supports the finding of the jury, and we therefore find as a conclusion of fact that the note sued on included as a part of the consideration the rentals under the Cartwright & Roberts lease contract with the defendant.

There are several assignments of error in appellants' brief, all of which involve substantially the same question of law; the contention being that under the pleadings the defendant was not entitled to submit oral testimony to show that part of the consideration of the note sued on was the rents which he had agreed to pay under the Cartwright & Roberts lease, nor to have that question submitted to the jury. The record shows that the plaintiffs were the agents of Cartwright & Roberts, and, according to the defendant's testimony, while he signed a written instrument promising to pay the rents to Cartwright & Roberts, the amount of such rents which would accrue under the terms of the contract was added to the amount which the defendant was then indebted to the plaintiffs and placed in the note sued on. The trial court seems to have taken this view of the case: That while the lease contract was made with the plaintiffs, acting as agents for the owners of the premises, the rents to be paid by the defendant were not owing to the plaintiffs, but to said owners, and therefore, to the extent that they were included in the note sued on, that obligation is without consideration and not binding upon the defendant.

We think that view is correct. By the terms of the lease contract the defendant was to pay Cartwright & Roberts $40 monthly for three years, beginning January 1, 1903, and the lease had not expired when this suit was brought. Now, while the plaintiffs may have had authority to collect the rent as agents for the owners, it could not be used as a consideration for an obligation payable to them in their own right, and not as agents. If, merely because A. is indebted to B., he executes a note payable to C., such indebtedness does not constitute a sufficient consideration, and the note is not a binding obligation. Of course, for a sufficient consideration B. could direct A. to make the note payable to C., and it would then be valid. But that is not what was done in this case. The plaintiffs do not claim to have acquired Cartwright & Roberts' interest in the rents. But if it be conceded that they have, and that they had authority to incorporate the rent in the note and make it payable to them individually, the fact remains that the defendant could be required to pay the rent but once, and the conceded payments were in excess of both the accrued rent and his original indebtedness to the plaintiffs. Therefore, in either view of the case, the finding of the jury that the rent was included in the note supports the judgment of the trial court, and that judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

Action by O. R. Riddle against G. W. Bishop. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

Stubblefield & Patterson, for plaintiff in error. D. G. Hunt, for defendant in error.

PRESLER, J. Plaintiff below, O. R. Riddle, brought this suit for damages in the district court of Eastland county against the defendant below, G. W. Bishop, for the alleged violation of an implied contract of partnership in relation to ownership and operation of a certain telephone exchange in the town of Eastland, Tex., alleged to have been the partnership property of said G. W. Bishop and O. R. Riddle, and for damage alleged to have been caused defendant in error's individual toll lines operated in connection with said exchange, and for exemplary damages, alleging that plaintiff in error during the existence of said alleged partnership had violated the same by procuring a franchise for himself and in the town of Eastland erecting a rival telephone exchange in competition with said partnership exchange, thereby destroying the value of the latter, and by diverting the long-distance business from and over defendant in error's individual long-distance toll lines to those of the Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Company, greatly injuring and diminishing the value of said toll lines, and that all of said alleged acts of plaintiff in error, Bishop, were wrongfully and maliciously done for the purpose of injuring and damaging defendant in error. The trial in the district court resulted in a verdict for defendant in error O. R. Riddle upon special issues submitted, in the sum of $150 as damage to the partnership business, $250 as damage to the individual long-distance telephone business of defendant in error, O. R. Riddle, and for the further sum of $250 as exemplary damage, making a total recovery of $650, and judgment was accordingly entered thereon. Plaintiff in error duly made his motion for a new trial, which was overruled, gave notice of appeal, and filed application for writ of error. Citation in error was executed, supersedeas bond filed, and the case is properly in this court for revision upon numerous assignments of error.

We are of the opinion that under the pleadings and the evidence in this case no recovery should have been awarded defendant in error Riddle as damage to his individual toll lines; it not appearing either from the pleading or the evidence that said lines were a part of the partnership property, or that plaintiff in error Bishop had ever by contract, express or implied, undertaken to protect or in any way further and guard the interests of defendant in error in said toll lines, and, before we can hold plaintiff in error responsible for damage to defendant in error's separate and individual property and business on account of plaintiff in error's competition therewith, it should be made to appear that plaintiff in error owed some duty in this respect to defendant in error arising out of a contract with relation thereto, either express or implied. The theory upon which defendant Riddle contends that a partnership between himself and the plaintiff Bishop existed in reference to said business and property is that one Harrison and defendant in error had originally constructed said Eastland telephone exchange, and for a time owned and operated it jointly upon an equal division of profits and loss, and that said toll lines were then connected with said exchange, and that the plaintiff in error, Bishop, by buying out Harrison's interest in the telephone exchange, and by continuing the business thereof in the way that Harrison had theretofore operated it, became a partner of defendant in error in the further operation of said business, and was under all the obligations and duties imposed in said partnership upon said Harrison. Defendant, Riddle, testified with reference to Harrison's interest in and connection with the toll lines in question as follows: "The toll lines were not partnership property, and Harrison was in no way interested in my lines, nor was I interested in his, except that our system at Eastland handled messages over our toll lines and charged five cents for each message so handled, which was a part of the earnings of the Eastland system. I supposed Mr. Bishop, when he bought out Mr. Harrison, would continue the business in the same way which Harrison had conducted it." And with reference to Bishop defendant in error testified: "We made no agreement for the charge for my toll lines, but he just charged off five cents for each call, which was customary. He has never at any time been a partner with me in the toll business, nor in any way interested in the toll business with me. We shared equally the charges made by the exchange for handling my long-distance calls. I had the exclusive control of my toll lines, but Bishop saw that they were kept in order. I held Bishop only responsible to me for the collections he made on the calls over the long-distance lines, belonging to me. * * * I did not tell Bishop anything about my contract with Harrison, and do not know that he knew anything about it." Defendant, Riddle, further testified, referring to Bishop: "We never entered into any agreement that each should share equally in the profits of the exchange or in the expense of the same. Nothing was said about it. We just went along as before. I did not tell Harrison when we went in together that I expected to run country lines from my exchanges, neither did I tell Bishop that I expected to do so; in fact I never consulted him about it. I think I began to connect the country lines with Ranger exchange in a short while after Bishop bought out Harrison. I have never said anything to Bishop since he bought out Harrison as to my running country lines into territory where the Eastland exchange might desire to run lines. I have never consulted him in regard to the operation of my country lines. And there never has been an agreement between us that neither of us should go into other phone business. I ran other phone business, and my other exchange entered territory in which the Eastland exchange entered. I also had my long-distance business, in which Bishop was in no wise interested, and Bishop was interested in a toll line to Carbon and Gorman from Eastland in which I had no interest. Neither Bishop nor I ever said anything about each not going into competitive phone business. There was no agreement or promise as to that matter." We therefore conclude that plaintiff in error's first, twelfth, and twenty-sixth assignments of error, all of which relate to the question of plaintiff in error's liability for damage to defendant in error's toll lines, are well taken, and that the same should be here sustained, and that this case should be reversed and remanded.

While not material to the disposition of this appeal, in view of another trial of this case, we here state that we do not consider the question raised by plaintiff in error's sixth assignment, to wit, "The defendant excepts to the plaintiff's petition in so far as he seeks to recover damage for the conduct on the part of the defendant, subsequent to the time when the franchise, which was granted to O. R. Riddle, and under which the plaintiff and the defendant did a telephone business in the town of Eastland expired," of material interest in this case. This court in the case of City of Texarkana v. Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Co., 106 S. W. 915, 20 Tex. Ct. Rep. 735, held in effect that no such franchise was necessary; that telephone companies are included in the statute authorizing corporations created for the purpose of constructing and maintaining magnetic telegraph lines to set poles, wires, and fixtures along, upon, and across any public road, street, or water of the state; and that the statute granting city councils of towns and cities incorporated under the general law the exclusive control and power over the streets, alleys, and grounds of the city, and the power to abate nuisances and remove encroachments or obstructions thereon, does not repeal the previous statute giving the right to telephone companies to use the streets for their poles and wires, nor does it take from such companies such right. The assignment is therefore overruled.

Plaintiff in error's fourteenth assignment complains of the refusal of the court to give the following special charge requested: "Should you find from the evidence that the plaintiff and the defendant were at one time partners in the telephone business, but should you further find that the said defendant gave notice to the plaintiff that said partnership, if any there was, was dissolved in January, 1907, then you are instructed that the said notice would be sufficient to dissolve said partnership, and unless you find that the defendant had begun the construction of a telephone exchange in the town of Eastland, during the existence of the partnership between the plaintiff and the defendant, or had done some act in furtherance of the construction of a telephone exchange for himself, then you are instructed that the defendant would not be liable for any damage which might have resulted to the plaintiff by reason of the defendant constructing a local telephone exchange for himself, and you will find in favor of the defendant upon this issue in the case." We are of the opinion that the above submits a correct proposition of law, the submission of which was called for by a material issue of the case, and, not being covered by the general charge, we hold that the refusal to give said special charge, as requested, was error, and the assignment is sustained.

Plaintiff in error's remaining assignments are not considered well taken, and are therefore overruled.

We conclude, because of the errors hereinbefore discussed, this cause should be reversed and remanded; and it is so ordered.

In an action against a carrier for delay in transporting cattle and for injuries caused by unloading and holding them in a muddy pen, a requested charge to find for defendant if defendant could not have run the train carrying the cattle to their destination in 28 hours was properly refused, where the carrier's line did not extend the entire distance from where the cattle were received to their destination.

4. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF

In an action against a carrier for delay and injury to cattle in transportation, a charge that, in making up the verdict, plaintiff's claim for feed bought should not be allowed, was not upon the weight of evidence, as intimating that the jury should allow plaintiff everything else claimed by him.

Appeal from Waller County Court; J. D. Harvey, Judge.

Action by J. L. House against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas and another. A verdict was directed for the other defendant, and there was a judgment for plaintiff against the named defendant, which appeals. Affirmed.

Lane, Jackson, Kelley & Wolters and Chas. A. Warnken, for appellant.

KEY, J. J. L. House brought this suit against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company of Texas and the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company for damages alleged to have been sustained on account of delay and injury to six cars of cattle, shipped from Hockley, Tex., to Kansas City, Mo., and diverted to East St. Louis, Ill. Upon trial in the court below the judge instructed a verdict for the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company, and submitted the case to the jury as between the plaintiff and the other defendant. The verdict and judgment went for the plaintiff, and the losing defendant has appealed.

The first assignment of error assails the verdict and judgment as being against the preponderance of the evidence. Appellant made no complaint against the verdict in the court below, and for that reason must be held to have waived that point in this court. That question is so well settled in this state that it is not deemed necessary to cite the authorities.

The second assignment complains of the refusal of a requested instruction which would have directed the jury to find for the defendant, if they believed from the testimony that defendant could not have run the train carrying the plaintiff's cattle from Muskogee to the National Stockyards in East St. Louis in 28 hours. The charge in question was properly refused for two reasons: First, appellant's road did not extend all the way to the National Stockyards in East St. Louis; and, second, it related alone to the question of delay, and directed a finding for the defendant if the jury found in its favor upon that issue, while the pleadings and evidence presented the issue of injury to the cattle by unloading and holding them in a muddy pen.

Among other things, the court instructed the jury as follows: "You are charged not to allow plaintiff the $6 claimed in his petition for feed bought at Sedalia in making up your verdict." This charge is complained of as being upon the weight of evidence; the contention being that it intimates to the jury that they should find for the plaintiff everything claimed by him except the $6 referred to. The objection urged is hypercritical and without merit. The charge complained of is in appellant's favor, and is not susceptible of the construction urged against it.

The other two assignments criticize the court's charge; the contention being that the evidence did not authorize the submission of certain questions to the jury. Our reading of the statement of facts leads us to a different conclusion, and the assignments referred to are overruled.

No reversible error has been pointed out, and the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

1. RAILROADS (§ 401*)—PERSONS ON TRACK—TRESPASSERS—ACTION—INSTRUCTIONS—DISCOVERED PERIL.

The court charged that defendant railway company's servants, in operating its trains, might presume that the right of way therefor would be respected by persons on its track, but that this would not excuse running over persons on the track; that it was the duty of defendant's servants at all times to keep a lookout, and, if persons were seen on the track and in danger, to check, halt, or stop the train, if it could be done by exercising ordinary care, and by the use of ordinary means to avoid inflicting injury on such persons. Held that such instruction, being followed by a statement that it was the duty of defendant's engineer to use all means under his control, consistent with the safety of the train, to prevent the injury, after discovering the perilous situation of the persons killed, was not objectionable as excusing defendant from employing all means at hand to avoid inflicting injury after discovering such peril.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 401.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 192*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMED FACTS.

The court's failure to assume as true an undisputed fact is not error, where the charge does not authorize a finding against the complaining party if such fact is not found.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 192.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 401*)—PERSONS ON TRACK—ACTION—INSTRUCTIONS—DISCOVERED PERIL.

The court charged that, if defendant's engineer in charge of the train that struck plaintiff's decedents saw and knew that they were on the track, and realized that they were in peril, and "could not, or probably would not, leave the track," and if he did not then use all means in his power, consistent with safety to the train, to prevent the injury, etc., plaintiff was entitled to recover. Held, that the quoted clause was but an explanation of what the court meant by "peril," and was unobjectionable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Dec. Dig. § 401.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 389*)—PERSONS ON TRACK—DISCOVERED PERIL.

A railroad engineer's failure to use all the means at hand, after discovering the peril of persons on the track, to prevent injury is not actionable, unless the use of such means could reasonably have prevented the accident.

5. RAILROADS (§ 398*)—PERSONS ON TRACK—TRESPASSERS—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to sustain a verdict that defendant railroad company was not negligent, proximately resulting in the death of plaintiff's decedents, who were trespassing on the track when killed.

Appeal from District Court, Childress County; S. P. Huff, Judge.

Action by Emma Parham against the Ft. Worth & Denver City Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. C. Barrett, J. A. Templeton, and J. H. Aynesworth, for appellant. Spoons, Thompson & Barwise, J. M. Chambers, and Fires & Diggs, for appellee.

SPEER, J. Emma Parham for herself and for the benefit of her minor children brought this suit against the Ft. Worth & Denver City Railway Company to recover damages for the death of her husband, C. A. Parham, and a minor son, Riley Parham, and for injuries to another minor son, Lawrence Parham, the two being killed, and the third injured, by one of the passenger trains of the defendant running over them in the nighttime. The negligence relied on was that of the operatives of the defendant company's train in not averting the accident after having discovered the peril of the deceased persons. There was a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed.

The portions of the charge most seriously attacked are as follows:

"(2) The defendant company was entitled to its railway track for its trains to run upon, and its servants and agents in charge of running the train had the right to act upon the presumption that the right of way for trains would be respected by persons thereon. This, however, would not excuse the running upon or over persons upon the track. It was the duty of the servants and agents of the defendant, running trains upon its track, at all times to keep a lookout; and, if persons were seen upon the track, and in danger, to check up, halt, or stop the train, if it could be done by the exercise of ordinary care, and by the use of ordinary means, to avoid inflicting injury upon such persons.

"(3) You are instructed that it is the duty of a railway engineer to use all the means within his power, consistent with the safety of the train, to prevent injuring persons upon the track, as soon as he may realize from the facts then within his knowledge that such persons thereon would not probably leave the track. And under the facts in this case it became the duty of the engineer to use all the means under his control, consistent with the safety of the train, to prevent the injury of the deceased, C. A. Parham and Riley Parham, and of Lawrence Parham, or to have lessened the injury to them, so soon as he realized, if he did so, from the facts within his knowledge that said parties would not, or probably could not, leave the track.

"(4) Now, if you shall find and believe from a preponderance of the evidence before you that C. A. Parham and his two sons, Riley Parham and Lawrence Parham, were on the defendant's railway track at the time and place mentioned in the plaintiff's petition, and that the said Parham was holding his said sons on said track, as alleged in the plaintiff's petition, and you shall find that the said Parham and his two sons were run down and over by the engine and train of the defendant, and that C. A. Parham or Riley Parham were killed, or Lawrence Parham injured, and you further find that the engineer of the defendant in charge of said train saw and knew that said parties were on said track, and that he realized from facts within his knowledge that said parties were in peril, and could not, or probably would not, leave the track, and that he did not then use all the means within his power, consistent with the safety of the train, to prevent injuring said parties, and you find that such acts, if any, on the part of the engineer, or his failure to act, if he did so fail, was negligence, which proximately caused the injuries to said parties, or either of them, as aforesaid, then, in case you so find, you should find for the plaintiff, under the rules given you as to the measure of damages. If, however, you shall find that the engineer in charge of said train used all the means within his power, consistent with the safety of his train, to stop or lessen the speed thereof in time to prevent the injuries to the parties, as soon as he realized from the facts within his knowledge the peril of said parties, or that they probably would not, or could not, leave the track, if in fact he did realize the same, or, if you find that he was not negligent, then, you should find for the defendant, and so say by your verdict."

The second paragraph, even though it stood alone, would hardly be subject to the criticism that it excused the defendant company from employing all the means at hand to avoid inflicting the injury, after having discovered the peril of the deceased Parham and his children, but it is perfectly apparent, in connection with the paragraph immediately following, that the jury could not have so understood it. They are there expressly told that it was the duty of the engineer to use all of the means under his control, consistent with the safety of the train, to prevent the injury after having discovered the perilous situation of the parties. It is objected that in the fourth paragraph of the charge the court should have assumed that the deceased C. A. Parham was holding his two little boys, Lawrence and Riley, by their hands in front of the approaching train at the time of the sad accident, since such was the undisputed testimony, instead of submitting such question to the determination of the jury. But if such fact can be said to have been indisputably established, it nevertheless does not follow that the court's failure to assume it to be true in the charge would be error, because the charge nowhere authorizes a finding against appellant, if such fact be not found. The cases of Tex. & Pac. Ry. Co. v. McCoy, 90 Tex. 284, 38 S. W. 36, and Gulf, C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Rowland, 90 Tex. 365, 38 S. W. 756, cited by appellant, are therefore not in point. See H. & T. C. R. R. Co. v. Johnson (Tex. Civ. App.) 103 S. W. 239, and Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co. v. Hugh Johnson (on motion for rehearing in this court) 111 S. W. 758. The fourth paragraph of the charge is the subject of further criticisms, but we find no merit in them. The expression "and [said parties] could not, or probably would not, leave the track" is but an explanation by the court of what is meant by peril, and the further requirement therein that appellee's failure, on the part of its engineer, to use all the means at hand after discovering the peril to prevent the injury should be negligence is proper, since it cannot be said that mere failure to use the means at hand is actionable unless their use could reasonably have prevented the accident. In other words, whether or not a failure on the part of appellee's engineer to use the means at hand to check his train or lessen its speed was negligence depends upon the further question of whether or not by the exercise of such diligence he could probably have prevented the injury.

Neither the appellant's pleadings nor the evidence justified the submission of appellant's special charge No. 1, upon the issue of failure to discover the peril of the killed and injured persons by reason of the excessive and dangerous rate of speed at which appellee's train was moving. At most the evidence shows the train to have been running at the rate of 35 or 40 miles per hour, but there is nothing in the evidence to suggest that this was an excessive or dangerous rate of speed for a passenger train, such as appellee's was. The accident did not occur at a crossing, nor at any other place where persons on the track might reasonably be expected to be found. Nor did the evidence call for the giving of special charges Nos. 6 and 7, requested by appellant, upon the issue of negligence in failing to sooner discover the peril of the father and children.

The last assignment complains of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict. We have carefully examined the testimony, and have reached the conclusion that the verdict of the jury is fully sustained by the record. Lamentable as the accident was, it undoubtedly was not due to any negligence upon the part of appellee. The deceased father, together with his two little boys, had started to Childress, some 8 miles distant, on the night of the accident, walking along appellee's tracks, meeting its north-bound passenger train. The father, who was shown to be temporarily insane—res ipsa loquitur—instead of leaving the track on the approach of the train, as any one reasonably would have been expected to do, held the little boys on the track until they were run over, and he himself and one of the children were killed, and the other seriously injured. It could not reasonably have been anticipated by appellee's engineer that the deceased, knowing full well of the approach of the train, would not leave the track in time to avoid an injury. His act was that of a madman, and not of a sane person. We find nothing in the evidence indicating that appellee's operatives could have done more than was done to avoid the accident. At least, the verdict in these respects is supported by the testimony.

The judgment of the district court is therefore affirmed.

Appeal from District Court, Nacogdoches County; James I. Perkins, Judge.

Action of trespass to try title by L. Newman against Marciano Ariola and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ingraham, Middlebrook & Hodges, for appellants. Geo. H. Matthews and Blount & Garrison, for appellee.

JAMES, C. J. This action is in trespass to try title. The facts are these: The land was patented to Wm. Goins as assignee. His administrator conveyed to Geo. Clevinger in 1860. Clevinger in 1872 conveyed to H. C. Hancock. Hancock's administrator conveyed to N. Buckland in 1880. Following this the plaintiff's chain of title consists of a deed from N. Buckland and wife to Newman Bros.

& Rivit in 1881, deed from Albert A. Rivit and wife to J. C. and L. Newman in 1881, and deed from J. C. Newman and wife to L. Newman, the plaintiff, in 1882. The members of the firm of Newman Bros. & Rivit were shown to have been J. C. Newman, L. Newman, and A. Rivit. The defendants took possession of the land about December 16, 1906, on which date a deed was executed by Ben Lazarine to defendants, and defendants have been in possession ever since. This action was filed in June, 1907.

The deeds from Clevinger down to plaintiff, as introduced, were from the records, they having been recorded over 10 years prior to the entry and deed of defendants, and of three of these, as proper evidence, appellants complain in their brief. The assignments of error question the sufficiency of the acknowledgments to three of the deeds, and also question the applicability of article 2312, Rev. St. 1895, as amended by the Thirtieth Legislature (Acts 1907, p. 308, c. 165), to them, as permitting such evidence, inasmuch as defendants had entered into possession of the land before suit was brought, and their claim so asserted was adverse and inconsistent to the one evidenced by said instruments, in the sense of the act. They also assert that to construe said statute as applying to said three deeds is to give it a retroactive effect, which is unconstitutional; the act having been passed after defendants had taken possession of the land under their deed from Lazarine.

We will consider first the assignments which go to the acknowledgments. Under them there is a single proposition, to which appellants should be confined, and which we copy: "A deed is not properly acknowledged and is improperly admitted to record when executed by a man and wife, unless the man acknowledges, in substance, that he executed the same for the purposes and considerations therein expressed; and, if the wife acknowledged it, the same must show her privity examination and explanation of the instrument to her, and that she, understanding it, voluntarily signed the same, for the purposes and consideration therein expressed, as her act and deed, and that she did not wish to retract it."

The first deed which is dealt with by the brief, through the above proposition, is that from N. Buckland and wife to Newman Bros. & Rivit. The objection, or proposition, so far as it relates to N. Buckland, is that his acknowledgment should have shown that he executed the instrument for the purposes and consideration therein expressed. This objection is not valid. Butler v. Brown, 77 Tex. 342, 14 S. W. 136. So far as it relates to Mrs. Buckland, the proposition is immaterial to the title, for her signature appears not to have been essential to a conveyance of the land. The second of said deeds is that from Albert A. Rivit and wife to J. C. and L. Newman. What is above stated applies equally to this, the proposition being the same; and also the third, which is the deed from J. C. Newman & wife to L. Newman.

If the said acknowledgments should be defective in any other particular, appellants are not entitled to have them considered here, as they are confined to a consideration of the propositions they make. When tested by the proposition, the acknowledgments do not show defective registration.

We are also of opinion, from the fact that said instruments had been actually recorded for a period of 10 years prior to defendants' assertion of title (prior both to the execution of the isolated deed from Lazarine to defendants and to defendants' entry), the acknowledgments, in so far as they appear to have been required for purposes of conveyance and registration, to wit, those of the husband, were cured by said act, if defective, and, further, that no constitutional right of defendants was affected by the enactment of such rule of evidence.

Affirmed.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 153*)—DUTY TO WARN SERVANT.

A master need not warn a servant, though an infant, of ordinary risks and dangers which the servant actually knows and appreciates, or which are so apparent that one of his age and capacity would, under like circumstances, by the exercise of ordinary care, know and appreciate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 316½; Dec. Dig. § 153.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 218*)—DUTY TO WARN SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where an infant servant has been properly instructed and warned, his minority usually ceases to be a material factor in estimating the master's liability, and the defenses of assumption of risk and contributory negligence are then available against him, if under the same circumstances such defenses would be available against adults.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 601; Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 130*)—DUTY TO WARN SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE.

That a business might have been carried on in a less dangerous manner is immaterial, where the servant has been sufficiently instructed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 264; Dec. Dig. § 130.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 278*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to a servant operating a sewing machine in connection with machinery used for pressing cotton seed, caused by coming in contact with unguarded belts and pulleys, evidence held not to show actionable negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 961; Dec. Dig. § 278.*]

Appeal from District Court, Comanche County; N. B. Lindsey, Judge.

Action by H. T. Mitchell and wife against the Comanche Cotton Oil Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

G. E. Smith and J. B. Keith, for appellants. Baker & Thomas and Y. H. Goodson, for appellee.

PRESLER, J. This was a suit by appellants, as the father and mother of Wylie Mitchell, for damages on account of the death of said Wylie, which is alleged by them to have been brought about by reason of the negligence of appellee while their said son was in its employ. It was alleged that plaintiffs' son was 19 years of age, and was killed while in the discharge of his duties to defendant, said duty being alleged to have consisted in operating a sewing machine, which was used in connection with the machinery of defendant, for pressing cotton seed. The acts of negligence which were claimed as the proximate cause of the death were: (a) in appellee failing to provide deceased with a reasonably safe place to work, in that he was required to perform his duties in close proximity to a rapidly revolving line shaft, strung with belts and pulleys, which were unguarded; (b) in appellee failing to warn, and in not giving deceased adequate warning of the dangers of his employment; (c) in appellee's failure to guard said line shaft and pulleys; (d) in appellee's arrangement of the machinery at which deceased was required to work, which was claimed to have been negligently arranged. Appellee answered by general exception, general denial, and defense of assumed risk and contributory negligence. A trial before the jury resulted in the court, on motion of appellee, giving the jury a peremptory instruction to find for the appellee company, and in the court declining to give certain charges requested by appellants. The verdict and judgment was for the company, and the appellants duly excepted to this action, order, and ruling of the court, and judgment, and gave notice of appeal to this court, and here now present their appeal upon the following assignments of error.

Appellants' first assignment of error complains of the court's action in giving the peremptory instruction to the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, and is, in our opinion, decisive of the case. It appears from the evidence that the son of appellants, a young man 19 years of age, had been employed for some $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 months by the appellee during the season preceding his death; that during the time referred to he had worked, for the greater part of the time, in the same place and at the machine where his death occurred, and was necessarily familiar with the danger incident to the place and character of his employment—that is, the danger of coming in contact with the line shaft that was being operated $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 feet in his rear, and the pulleys thereon and the belt running from said line shaft to the sewing machine which he was operating—it appearing that he was a young man of at least average intelligence and capacity to understand and appreciate danger that was open and patent, and that a person of ordinary intelligence and no experience even would take cognizance of.

It further appears that, when he commenced working for appellee, several months preceding his death, appellee's manager, one Coleman, warned him of the danger incident to his employment, and instructed him to be very careful about the machinery, and to be sure and not come in contact with the shaft or pulleys or anything of the kind that he might get hurt in. This witness testified: "I am foreman of the Comanche Cotton Oil Mill Company. I have been foreman since it started in December, 1904. * * * My duties are to look after the men that are employed in the mill, and keep up the mechanical end of the business, and to look after it in general. * * * I remember the plaintiffs' son, Wylie Mitchell. He worked at the mill some. Wylie is dead. He died the 1st of October, this October a year ago. I was not present right at the time of his injury, but was there immediately afterwards. I was in the engine room when they told me that he was hurt. * * * Mr. Mitchell was sitting up a little west of where the sewing machine set, between the machine and shaft, about middle ways, I suppose. His face was towards the west, and he was sitting flat on the ground. * * * He was holding the stub of his left arm in his right hand when I got to him. * * * His clothing were wrapt around the pulley on the shaft that runs the sewing machine. The line shaft was in motion. I think the shaft is in the neighborhood of 40 feet long. Its diameter is $27\frac{1}{16}$ inches. The diameter of the pulley is between 5 and 6 inches. There are other pulleys on the shaft, but just one near this machine. The others are several feet away. There is one east of where the machine was, and several west of it. The shaft and pulleys were not protected in any way by guards. That could not be done practically. It could not be done for the simple reason that we have to have access to those shafts and pulleys for the purpose of throwing off and putting on belts. If there was a shield at all, it would have to be perfectly tight, or it would wind up, and it would not be practical to fix it that way. In all modern machinery the shaft is put up about a man's waist in the basement. They are not put up about the ceiling in modern mills. The main line shaft is overhead, and this shaft is just a counter shaft that drives the liners. It is not the main shaft at all. We had the machine arranged the best we could.

* * * A man has to come in contact with the pulley in throwing the belt, I don't care how large the room is, nor how far off the machine is from the shaft. In throwing the belt we always used a stick or screw-driver. We never put our hands on the belt. I think I employed this young man, if I remember correctly. I gave him instructions the year before, but do not remember that I did last year. He worked for the mill about a half season, $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 months in the season of 1905. We run that season about $5\frac{1}{2}$ or 6 months. Yes; I instructed him the first year. I instructed him to be very careful about the machinery, and to be sure and not come in contact with any of the shafts or pulleys, or anything of the kind that he might get hurt in. * * *

The belt running from the shaft to the machine was a cross-belt. When the machine was not in operation, we could leave the belt on or throw it off. We sometimes took it off, and hung it up. I don't remember that I instructed Wylie about the machine at that time. I think I have instructed him to take it off and hang it up when the machine was not running. It was our custom to leave it on, but it didn't make any particular difference. That was the first day we operated the machine that year; the first day the mill was run that season. I did not furnish the young man with a stick that day, but we kept the screw-driver there in the drawer all the time. I think the screw-driver is about 14 inches long. The handle is about 4 inches long.

* * * I think it was there in the drawer when the young man got hurt. Yes; it was there to keep the screws in shape, but numbers of times the young man has seen me throw the belt with the screw-driver. When I was teaching him all about it I would use the screw-driver in throwing the belt all the time. The screw-driver is round up to pretty close to the end, and then it is flat so it will go in the heads of the screws. The stick that we used was from 10 to 14 inches long. It was just a small belt and most anything would throw it. * * *

Wylie Mitchell began working for the oil mill in 1905. He worked right close to three months at this particular work. The machine is constructed just like an ordinary sewing machine, only it is on a larger scale. It is a Singer machine. * * * The machine is perfectly naked and visible to the eye. Nothing to obstruct it from the view. It is located on a table. * * * The shaft runs through the arm, and the pulley is on the end of the shaft. * * * The belt connects with the line shaft. The shaft extends clear across the room. It is about 4½ feet from the floor. * * * This accident occurred about 12 o'clock in the daytime. It was a bright sunshiny day, the day this thing happened. There are four windows in that room. One right in front of the machine. The basement is not over 2 feet in the ground. The windows in the basement are solid, and are over 3 feet wide. There are four windows and one door. I have tested it, and I can read fine print there in the basement on a day like this; can read it at the place the machine was being operated. * * * There is a globe to an electric light right above the machine. The mill generates the electricity that they use. It can be turned on at all times when the mill is running. My opinion, based on my experience with mills, is that we have one of the safest plants that can be built. We did not regard the machine and the manner in which it was run with the shaft and belt as being any danger whatever. We did not regard the operation of it as a dangerous work at all. It is the simplest piece of machinery about the mill, and we regard it as being one of the safest places to work about the oil mill. * * * Of course there is danger in getting in a shaft wherever it may be, and a man with loose clothing on may get caught on a pulley or set screw on a shaft. Of course it would be dangerous if a man should get into one of them." No eyewitness testified to the accident that resulted in the death of the deceased. Neither did the deceased make any statement as to the manner in which the injury occurred. The evidence of plaintiffs' other two witnesses, D. J. Barker and J. M. Slayton, did not differ, in any material respect, and upon any material issue, from that of the witness Coleman. These three witnesses are all who testified in the case with reference to the location of the machinery, the manner of operating it, and the occurrence of the injury. While not material to the conclusion reached by us, it may be doubted, under many authorities, whether it was necessary and incumbent upon the master in this case to give notice or warning of danger at all, the danger to which deceased was exposed was so open and manifest to a person of his intelligence, and to a person of ordinary observation, and could only arise by his carelessly and unnecessarily coming in contact with the machinery, line shaft, and pulleys, the operation of which was open to the observation of any one; but, if it be conceded that such warning was necessary, we are of the opinion that he was sufficiently warned and instructed by appellee's manager a few months before, upon first being employed by him, and it does not appear that it was incumbent upon the manager to repeat the warning originally given, as the continued employment and experience in the position and about the machinery made the danger of coming in contact with the machinery better known to him, and obviated the necessity of further and repeated warnings. The authorities, both in this and other states, are uniformly to the effect that no duty rests upon the master to notify even a minor of the ordinary risks and dangers of his occupation which the latter actually knows and appreciates, or which are so open and apparent that one of his age and capacity would, under like circumstances, by the exercise of ordinary care, know and appreciate, as stated in the case of Truntle v. North Star Woolen Mills Co., 57 Minn. 52, 58 N. W. 832. In Cirlick v. Merchants' Woolen Co., 146 Mass. 182, 15 N. E. 579, 4 Am. St. Rep. 307, recovery was denied for an injury received by a boy of 12, whose person came into contact with exposed gearing. The position taken was that, in the absence of anything to show the contrary, the boy must be assumed to have the intelligence and understanding usual with boys of that age, and that this assumption involved the further one that he was well aware of the danger which caused the injury, and that no instruction could have been given him which would have afforded larger measure of knowledge than that with which he was chargeable. In Buckley v. Gutta Percha & Rubber Mfg. Co., 113 N. Y. 540, 21 N. E. 717, it was held that a child of 12, who, after helping operate a machine for only three days, slipped while attempting to put a cylinder in place, and in throwing out his hand to save himself brought it into contact with a cogwheel, could not recover on the ground that he had received no instruction as to the danger. In White v. Wittemann Lithographic Co., 131 N. Y. 631, 30 N. E. 236, it was assumed that a boy of 13 understood the danger of getting his hand caught in cogs, and, as stated by Labatt in his work on Master and Servant, the duty of instructing minors being predicated upon the fact that without such instruction they would be exposed to avoidable dangers of which they are presumably ignorant, it follows that, after they have been properly instructed, their minority will usually cease to be a material factor in estimating the extent of the employer's liability. In other words, the defenses of assumption of risk and contributory negligence will then be available against them, if under the same circumstances these defenses would have been available against adults. That the business might have been carried on in a less dangerous manner is a circumstance quite immaterial, where the servant has been sufficiently instructed. See Labatt on Master and Servant, vol. 1, art. 251.

We are therefore of the opinion that the court did not err in giving the jury peremptory instruction in this case to return a verdict for the defendant, and that this case should be, and the same is hereby, in all things affirmed.

ABERNATHY v. FLORENCE†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. July 4, 1908. Rehearing Denied Oct. 17, 1908.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 93*)—TIME AS ESSENCE OF CONTRACT.

Specific performance of a contract to employ counsel and defray the expenses of litigation between the other party to the contract and a third person over school land, in consideration of a conveyance of a certain part of the land, if successful, and no appeal was taken, and a certain other part if an appeal was taken, cannot be had, where such party did not pay the expenses of such litigation as they accrued, although he did offer to reimburse the other party after the litigation had terminated, as time was of the essence of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 245-248; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

Appeal from District Court, Lubbock County; L. S. Kinder, Judge.

Specific performance by M. G. Abernathy against W. P. Florence. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. C. Ferguson, H. H. Cooper, and Stephens & Miller, for appellant. Geo. R. Bean, Randolph & Penry, and Wm. J. Berne, for appellee.

SPEER, J. This suit was instituted by M. G. Abernathy against W. P. Florence for specific performance of a written contract to convey 640 acres of land, and resulted in a judgment in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff has appealed.

The findings of fact filed by the trial court find sufficient support in the testimony, and are adopted by us. They are as follows:

"(1) I find that prior to March 12, 1904, the defendant, W. P. Florence, was the owner of two certain school sections of land in Lubbock county, Tex., which had theretofore been awarded to him by the land commissioner, under his settlement as an actual settler, and that one Hiram Smith, having an opposing claim to said lands, succeeded in having the said Florence's awards thereto canceled, and the same awarded to him, Smith.

"(2) I further find that on March 12, 1904, the plaintiff, M. G. Abernathy, and defendant, W. P. Florence, entered into a contract, by the terms of which the plaintiff was to assist the defendant in securing the title of defendant to said lands, which said contract is in words as follows:

"State of Texas, County of Lubbock.

"This agreement made and entered into on the 12th day of March, 1904, by and between W. P. Florence and M. G. Abernathy witnesseth: That whereas Hiram Smith has succeeded in having canceled by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the awards of the said W. P. Florence to surveys Nos. 113 and 114 school files Nos. 2929 and 2930, in block 20, Lubbock county, Texas, and has entered his file thereon, and is endeavoring to dispossess the said W. P. Florence from the title and possession of the above-described land; and whereas, the said W. P. Florence is desirous of contesting the claims of the said Hiram Smith, and will in that event be compelled to employ counsel, and incur the expense of the court and other expenses incident to the suit for the title and possession of the above-described land. Therefore in consideration of the said Abernathy's undertaking and binding himself to employ counsel and pay all expenses necessary for the prosecution and defense of all suits filed by the said Smith, and binding himself to appeal and follow appeals to the Supreme Court of the state of Texas, the said W. P. Florence agrees and binds himself to make, execute and deliver to the said M. G. Abernathy good and sufficient deed to the east one-half of survey 114, block 20, school file No. 2930, surveyed for W. P. Florence, in case the said Abernathy, by his counsel and efforts shall win the suit without appeal from the district court of Lubbock county, Texas, or shall compromise and remove the claims of the said Hiram Smith without a suit further than the district court. But in case it becomes necessary to carry the suit to our Court of Civil Appeals or the Supreme Court, then and in that event, the said W. P. Florence agrees and binds himself to make good and sufficient deed to the said M. G. Abernathy for the whole of survey 114, block 20, school file 2930, Lubbock county, Texas, in consideration of the said M. G. Abernathy paying for counsel, and all costs of the suit upon these appeals whenever the title to the said above-described land are free and clear of any cloud by virtue of the claim and rights of the said Hiram Smith.

"Witness our hands, at Lubbock, Texas, this the 12th day of March, 1904.

"[Signed] W. P. Florence.

"M. G. Abernathy.

"Witnesses: Jno. H. Doyle."

"(3) I find from said contract that the plaintiff obligated and bound himself to employ counsel, and pay all expenses necessary for the prosecution and defense of all suits filed by the said Smith, and bound himself to appeal and follow appeals to the Supreme Court of the state of Texas, and pay counsel fees and all costs of suit and the appeals.

"(4) I find also that the defendant bound himself, first, that in the event the said plaintiff by his counsel and efforts should win the said suit without appeal from the district court of Lubbock county, Tex., or should compromise and remove the claims of the said Smith without a suit further than the district court, to deed to the plaintiff, Abernathy, the east one-half of survey No. 114, block 20, said county; and second, should said cause be carried to the Court of Civil Appeals or the Supreme Court, then to deed the said Abernathy the whole of said survey 114, block 20.

"(5) I find that thereafter, on April 5, 1904, the said Hiram Smith filed suit in the district court of Lubbock county, Tex., against the said defendant, W. P. Florence, to try the title to said two sections of land, and that on November 2, 1905, said cause was tried in said court, and resulted in a judgment for the defendant, W. P. Florence, and that said cause was appealed from said court by the said Smith to the Court of Civil Appeals of the Second Supreme Judicial District, and by judgment of that court, rendered on June 30, 1906, said judgment of the lower court was affirmed in the defendant's (Florence's) favor.

"(6) I find from the evidence in the cause that the plaintiff, Abernathy, procured affidavits, and, through his efforts; prior to the filing of the suit by Smith, obtained a re-statement in the land office of Florence's award to said land, and the cancellation of Smith's claim thereto.

"(7) I find that the plaintiff, Abernathy, employed H. C. Randolph, an attorney at law, of Plainview, Tex., to represent the defendant, Florence, in said suit, and that he paid the said Randolph for his services the sum of $125.

"(8) I find that the only other sums the plaintiff paid out during the progress of said trial was the sum of $15, expended by him for affidavits and copies of papers from the land office.

"(9) I find from the evidence that the plaintiff did nothing further in the way of employment of counsel or expending any sums of money, except as found in paragraph 8 and 7 of these findings.

"(10) I further find that the defendant employed J. J. Dillard and Geo. R. Bean, attorneys at law, living in the town of Lubbock, the county site, where said cause was tried, to assist the said Randolph in the trial of said cause, and that the plaintiff authorized the employment of the said Dillard, and knew of the employment and participation in the trial of said cause of the said Bean; and I further find that, on account of these attorneys being residents of the county, and being well acquainted with jurors and witnesses (said cause having been tried before a jury), their services were necessary, and that the plaintiff did not at any time arrange to pay for their services, but the defendant paid them a total of $50 fees, which said sum was reasonable and necessary.

"(11) I further find that the defendant when said cause was appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, employed Wm. J. Berne, a resident lawyer of Ft. Worth, to brief and present said cause to said court, and that the fee of the said Berne was $125, $50 of which was cash, and $21 for printing the brief, and that the defendant paid a part of this fee, and notified plaintiff by letter of Berne's employment, and the necessity of a brief, and the cost thereof, and asked plaintiff to come to his assistance and pay the bills. Plaintiff did not pay any of these bills, nor see defendant in regard thereto, but arranged with J. J. Dillard to pay them, and Dillard promised to do so, which Dillard failed to do, and defendant raised the money, and paid the said Berne his fee, and the further cost of printing the brief; and, in this connection, I further find that said brief and Berne's employment were necessary, the said Berne living at the place where the said Court of Civil Appeals sits, and it being less expensive for him to represent the interest of the defendant in said court than for one of the attorneys to go from either Plainview or Lubbock to Ft. Worth, on account of the great distance and attendant expenses, there; and I further find that plaintiff agreed to the employment of Berne to represent defendant's interest on appeal.

"(12) I further find that the defendant, Florence, paid the said Smith the sum of $100 in settlement of the suit in the Court of Civil Appeals, in order to avoid further litigation.

"(13) I further find that defendant, in the course of the trial, paid out for employment of counsel, obtaining presence of witnesses from other counties on the trial of the cause in the district court of Lubbock county, printing brief in higher court, and other expenses, all of which was necessary, about the sum of $326.

"(14) I further find that the plaintiff did not arrange with H. C. Randolph to defray all the necessary expenses of said cause, in any of the courts, and for the said Randolph to draw on him for the necessary sums of money as would be required therefor, and that he did not arrange with any one, as is shown by the evidence, to defray these expenses, and he wholly failed to pay the same himself, or arrange for the payment thereof, as the same accrued and had to be paid.

"(15) I find that the plaintiff, subsequent to the affirmance of the case of Smith v. Florence in the Court of Civil Appeals, tendered defendant the sum of $171, which was refused by the defendant, and the same was by the plaintiff paid into the registry of this court."

The gist of appellant's whole contention on this appeal is that time was not of the essence of the contract between appellant and appellee, and that therefore appellant's failure to pay the expenses of the Florence-Smith litigation as they accrued ought not to defeat his right to the relief sought, but we are unable to assent to this proposition. It is generally true that, where time is not of the essence of the contract, and the thing to be done by the complainant can be as well done at a later as an earlier day without detriment to the party for whom the thing is to be done, the delay will be disregarded, or at all events will not defeat a specific performance. Maltby v. Austin, 65 Wis. 527, 27 N. W. 162. But this itself is an exception to the more general rule that a specific performance will not be decreed in favor of a plaintiff, who is himself at fault. In the present case the exigencies of the situation of the parties at the time of making the contract were such as to make it quite clear that the principal purpose was to bind appellant to defray the expenses of the Florence-Smith litigation as they accrued. Appellee was without means, and to meet his present necessities entered into the contract with appellant, by which the latter undertook for him to employ counsel, and to defray the expenses of his school land litigation. The undertaking of appellant, which was somewhat of the nature to render personal service, was necessarily to be performed at such seasonable time as to accomplish the purposes of his employment. This would mean that counsel must have been employed, and the expenses of the litigation borne, by appellant, and not by appellee. The thing to be done in this case could not be done at all after the termination of that litigation, and now to permit appellant to have a specific performance of the contract upon his reimbursing appellee for these expenses would be to make an entirely new contract for the parties. Haldeman v. Chambers, 19 Tex. 1; Younger v. Welch, 22 Tex. 418.

These general conclusions dispose of all assignments of error, and result in the affirmation of the judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

CROUCH HARDWARE CO. v. WALKER. (Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. July 4, 1908.)

1. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS COVERED BY INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN.

Where an issue was clearly submitted in the court's charge, a requested charge presenting the same issue was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CHARGE ON WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

A requested instruction, in an action for conversion, that if the property was delivered to defendant by plaintiff, and, after a first purchase note had become due, and all the purchase notes had been declared due, plaintiff refused to pay the notes, and told defendant to do what it pleased with the property, to find for defendant was on the weight of the evidence, since if plaintiff told defendant "to do what it pleased with the property," the jury might reasonably have found that plaintiff meant no more than that defendant should sell the property under the mortgage given for the balance due on the price.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

3. CHATTEL MORTGAGES (§ 176*)—CONVERSION BY MORTGAGEE—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction in an action for conversion of goods, on which a chattel mortgage had been executed to the seller to secure a balance on the price, that, if the seller without the buyer's consent seized and carried away the goods, to return a verdict for the buyer for the market value of the goods, with interest, properly presented the issue of the seller's liability, if it wrongfully converted the goods.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 176.*]

4. TROVER AND CONVERSION (§ 39*)—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Plaintiff, in trover, having testified that there was a demand for a cooking range like the one converted, and that it could have been sold, was asked if she knew what it was worth, and could have been sold for, to which she replied, "$225, the price I paid for it, was what it was worth," over objection by defendant, which was denied, that "it was not the proper rule for ascertaining value." Held, that there was no error in denying the objection, as plaintiff's evidence tended to show that the value given was the cash market value of the range.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trover and Conversion, Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

Error from District Court, Tarrant County; Mike E. Smith, Judge.

Action by C. A. Walker against the Crouch Hardware Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Smith & Lattimore, for plaintiff in error. Templeton & Derden, for defendant in error.

SPEER, J. Miss C. A. Walker sued Crouch Hardware Company, in the district court of Tarrant county, to recover $794 as the value of certain articles of kitchen furniture alleged to have been wrongfully converted by defendant, and the further sum of $500 as exemplary damages. The defendant pleaded that it had sold to the plaintiff the articles of kitchen furniture mentioned in her petition, at the agreed price of $694 (admitting that there had been an error of $100 in the amount for which her notes had been taken), and at the time she had paid the sum of $300 cash, executing her promissory notes secured by chattel mortgage upon the property for the balance due; that almost immediately after the purchase she had closed her café, for which the articles had been bought, and had voluntarily returned the property to defendant for safe-keeping until such time as she could procure a suitable place to open up her business again, and that in the meantime one of the notes became due, and upon her failure to pay the same, the remaining notes were also declared to be due and payable, whereupon the plaintiff turned over the property in controversy to defendant, in satisfaction of the remaining amount so due it. There was a trial before a jury, resulting in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $222.50, from which the defendant has appealed.

The court instructed the jury as follows:

"(1) If you believe from the evidence that the defendant, without plaintiff's consent, seized and carried away the property mentioned and described in plaintiff's petition, then you will return a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the reasonable market value of said property at the time of such seizure, if any, together with interest thereon from the date the property was taken from plaintiff's possession, at 6 per cent, per annum.

"(2) If you find that defendant did take the property, but you believe that plaintiff agreed with defendant that the same should be taken in full payment and satisfaction of the balance of the unpaid purchase price thereof, then you will find in favor of the defendant, and so say by your verdict.

"(3) If you find for plaintiff under section 1 of this charge, or if you find that she consented to the taking of the property, then you will find in favor of defendant, over against plaintiff, for the amount of unpaid notes in evidence, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from date, and 10 per cent. attorney's fees on the amount of principal and interest remaining unpaid, and a foreclosure of the mortgage thereon, but you will credit the notes with $100 as of date of notes."

It is first insisted that the court erred in refusing the following special charge: "You are instructed that, if you believe from the evidence before you that the property in question was delivered to defendant by plaintiff, and that after the first note was due, and all of the notes declared due, plaintiff refused to pay said notes, and told defendant to do what it pleased with the property, then you will find for the defendant." The issue of defendant in error's delivering to plaintiff in error the property in satisfaction of the unpaid notes was very clearly submitted to the jury in paragraph 2 of the charge, and there was therefore no necessity for again presenting it in the requested charge. Besides the requested charge was on the weight of the evidence, since if defendant in error told plaintiff in error "to do what it pleased with the property," the jury might reasonably have found, in view of the stipulations in the mortgage, that she meant no more than that plaintiff in error should exercise its legal rights in the premises; i. e., to sell the property in accordance with and in pursuance of the terms of the chattel mortgage.

The first paragraph of the charge is not subject to criticism, but properly presents the issue of plaintiff in error's liability if it wrongfully converted defendant in error's property. If it seized and carried away her property without her consent, it clearly would be liable, and the court did not err in so stating to the jury. The verdict, when read in the light of the charge, makes it quite clear that the jury adopted the defendant in error's version of the affair, and disregarded the testimony of plaintiff in error to the effect that she consented to the taking in the first place. Defendant in error, while a witness in her own behalf, having testified that there was a demand for a range like the one involved in this suit, and it could have been sold before it was ever moved from her place, was asked if she knew what it was worth and could have been sold for, to which she replied, "$225, the price I paid for it, was what it was worth." To this plaintiff in error objected, "because it was not the proper rule for ascertaining value," and the court overruled the objection and admitted the testimony. There was no error in this. The objection made is so indefinite as hardly to raise any question at all; but, if it be interpreted as invoking the rule that the cash market value of the property at the time of its conversion would be the proper measure of damages, the court's ruling was yet not erroneous, since the testimony of the witness tended to show that the value given was the cash market value of the range.

The positive testimony of plaintiff in error's witnesses and many of the circumstances surrounding the transaction tend strongly to support plaintiff in error's contention in this case, but we are unable to say that the verdict and judgment are not supported by the testimony of defendant in error, which so flatly contradicts such contention.

We find no error in the judgment, and it is affirmed.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. June 20, 1908. Rehearing Denied Oct. 17, 1908.)

1. CONTINUANCE (§ 9*) — DILIGENCE — NECESSITY.

Where, defendant having used no diligence to secure an absent witness, a first application for a continuance because of her absence was properly overruled, the fact that after the refusal to continue counsel agreed, with the court's consent, that the trial should proceed, and that, if the witness had not arrived when the testimony was all in, the trial might be postponed until her arrival, would not prevent the trial court from forcing defendant to close his case without the testimony.

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 66*)—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action for damages for failure to deliver a telegram announcing the serious illness of plaintiff's daughter, whereby she was prevented from being with her daughter at the latter's death, there is a presumption of mental anguish, and it need not be affirmatively proved.

In an action for damages for a failure to deliver a telegram announcing the serious illness of plaintiff's daughter, whereby she was prevented from being with her daughter at the latter's death, the mere fact that plaintiff did not attend her daughter's funeral, which she explained as because of her sudden illness, was not conclusive that plaintiff did not suffer mental anguish, but raised, at most, a question for the jury.

Appeal from District Court, Dallam County; J. N. Browning, Judge.

Action by M. E. Blair against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. H. Fearsons and Veale & Underwood, for appellant. Reese Tatum, for appellee.

SPEER, J. Mrs. M. E. Blair sued the Western Union Telegraph Company, and recovered a judgment for $400 for damages for its negligent failure to deliver to her a telegraphic message informing her of the serious illness of her daughter, by reason of which she was deprived of the comfort of being at her bedside prior to her death. The defendant has appealed, and asks for a revision of the judgment on proper assignments of error.

It is first urged that the trial court erred in refusing to postpone the further hearing of the cause so that the appellant might be able to produce the witness Fournier, its former employé and operator at Dalhart, the home of appellee, the sendee in the message, who was at the time of the trial out of the employ of the company and out of the state. The bill of exception shows that by said witness it was expected to be shown that the message was received at Dalhart at 11:55 a. m., and that it was immediately taken from the wire of defendant company and was given to the messenger boy, who at once left with it, going in the direction of appellee's home. The bill further shows that, when appellant was called to announce for trial, it announced that it would not be ready because of the absence of this witness, but that she would in all probability reach Dalhart, where the case was being tried, within a few hours, and asked the court to postpone the trial, which the court refused to do. But by agreement of counsel, and with the consent of the court, it was understood that the trial was to proceed, and that, when the testimony available was all in, if said witness had not arrived in Dalhart, the trial might then be postponed until her arrival, but that, when the other testimony had been introduced and the witness had not yet arrived, the court declined to wait longer, and forced appellant to close its case without the testimony of this witness. It is shown that the witness would have testified as set out above, and the court in explanation of his ruling appears to put it on the ground that the testimony would only be cumulative of that of the witness Thorne, appellant's messenger boy. However that may be, appellant cannot insist on a reversal for this ruling because clearly, having used no diligence whatever to obtain the testimony of this witness, it was in no position to ask for a continuance or postponement to procure her testimony, and was not caused to forego any right whatever by reason of the agreement with counsel above set forth. If the court had overruled the application for postponement in the first place (as he in effect did), appellant could not have complained, and we cannot see that the agreement with counsel changes the situation in the least respect.

Appellant urges that the court's charge assumes that appellee's daughter was dying at the time the message was sent, but it is immaterial whether she was then actually dying or not, and, if the court erroneously assumed that she was, it could not possibly have affected appellant's rights, since undisputably she did die within a few hours after the transmission of the message, and the real issue as to appellant's liability was submitted to the jury and by them found adversely to appellant. Nor do we think the use of the word "dying" in that connection under the circumstances was at all calculated to unduly affect the jurors to appellant's prejudice.

The seventh and last assignment, complaining that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, is also overruled. It is not necessary that there should have been affirmative testimony that appellee suffered mental anguish, since there is a presumption from the relation shown that she did suffer such anguish. Of course, this presumption is capable of being rebutted by testimony, but we find nothing in the record that would so overcome the presumption as to require us to set aside the verdict. Besides, appellee's testimony tends to show that she did suffer mental anguish. The fact that she did not attend the funeral on the next day is explained by her testimony that she was suddenly taken ill, and could not travel on the early train which she would have had to take the next morning to attend the funeral. At most, the circumstances only made a controversy which the jury has settled.

Finding no error, we affirm the judgment.

St. 1895, art. 5278, subd. 1, authorizing the court to estimate the value, at the time of the trial, of Appeal from District Court, Lubbock County; L. S. Kinder, Judge.

Action by J. N. Haney against J. B. and William Gartin. From a judgment granting relief, both parties appeal. Affirmed.

H. C. Ferguson and H. C. Randolph, for plaintiff. McGee & Puckett and Geo. L. Beatty, for defendants.

CONNER, C. J. J. N. Haney instituted this suit in the district court against appellees, on the 11th day of July, 1906, to recover the title and possession of one tract of 80 acres of land, and another of 160 acres, situated in Lubbock county, and fully described in his petition. Appellees pleaded not guilty, the plea of five years' limitation (which appears to have been abandoned), and one suggesting improvements in good faith. Appellant filed a supplemental petition, with general and special exceptions addressed to the plea suggesting improvements in good faith, which were overruled by the court, and the cause proceeded to trial, on the pleadings above stated the 5th day of November, 1907, before the court without a jury, and resulted in a judgment in favor of appellant for both tracts of land described in his petition, and in favor of appellees for the value of improvements to the extent of $1.673, from which all parties have appealed and assign errors.

Appellees admit that appellant has title to the 80-acre tract of land sued for, but raise by their assignments, which we will first dispose of, various questions affecting appellant's title to the 160 acres adjudged to him. This 160 acres of land is part of a larger survey, patented to Seth Brown January 30, 1879, from whom, through conveyances in regular order, appellant has title. On the trial appellees objected to the admission in evidence of the deed from Seth Brown and wife, Maranda Brown, to David Armstrong, on the ground that it was defectively acknowledged, and hence improperly recorded and inadmissible without proof of its execution, which was not attempted. The acknowledgment is clearly defective in that it does not appear therefrom that Seth Brown or his wife was known, to the officer taking the acknowledgment, to be the persons who executed the deed. It appears, however, that the deed was in fact recorded in the proper county January 10, 1884, and that Rev. St. 1895, art. 2312, was amended by an act of the Legislature approved April 23, 1907 (see Gen. Laws 1907, p. 306, c. 165), which specially provides that: " * * * Every instrument which has been or hereafter may be actually recorded for a period of ten years in the book used by said clerk for the recording of such instruments, whether proved or acknowledged in such manner or not, shall be admitted as evidence in any suit in this state without the necessity of proving its execution; provided no claim adverse or inconsistent to the one evidenced by such instrument shall have been asserted during that ten years; * * * and after such instrument shall have been actually recorded as herein provided for a period of ten years it shall be no objection to the admission of same, or a certified copy thereof, as evidence, that the certificate of the officer, who took such proof or acknowledgment, is not in form or substance such as required by the laws of this state, and said instrument shall be given the same effect as if it were not so defective." The act clearly includes conveyances of land, and is certainly broad enough in terms to embrace the deed under consideration and to answer the objection made to its admission in evidence, but appellees insist that it does not apply, in that, first, an adverse claim inconsistent with the deed is shown to have been asserted within the 10-year record relied upon; and, second, that the act was not intended to apply to pending suits; and, third, that inasmuch as more than four years had elapsed from the taking of the said acknowledgment, the right to inquire into and correct such certificate was barred by limitation, and the Legislature was hence without power to revive or restore a right so lost. These contentions, however, we think more plausible than sound. The suit was not for the correction of the certificate, and the act evidently purports only to govern the practice or procedure in cases to which it applies upon the introduction of evidence, and is therefore remedial in its nature, applying to suits pending at the time it took effect, as well as to those thereafter instituted. Statutes will not be permitted to take away a right vested, or to restore one lost, prior to their enactment; but the statute in question confers no right of property in appellant not theretofore existing. It was the deed, and not the acknowledgment, that gave the right, and the statute merely affords a manner of proving the deed, in the absence of an affidavit attacking it, that under the circumstances was not before given. Nor does the statute deprive the defendants of any right in property vested before its enactment. It merely deprived them of an objection to its admission in evidence that would have been available under former laws. Says Mr. Sutherland, in his work on Statutory Construction (article 164, p. 220): "A statutory right is to be distinguished from the remedy for its enactment. * * * New statutes may be valid which take away defenses based on irregularities and informalities. * * * Nor does the record support the contention of an adverse claim within the quoted proviso of the statute. After the record of the deed the first adverse claim was that of defendants' vendor, Judge Geo. L. Beatty, by virtue of a purchase at a tax sale May 7, 1901, more than 10 years after the record of the deed executed by Seth Brown and wife. "That 10 years," and not the 10 years immediately preceding the suit, brought the case within the statute we have quoted. We are of opinion that the deed mentioned was properly admitted in evidence. This conclusion also applies as well to the objection made to the admission of a deed from Easter Armstrong to Paris Cox because of a defective acknowledgment, the use of the name "Easter," instead of "Ester" being regarded as a mere clerical error.

The will of A. W. Newlin was shown to have been regularly probated in Pennsylvania in October, 1895; was properly certified and recorded in Lubbock county on September 5, 1906. It devised to his wife, Mary E. Newlin, among other things, "the 160 acres in Lubbock county, Texas," referred to in another place as "the farm in Texas." Title to the 160 acres in controversy having been shown to have devolved upon A. W. Newlin, and it not appearing that A. W. Newlin ever owned any other land in Texas, we think the description in the will sufficient to raise an inference that the land in controversy was the same as that described in the will, which was therefore admissible as against the objection of an insufficient description. Nor is the will subject to the objection that it conferred an after-acquired title because recorded in Texas after the institution of the suit. The will conferred the right upon Mary E. Newlin upon the death of the testator. Its probate in Pennsylvania and record in Texas were but legal formalities required to evidence and give full effect to that right. Rev. St. 1895, arts. 5353, 5355.

The admission of the deed from T. J. Kurtz and Mary E. Kurtz to Frank Butterfield, purporting to convey the land in controversy, was also objected to, on the ground that the grantors are not shown to have other connection with the title. The deed recites, however, that Mary E. Kurtz was formerly Mary E. Newlin, and this recital, without other evidence of its truth, and even as against strangers to the title, is competent evidence on the issue of identity which is involved. As a whole, the deed purports to have been executed by Mary E. Newlin, although partially under another name. At least, there is partial identity in name, and this, in the absence of all controverting evidence, is sufficient, it seems, to show that Mary E. Kurtz who signed the deed is the same person as the Mary E. Newlin to whom the land had been devised; it being presumed that the change in surname was brought about by marriage. Chamblee v. Tarbox, 27 Tex. 144, 145, 84 Am. Dec. 614; Dowdy v. McArthur, 94 Ga. 577, 21 S. E. 149.

There is an objection, also, to the conveyance from Jennie S. Steel and R. W. Steel to appellant Haney, on the ground that the grantors are not shown to have connection with the title, and that it is but a quitclaim deed. The deed purports to convey all the title the grantors had, and the evidence, as presented in the transcript, shows that it had descended in regular sequence from the patentee to Jennie S. Steel. It was therefore clearly admissible in evidence.

Having thus adversely disposed of all objections made by appellees to appellant's title to the land, it remains for us to determine the questions, presented by the cross-appeal of appellant, that relate to the issue of improvements in good faith pleaded by appellees. Appellant first assigns error to the action of the court in overruling his general and special demurrers to appellees' plea setting up such improvements. The plea is as follows: "The defendants in the above styled and numbered cause suggests to the court that they, and those under whom they claim, have had adverse possession in good faith of the lands and premises described in plaintiff's petition for more than one year before the commencement of this suit, and defendants say that the lands described in plaintiff's petition were delinquent for the state and county taxes due thereon for the year A. D. 1898, and thereafter, to wit, on the 2d day of March, A. D. 1900, the state of Texas, as plaintiff, brought suit against the unknown owner of said lands, in the district court of Lubbock county, Tex., for the unpaid taxes due thereon, and made additional allegations showing a regular foreclosure and sale thereunder to Geo. L. Beatty, and deed to him May 7, 1901, and continuing as follows: 'That thereafter to wit, on the 31st of December, 1901, said Geo. L. Beatty, by warranty deed duly executed, conveyed the said lands and premises to these defendants for a valuable consideration to him paid, and these defendants believed, and had good reason to believe, that they thereby acquired a good and valid title to said lands.'" To which the only special exception was: "Because it does not appear by said answer that the defendants believed, or had any reason to believe, that at the time they took possession of the land sued for the title was good, or that they ever examined it, or had it examined, or knew what it was." We think the plea good as against the general demurrer, and, in so far as it omits deficiencies pointed out in the special exception, it is not subject to legal objection. The fact that appellees may or may not have examined, or had examined, the title under which they entered was merely matter of evidence on the issue of good faith, which it was unnecessary to plead. It follows that no error was committed by the court, as alleged under the second assignment, in permitting appellee to state the ground of his good faith as pleaded, the only objection to this evidence offered being that it was not alleged in the plea that "he (the witness) had examined the title, or knew what it was, or that he had any reason to believe that the title he was buying was good." The same objection is urged in the third assignment to the rendition of judgment for appellees for the value of improvements.

In the fourth and last assignment, questioning the judgment on the issue of improvements, it is insisted that the court erroneously gave judgment for $1,673, when the proof shows that the land, "without the improvements, was of the market value of $10 per acre, or $1,600, and with the improvements placed thereon by the defendants it was of the market value of $12.50 per acre, or $2,000 for all of said land." No proposition follows this assignment, and we think that, as made, it should be overruled. While the evidence referred to in the assignment of course tends to show that the court's judgment was excessive, it cannot be said to be conclusive on the subject. Appellees' proof, which is not controverted on this point, shows that they placed upon the land in controversy in good faith permanent improvements of a total value of $1,733.05, which must be held to be at least some evidence that the value of the land was actually enhanced to the amount of the judgment, as required by statute. Rev. St. 1895, art. 5278, subd. 1. We think at least we must attribute to the court a finding to this effect, and that therefore the assignment must be overruled.

Having found no reversible error as assigned by either party, we order that the judgment be in all things affirmed.

RAILROADS (§ 400*)—INJURIES TO PERSON CROSSING TRACK—NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action against a railroad for injuries through being struck by a car, plaintiff's evidence showed that the car was standing still when he attempted to cross the track in front of it, and that after he started to cross a heavy train was switched in on the track, striking the car and causing it to run over plaintiff. Held, that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

Appeal from District Court, Smith County; R. W. Simpson, Judge.

Action by Jeff Clark against the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Marsh & McIlwaine, for appellant. McCord & Bullock and Gentry & Castle, for appellee.

HODGES, J. This suit was instituted in the district court of Smith county by the appellee, Jeff Clark, against the appellant, to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him by reason of the alleged negligence of the appellant's servants in the operation of its train in the yards at Tyler. A trial was had before a jury, and the appellee recovered a judgment against the appellant for the sum of $250. From that judgment the case is before us on appeal.

The testimony is very conflicting upon some of the important issues involved. The case comes before us solely upon the ground that the verdict of the jury was not supported by the testimony. It was shown upon the trial that the appellee was injured in the yards of the appellant, at a place where many people were accustomed to cross over and pass along the tracks. The appellee testified that, in attempting to pass over from the west side to the east side of the appellant's track, he was struck by a car and knocked down, and his leg was run over and injured. He further testified that before crossing over he saw the car which struck him; that it was distant about four or five feet, and was standing still; that in passing from the west to the east, and before he reached the east side track the car was set in motion and struck him. There was testimony tending to show that the train from which the injury resulted was being operated by one of the appellant's switch engines; that at the point where the appellee was injured there were five tracks, counting the main track and an elevated track commonly used for icing and called the "ice track." The main line was on the east side of the yard, and the ice track on the opposite side; and between them were the three switch tracks, numbered 1, 2 and 3, respectively, beginning at the main line track. The testimony showed that some time prior to the appellee's injury the switch engine, with about 18 or 20 cars, passed south along the main track until it reached the switch leading onto track No. 3. At that point it backed up on track No. 3 and struck 2 or 3 cars about the point where the appellee was injured. We gather from the testimony that it was one of these cars, which were standing and which were struck by the incoming train pushed by the switch engine, that caused the appellee's injury. One of the witnesses who testified for the appellee stated that he saw the switch engine back the train of cars in at the time, and that it was moving very rapidly; that no bell was being rung, nor whistle blown, nor was there anything to indicate the approach of the car; that this occurred about the time and just before the appellee was injured. The testimony on the part of the appellant is contradictory of the main facts testified by the appellee and his witnesses. It adduced evidence tending to show that the appellee was drunk at the time, and was injured on account of lying under one of the cars struck by those pushed by the switch engine; that he had been asleep, and that his injury was unavoidable.

The question before us is whether or not, under the testimony, we can say that the appellee was guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, in attempting to cross the track at the time he did and under the circumstances surrounding him. After carefully considering all of the facts in the record, we have reached the conclusion that we cannot. According to his testimony, and that of his witnesses, the car that struck him was standing at the time he saw it, and when he attempted to cross, and after having started across track No. 8 it was struck violently by a heavy train of about 18 or 20 cars moving at a rapid rate, and thus caused to run over him before he had time to pass over. If this be true, then the jury was warranted in returning a verdict in favor of the appellee. While this view of the case is contradicted strongly by much testimony offered on the part of the appellant, yet it is not our province to undertake to say that the jury erred in crediting the witnesses of the appellee, and in discrediting those of the appellant, upon those conflicting issues.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

HARRIS v. IGLEHART et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 21, 1908.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 71*)—VOID GRANT—EXTENT OF POSSESSION.

One in actual possession of land under a void grant, which describes the land, may hold and prescribe under the 10-year statute to the extent of the boundaries of the grant, if he asserts possession thereunder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 417; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

2. DEEDS (§ 38*)—REQUISITES—PREMISES CONVEYED—DESCRIPTION.

The calls of a grant are sufficient, if they are certain and definite enough to enable a surveyor to locate and identify the lands attempted to be described.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 65; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 106*)—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—SUSPENSION.

Where the possession of one holding land under a void grant was sufficient to bar plaintiff's right prior to the suspension of the statute of limitations during the Civil War, the character of the party's possession thereafter was immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 106.*]

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 43*)—POSSESSION OF TENANT.

While the possession of land by a tenant inures to the benefit of his landlord, yet, if the tenant acquires title from the landlord, he may assert whatever rights the latter acquired by such possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other case, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 219; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 100*)—POSSESSION BY TENANT—EXTENT.

Where a landlord asserted title to land in controversy under a grant, the possession of the tenant of a part of the land extended the landlord's claim of adverse possession to the boundaries of the grant.

Appeal from District Court, Chambers County; L. B. Hightower, Judge.

Action by Lloyd G. Harris against D. T. Iglehart and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Jackson, J. B. Davis, and Marshall & Marshall, for appellant. Stevens & Pickett, for appellees.

FISHER, C. J. This is a suit of trespass to try title, brought by appellant on the 24th day of January, 1906, in the district court of Chambers county against the appellees. Appellees pleaded not guilty, and the statutes of limitation of three, five, and ten years. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and judgment rendered to the effect that the plaintiff take nothing by his suit against the appellees.

The plaintiff claimed title under a grant from the Mexican government to Moses A. Carroll, dated in 1835, and the evidence shows that he is connected with that title by conveyances which are set out in the record. Appellees claim title by virtue of a grant from the Mexican government to T. J. Chambers, issued in 1834. The evidence shows, also, a deed from T. J. Chambers to William Chambers, of date 1865, conveying 800 acres of land in the Chambers grant. The evidence also shows that the appellees are connected with and asserting title under this deed. If the land in controversy is embraced in the calls of the grant to Chambers and the calls in the deed from him to William Chambers, and the calls are sufficient to enable a surveyor to find and identify the land, and the defendants and those under whom they claim were in possession of the land a sufficient length of time to prescribe under the 10-year statute of limitation of 1841, then we need not pass upon and determine whether the Chambers grant was void, as insisted upon by appellant, on the ground that it was located within the 10 littoral leagues without the consent of the executive of the Mexican government being shown.

The act of 1841 has been construed in several cases, and it was there held that one in actual possession under a void grant which describes the land in controversy could hold and prescribe under the 10-year statute to the extent of the boundaries of the grant, provided he is asserting possession thereunder. Charle v. Saffold, 13 Tex. 94; Wofford v. McKinna, 23 Tex. 36, 76 Am. Dec. 53; Lambert v. Weir, 27 Tex. 362; Craig v. Cartwright, 65 Tex. 417. The calls in the two instruments referred to, in our opinion, are sufficiently certain and definite to enable a surveyor to locate and identify the lands therein attempted to be described, and the evidence with reasonable certainty establishes the fact that the defendants and those under whom they claim were in possession of the land described in the deed from Chambers to William Chambers executed in 1865. Prior to that time the Chambers grant was occupied by and in possession of William Chambers, holding and occupying the same for his brother, T. J. Chambers. The deed from him to William Chambers recites the fact that it is executed in part in consideration of the fact that William Chambers had occupied and been in possession of the land, holding the same for the grantor.

There is evidence in the record which shows that William Chambers was in possession as far back as 1846, and thus continued in possession for a much longer time than was necessary to prescribe under the 10-year statute. He was in possession when the statute was suspended during the period of our Civil War; and as the time of such possession was sufficient under the act of 1841 to bar the plaintiff and those under whom he claims in their right of action by virtue of the 10-year statute prior to the time that the statute was suspended, we need not consider the question of limitation after that time. Of course, the possession of William Chambers during that period as a tenant of T. J. Chambers inured to the benefit of the latter, and, William Chambers having acquired title in 1865 from T. J. Chambers, he could assert whatever right was possessed by the latter. William Chambers during that period being in actual possession of a part of the grant, holding the same for T. J. Chambers, the latter, under the 10-year statute then in force, could claim possession to the extent of the boundaries of the grant under which he was asserting title.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

GOODNEY v. INTERNATIONAL & G. N. R. CO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 14, 1908.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 303*)—CARRIAGE OF PASSENGERS ON FREIGHT TRAIN—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES.

Where a carrier's rule, in continuous force for many years, forbade passengers from riding on freight trains, and could only be suspended by the company's superior officers, a passenger riding on a freight train by contract with the brakeman could not recover for injuries sustained in alighting while the train was in motion.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 959*)—PLEADINGS—TRIAL—AMENDMENT—DISCRETION OF COURT.

While pleadings may be amended at any time before the conclusion of the trial, the allowance of a trial amendment rests largely in the discretion of the judge, which will not be disturbed on appeal, in the absence of abuse.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1029*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—PLEADINGS—REFUSAL OF TRIAL AMENDMENTS.

Where, under any view of the facts, plaintiff was not entitled to recover, the refusal to allow a trial amendment of his pleading was not prejudicial.

Appeal from District Court, Montgomery County; L. B. Hightower, Judge.

Personal injury action by Andrew Goodney against the International & Great Northern Railroad Company. There was judgment on a directed verdict for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Cook for appellant. John M. King and Dean, Humphrey & Powell, for appellee.

RICE, J. This is a suit by appellant to recover damages for personal injuries growing out of an alleged breach of contract which appellant claims to have been made by him with appellee relating to his right of passage on one of its freight trains from Dodge to New Waverly, stations on its road. He predicates his right to recover upon the following facts: While at his work at Oakhurst, on the afternoon of December 13, 1904, he received a message stating that his sister was at the point of death and his baby was very sick, whereupon he immediately quit his work and walked to the station of Dodge, arriving there about 9 o'clock on said evening, where he made inquiry of one Roark, a clerk in appellee's ticket office, relative to the time of the arrival of a passenger train going to New Waverly that night. Said clerk told him that it would pass a little after 1 o'clock, and while making this statement to appellant the south-bound freight train stopped at the depot, whereupon appellant told said clerk that if he were allowed to take passage on said freight train he would save several hours. Roark replied that appellant would have to see the conductor, and they immediately went out together for this purpose; but appellant walked up to a brakeman, and Roark passed on. The brakeman then agreed with appellant to transport him to New Waverly for 50 cents, which having been paid by appellant, he at the instance of the brakeman boarded the train, climbing by means of a ladder inside of a coal car, in which he rode. It was shown that the conductor of the train knew nothing about this contract, and told Roark that the train would not stop at New Waverly that night, which statement was probably heard by the appellant. The train did not stop at New Waverly, but continued on to Willis, where appellant voluntarily jumped from the train while the same was in motion. According to his own statement, it was running at this time from 10 to 15 miles per hour, and he while attempting to alight therefrom, was thrown under the wheels of the car; both legs being so badly crushed as to necessitate amputation. It was shown that appellant had never seen the conductor in charge of this train, nor did he see the brakeman during the time he was riding thereon, nor was he seen by any of the operatives on said train from Dodge to New Waverly; the sides of the coal car in which he was riding reaching up to his neck, and the car being somewhere about the middle of the train.

Appellant alleges that on account of the breach of its contract to stop at New Waverly he was required to choose between two evils, either to remain on the train and suffer great mental anguish on account of being carried beyond the station where his relatives were ill, or to jump therefrom as he did. Appellee answered by general and special exceptions, general denial, contributory negligence, and pleaded that by its rules, which had been duly adopted and promulgated, prohibiting passengers from riding upon freight trains, its brakemen and operatives had no authority to permit passengers to ride upon said trains, and such authority could only be granted by the general officers of the company, and that no such consent had been given in the present case, and that the alleged contract, relied upon for recovery by appellant, between himself and the brakeman, was not within the scope of his authority, and that no brakeman had any control over the movements of its trains. Wherefore it was not liable for any injuries resulting from a breach of said alleged contract. The evidence, in addition to what has been stated, showed the establishment and promulgation of such rule and the continuous enforcement thereof for many years on the part of the officials and operatives of said company. The trial court, after hearing the evidence, instructed the jury to return a verdict for appellee, which was done, from which judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

The chief contention in this case on the part of appellant is that the court erred in instructing a verdict in behalf of appellee. In view of the uncontradicted evidence in this case, which shows that appellant's right to ride upon said train was based upon the contract made by him with the brakeman, who under the evidence had no authority to make such contract or grant said permission to ride, and it further appearing that the rules of the company, which had been duly made and promulgated, forbade passengers from riding upon its freight trains, which rule could not be suspended except by the superior officers of the company, which is not shown to have been done in this case, we are clearly of the opinion that the action of the trial court in directing a verdict in favor of the company was correct. Justice Brown, speaking for the court, in Railway Co. v. Black, 87 Tex. 160, 27 S. W. 118, says: "A railroad company has the right to carry passengers and freight by different trains, and when such provision is made the conductors and brakemen have no implied authority to receive passengers upon freight trains. It is not within the scope of their authority. When one gets upon a freight train, made up exclusively of cars appropriate alone to the carrying of freight and the employes on such train, he must take notice of the fact that the train is not provided for passengers." In the case of Galaviz v. I. & G. N. R. R. Co., 15 Tex. Civ. App. 61, 38 S. W. 234, wherein the plaintiff sued for damages for injuries caused by being unlawfully compelled to disembark from a moving freight train by a brakeman, he having alleged and testified that the brakeman made a contract with him by which he obtained permission to ride on said train from Taylor to San Marcos, and that when the train was nearing San Marcos the brakeman unlawfully compelled him to get off the train while it was in motion, and while attempting to do so his foot was caught between the cars and was injured, there being no evidence tending to show any misconduct or negligence on the part of any one connected with the train except the brakeman, and it having been shown that the defendant promulgated and continuously enforced for a number of years a rule prohibiting all persons, except its employes, from riding on freight trains, and that conductors had no power to suspend said rule, it was held, Justice Key delivering the opinion, that a person riding on a freight train by permission of a brakeman, contrary to the rules, could not recover for personal injuries sustained in getting off the train while in motion. The same doctrine is held in Railway Co. v. Lynch, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 513, 28 S. W. 252; Railway Co. v. Hanna (Tex. Civ. App.) 58 S. W. 548; Graham v. Railway, 100 Tex. 27, 93 S. W. 104, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1025; Cockrell v. T. & N. O. Ry., 36 Tex. Civ. App. 559, 82 S. W. 529; Railway Co. v. Anderson, 82 Tex. 516, 17 S. W. 1039, 27 Am. St. Rep. 902.

By the remaining assignment appellant contends that the court erred in refusing to permit him to file a trial amendment, setting up that the train, at the time he alighted therefrom, was running at about 6 miles an hour; he having theretofore alleged in his pleading that the train was running from 10 to 15 miles an hour, and basing his right to amend upon the fact that he did not know how fast said train was running, and the statement of appellee's engineer, who testified upon the trial that the train upon which appellant was traveling, when his injuries were received while passing through Willis, was moving at the rate of 6 miles an hour. The court, in explanation of appellant's bill of exception upon this subject, stated that permission to amend was denied, because this evidence was only based upon the opinion of said engineer, and was given about the conclusion of the trial. While it has been held by our Supreme Court that the right to amend the pleadings exists at any time before the conclusion of the trial, still these matters are confided largely to the discretion of the trial judge, and, unless this discretion is abused, it is not ground for reversal. In the present case we cannot see how appellant was prejudiced by reason of the refusal of the court to grant him the right to go amend, because, under any view of the facts as presented in the record, appellant was not and could not be entitled to recover. Therefore, if there had been error in refusing to permit him to amend, the same was harmless under the facts disclosed by the record.

Believing that no error has been shown in the action of the trial court, the judgment of the court below is in all things affirmed.

Affirmed.

APPLEBAUM v. BASS.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 26, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1165*)—ERRORS ASSIGNABLE—FAILURE TO FILE STATEMENT OF FACTS — "ERROR APPARENT OF RECORD" — "JURISDICTIONAL QUESTION."

The trial judge's failure to make up and file a statement of facts within the time prescribed by law is not assignable, in the Court of Civil Appeals, on ex parte affidavit showing such failure as an error, since it is not one of the subjects which Rev. St. 1895, art. 1014, authorizes that court to review, and not being an error "apparent upon the face of the record" within such article, nor a jurisdictional question within article 998, so as to authorize review, and since there is adequate remedy to bring a statement of facts into the record under articles 1015 and 1382, authorizing the Court of Civil Appeals, for good cause, to extend the time for filing it, and under an application for mandamus to compel the trial judge to make up and file a statement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4522; Dec. Dig. § 1165; *Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 117.]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 672*)—REVIEW — "ERROR APPARENT OF RECORD."

An error "apparent upon the face of the record," reviewable by the Court of Civil Appeals, under Rev. St. 1895, art. 1014, is a prominent fundamental error, or one determining a question upon which the very right of the case depends.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 672.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 571*)—STATEMENT OF FACTS—MANDAMUS.

Generally mandamus lies to prevent a failure of justice upon reasons of public policy, to enforce official action, and to compel a trial judge to make and file a statement of facts for use on appeal, as required by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 571.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 564*)—STATEMENT OF FACTS — MAKING AND FILING — JUDGE'S DUTY.

As a matter of law, a trial judge does not fail to perform his duty to file a statement of facts, upon disagreement of parties, until expiration of the 30 days allowed for that purpose; and the duty continues until performed, notwithstanding lapse of that period.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 564.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 548*)—STATEMENT OF FACTS—NECESSITY FOR.

Questions arising upon the evidence cannot be reviewed on appeal, in the absence of a statement of facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2436; Dec. Dig. § 548.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 971*)—DISCRETION OF COURT—COMPETENCY OF WITNESS—CHILDREN.

It was not an abuse of discretion to allow a child to testify, where there was some evidence tending to show his appreciation of an oath.

Appeal from Harrison County Court; H. T. Lyttleton, Judge.

Action by J. H. Bass against J. Applebaum. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Appellee sued for the conversion of his property; and appellant pleaded that he had purchased the property from an agent of the appellee, which sale by the agent had been confirmed by the appellee. The trial was before a jury, and, in accordance with their verdict, a judgment was entered for the appellee. There is no statement of facts appearing in the record, but there is incorporated in the transcript an affidavit, made by the attorneys for appellant on December 21, 1907, before the county clerk, and filed by him on the same day, setting out the trial of the case, which was on September 12, 1907, and rendition of judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and on the 19th day of October, 1907, the overruling of a motion for a new trial by the court, notice of appeal to the Court of Civil Appeals, and the granting of a 20-day order, from the date of adjournment of the court, within which to prepare and have filed a statement of facts in the cause, and the entry of said order on the minutes of the court, and "that thereafter on the 4th day of November, 1907, the attorneys for the defendant prepared a statement of facts in the case, which they believe contained a full and fair statement of all the facts proven on the trial, and on said day presented the same to the attorneys for the plaintiff; that the attorneys for the parties could not agree upon the statement presented, or upon any other statement that might be prepared by them, and that thereupon afterwards on the same date, presented said statement to the county judge, who tried the case, and informed him that the attorneys for the defendant and plaintiff had failed and were unable to agree upon a statement of facts in the case, and requested such county judge to prepare and file in the case a statement of all the facts, as was required of him by law; that the said trial judge failed to prepare and file in this cause such statement of facts; that the term of the court in which the case was tried began on the 2d day of September, 1907, and adjourned on the 26th of October, 1907." Predicated upon the affidavit incorporated in the record, the appellant made the following assignment of error appearing in the transcript: "The appellant, Applebaum, has been wrongfully and illegally denied and deprived of a statement of facts herein by the county judge before whom said cause was tried, without fault or negligence on the part of said Applebaum or his attorneys." Appellant makes the following proposition under his assigned error: "Where appellant has done everything possible to obtain a statement of facts, and the trial judge fails to perform his duty by filing in the cause a statement of his own, such as required of him by law, when the parties and their attorneys cannot agree, and such judge is requested to do so, the cause will be reversed." The appellee insists that "this is a matter not reviewable by assignment of error; the aggrieved party's remedy being by mandamus to compel the county judge to make up and file statement of facts."

Alvin G. Carter and M. B. Parchman, for appellant. Jno. W. Scott and Jos. H. T. Bibb, for appellee.

LEVY, J. (after stating the facts as above). We are of the opinion that the appellant cannot, as a legal right to him by assignment of error on appeal, avail himself of the failure of the county judge to make up and file a statement of the facts within the time prescribed by law for him to do so, nor is this court authorized to consider such assignment on appeal of the case as a legal right to appellant, when predicated on such state of facts. As a basis for the exercise of appellate jurisdiction of the Court of Civil Appeals, in cases brought before the court on appeal or writ of error, the statute has prescribed the matters and subjects and method of procedure in relation thereto to appear in the record for review by this court. Article 1014, Rev. St. 1895. And it is quite conclusive from the language of the article, "and in the absence of all these, the case shall be dismissed with costs alone, or with cost and damage, at the discretion of the court," that it was the purpose of the act, and properly should be so construed, to restrict the exercise of appellate jurisdiction of the Court of Civil Appeals, in reviewing cases on appeal or writ of error, to the matters and subjects named in the article. This view is supported in the opinion of Justice Brown, speaking for the Supreme Court, in construing this article of the statute, which is: "In the absence of any of the matters mentioned the case must be dismissed which supports the conclusion that the power of the court is confined to the subsection named." See Ennis Mercantile Co. v. Wathen, 93 Tex. 622, 57 S. W. 948. Ex parte affidavit, setting out the failure of the trial judge to prepare and file a statement of the facts for the use on appeal within the time prescribed by law for him to do so, is not a "subject named," in the article, or included within the subject for review on appeal or writ of error by this court. In the Ennis Mercantile Company Case, supra, in passing upon the exercise of appellate jurisdiction by this court, the Supreme Court said: "The appellate jurisdiction of Courts of Civil Appeals is directed to the correction of errors, committed in the courts, of proceedings prior to and connected with the rendition of the judgment, and they are confined to the record as it is made by the trial court." We quote further from the opinion in the same case: "The failure of the judge in this case to approve the statement of facts presented to him, or to make up one in case of the disagreement of the parties, does not appear in the record in any manner specified by the statute, and was not a proper subject for assignment." Considering that the recital in the statement of that case was that "the affidavits were also filed in the trial court setting up the facts, copies of which are embraced in the transcript," the expression of the court "does not appear in the record in any manner specified by the statute" is significant; and, taken in connection with the further expression, "and was not a proper subject for assignment," it was evidently meant that the matter presented could not be considered on appeal by assignment, even if it had been made, because it was not a subject or matter named in the statute for review on appeal. That this meaning was intended in the case mentioned appears clear in a later opinion by the Supreme Court in the case of Middlehurst v. Collins-Gunther Co., 100 Tex. 349, 99 S. W. 1025. This latter case was where the trial judge had failed to make up a statement of facts for reasons, and his refusal and reasons appeared incorporated in the record, and assignment of error was properly made predicated upon the failure. In this case this state of the record, and in answering that portion of the certified question propounded, "should appellant, in order to avail himself of such error, have applied for a writ of mandamus against the district judge?" Justice Brown, speaking for the court, said: "The facts stated disclosed nothing to prevent the appellant from applying to the Court of Civil Appeals for a writ of mandamus to the district judge, requiring him to make and file a statement of facts. The Court of Civil Appeals should not, under such state of facts, consider the matter on bill of exception or an assignment of error." The latter portion of the answer in that case was directly involved in the question, and in the determination of the case, just as it is in the instant case. This matter, as presented, could not be classed as an error "apparent upon the face of the record," as designated in the article, because such errors have been classed as "a prominent error, either fundamental in character, or one determining a question upon which the very right of the case depends." Wilson v. Johnson, 94 Tex. 272, 60 S. W. 242. Neither is it a jurisdictional question, where article 998, Rev. St. 1895, would apply, and give this court power to review the matter as presented in the record. Ennis Mercantile Co. v. Wathen, supra.

There are several cases cited us by appellant, and on which he relies to support his contention for a reversal of this case, where on a similar state of the record a reversal was ordered by the appellate court. The case of Hilburn v. Preston (Tex. Civ. App.) 32 S. W. 702, was, in effect, overturned by the Supreme Court in the language used in referring to it, "but we cannot assent to this construction." Anderson v. Walker, 95 Tex. 596, 68 S. W. 981. By reference to some of the cases it is noted that they are of date prior to the enactment of article 1382, Rev. St. 1895, authorizing the Court of Appeals to admit, as a part of the record on appeal, delayed statement of facts, upon good cause shown. Prior to the act mentioned there does not seem to have been any provision made or authority for filing a statement of facts in the Court of Appeals, or restoring the same to the record of appeal after the time prescribed by law for filing them in the trial court. To have resorted by mandamus to compel the filing of the statement would have been futile, unless statutory authority existed, as now, to this court to extend the time for filing and restoring the same to the record as part of the record on appeal. So, prior to the act mentioned, and in the case referred to, the appellate court, in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction over the case, invoked its inherent power to prevent the failure of justice to innocent litigants through official inaction, and, as affording relief from the situation, ordered a reversal of the cause, there being no other procedure or remedy provided to prevent the injustice from official inaction; the distinguishment being that the appellate court did not place the order of reversal upon the ground purely that it was the legal right of the appellant to have a ruling in decision of the assignment as error arising on the trial or any proceeding connected with the rendition of judgment. But the ruling was placed upon the broad ground and principle that, because the matter presented to the court's attention by assignment involved the prevention of the failure of justice from official inaction on the part of the court below, in respect to the case over which the appellate court had acquired jurisdiction by appeal, it was necessary and proper for the appellate court to call into active exercise its power to act and grant such relief to the aggrieved party as could be done within the proper exercise of appellate jurisdiction. Upon reason of public policy the action of the court could be justified in good conscience, and as the proper exercise of the general appellate power of the court under the state of the then law. Especially do we think that it is not appellant's legal right, by assignment of error on appeal, to avail himself of the omission of the county judge, and have the omission considered as an error arising in the trial, or proceeding incident to the trial, and on the record made by the trial court. It would rather appear to be in contravention of law to so consider the assignment as a proper error arising in the record of the trial of the case made in the court below. And where there is other and adequate provision in procedure and remedy to restore a statement of facts to the record for use on appeal, and not resorted to by an appellant, we think it would be improper to call in to exercise general appellate power to afford the relief, and order a reversal. Our ruling is supported by an expression which we quote from the opinion of the court in the case of Collins v. Kay, 69 Tex. 365, 6 S. W. 814: "Under the rule of procedure prescribed by the act of Twentieth Legislature the statement of facts might be restored to the record, upon proper motion for the purpose; and, in the absence of the provision made by the Twentieth Legislature, we would feel constrained to hold, on the authority of the decisions of other courts, and the intimation of this court in Railway v. Underwood, 67 Tex. 594, 4 S. W. 216, that such failure upon the part of the trial, where the attention of this court is called to it by proper assignment of error, would require a reversal of the judgment." It is clear that it would be an unjust and as well an abuse of the exercise of the appellate power to employ that power to reverse the case upon the ground of mere official inaction, as a way to protect an appellant's right of appeal, without requiring the appellant to exhaust all other available procedure and remedies to have the statement of facts for use on appeal restored to the record. The result of the reversal operates practically to punish an innocent appellee in the payment of the costs flowing from a reversal, and would have the effect, in many instances perhaps, to unnecessarily delay the final determination of the litigation on appeal, and as well to present the appearance, if not giving the loophole, of having appeals trifled with by collusion.

We do not feel justified in following any of the cases cited. In our opinion ample and enforceable provision now exists to litigants to restore to the record, for use on appeal, a statement of facts which has been delayed beyond the time fixed by law for filing in the trial court. Article 1382, Rev. St. 1895. The appellant, in any case appealing to this court, has 90 days, or for good cause shown a longer time, after the date perfecting the appeal, within which to file the transcript in this court. Article 1015, Rev. St. 1895. By the two articles statutory authority is conferred upon this court, for good cause, to extend the prescribed time of filing either the record or statement of facts. Under these articles the certiorari could perfect a portion of the record not incorporated in the record filed in this court. In the event the trial judge has failed to file a statement of facts in the time prescribed by statute for him to do so, and after the expiration of the time allowed by law for the judge to do so, the appellant in the exercise of diligence can apply to this court at once for mandamus to compel the judge to make up and file a statement of facts for use on appeal. If, after the expiration of the 30 days within which the judge has to prepare and file a statement of facts, the procedure suggested were adopted, and mandamus should be awarded by this court to compel him to make up and file a statement of facts for use on appeal, there would be yet left the difference in time between the 90 days allowed to file the transcript and the 30 days in which the judge has by law to file a statement of facts to have the statement of facts made a part of the record in the trial court before the lapse of the time within which the transcript could be taken out. Then upon proper motion, under article 1382, Rev. St. 1895, made in this court, this court would have the authority to restore the statement of facts so made up by the trial judge under the order of mandamus. Should a trial judge neglect to make up and file a statement of the facts within the time prescribed by law, or from sickness fail to do so, and yet, even though mandamus were not applied for, he actually after the time does file the statement of facts in the trial court, then and in that event, upon proper motion alleging good cause, under article 1382, Rev. St. 1895, and it being without the fault of the appellant that the delay occurred, the statement of facts could by this court be restored to the record and considered. So, by these suggestions casually made, there is a way for an appellant to obtain a statement of facts in the record, and have same reviewed, though the time prescribed by statute for having the same filed in the trial court might, for cause beyond his control, have elapsed.

It is a general doctrine that mandamus will lie to prevent a failure of justice upon reasons of public policy and to enforce official action. Where a trial judge refuses to make and file a statement of facts for use on appeal, as required by statute, mandamus will lie to compel him to do so. Reagan v. Cope-land, 78 Tex. 556, 14 S. W. 1081; Railway v. Lane, 79 Tex. 648, 16 S. W. 18; Osborne v.

Prather, 83 Tex. 211, 18 S. W. 618; Gueguin v. McGown (Tex. Civ. App.) 53 S. W. 585. The reason in support of the right of this court to issue mandamus is convincing. Having acquired jurisdiction of the case by appeal, and a completed record being the basis of the exercise of appellate jurisdiction, the Court of Civil Appeals would have power to issue the mandamus to compel the proper closing and completion of the record for appeal, because the restoration to the record for use, on appeal, of a statement of facts of the case, signed and certified by the trial judge as required by law, is a matter in furtherance of, and that affects the exercise of, its appellate jurisdiction. The statute clearly prescribes and directly creates the duty of the trial judge to approve a statement of the facts presented to him for use on appeal by the parties, or to make up and file one for use on appeal in case of disagreement of the parties. The statute allows the statement to be filed within 30 days after adjournment of the court, upon such order being applied for and granted in term time. It would not be held in law to be a failure to perform his duty until the expiration of the 30 days allowed him. Perry v. Turner (Tex. Civ. App.) 108 S. W. 192. Though the statute has prescribed the time within which the judge must file the statement upon disagreement of the parties, yet the performance of his duty is not discharged by him merely because of the lapse of the time. This duty as to him is continuing until the statement of facts be actually made up and filed by him. Failure to make up and file the statement of facts within the 30 days is of the same force and equivalent, in our opinion, as would be a refusal in fact to file the same before the expiration of the 30 days. We do not think it necessary to discuss the matter any further.

Since the questions raised in the brief on the bill of exceptions arise out of the evidence offered upon the trial, they cannot be considered in the absence of the statement of facts.

We are not prepared to rule that the court did not properly exercise his discretion in allowing the young witness Bass to testify. There is some support in the test of his competence as a witness, tending to show the appreciation of an oath.

The case was ordered affirmed.

Appeal from Comanche County Court; Edwin Dobney, Judge.

Action by the Adams-Burks-Simmons Company against J. H. Johnson and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

E. C. Gaines, for appellant. Martin & George, Goodson & Goodson, and Calloway & Calloway, for appellees.

On Rehearing.

SPEER, J. Appellant sued to recover a debt due by appellee Johnson, secured by a chattel mortgage on two certain mules, and to recover the value of the mules as against appellee Hollis, upon an allegation that he had converted the security, and from an adverse decision by the trial court has appealed.

The findings of fact of the trial court, upon which he based his judgment, are as follows:

"First. I find that the mortgage declared upon in the plaintiff's first amended original petition was filed on the 17th day of January, 1906, the same day the defendant made and executed the said mortgage to the said plaintiff. One of said mortgages was made to secure a note for the amount of $303.75, and retained a lien against and described the two mules in controversy between said plaintiff and the defendant Hollis.

"Second. I find that the defendant J. H. Johnson, on October 17, 1905, sold the mules in controversy between defendant Hollis and plaintiff to one Cull Stafford in Stephenville, Erath county, Tex., and that the said Stafford paid valuable consideration for said mules, and that he had no actual notice of any lien of any kind against said mules at the time of said purchase, and that thereafter, on the first Monday in December, 1905, the said Stafford sold the said mules to the defendant J. H. Hollis, in Stephenville, Erath county, Tex., receiving therefor a valuable consideration, and that the said Hollis had no actual notice of any lien whatever against the said mules at the time of said purchase, and that the said Hollis, together with the said Stafford, has had possession of the said mules in Erath county, Tex., for more than two years prior to the filing of the plaintiff's trial amendment as herein shown, which trial amendment was filed on the 31st day of October, 1907.

"Third. I find that on the 11th day of September, 1905, defendant J. H. Johnson duly executed to the plaintiff his mortgage note for the sum of $138.75, which was secured by lien on the two mules in controversy between said plaintiff and defendant Hollis, which said mortgage was first set up in plaintiff's trial amendment, and that said amount was taken up by the note hereinbefore referred to executed on the 17th day of January, 1906, for $303.75, which said note was secured by a mortgage on said two mules in controversy. I find that the said mortgage for $138.75 was duly recorded in the county clerk's office of Comanche county, Tex., on the 18th day of September, 1905, and that the old mortgage, executed on the 11th day of September, 1905, was taken up at the time that the new mortgage was executed, and that the new note and mortgage was given in renewal of the $138.75, together with other amounts at that time due by the defendant Johnson to the said plaintiff.

"Fourth. I find that the said note and mortgage, of date January 17, 1906, was filed with the county clerk of Erath county on the 3d day of August, 1906, same being the day on which plaintiff first learned that said mules had been sold by said Johnson and were in Erath county. I also find that plaintiff never consented for said mules to be sold or removed out of Comanche county.

"Fifth. I find that each of said mortgages contained the usual stipulations whereby said security was also security for any other or additional debts which said Johnson might become indebted to plaintiff, either in his own right or as security for others; and I find that said Johnson thereafter became indebted to said plaintiff in the sum of $233.70 by reason of said plaintiff having paid a note for like amount to the Comanche National Bank, of Comanche, Tex., which said note was secured by the said Johnson on the 17th day of January, 1906; and I find that at the time of the trial, after deducting all legal offsets, payments, and credits, said defendant Johnson was still indebted to said plaintiff in the sum of $263.72."

On a former day of the term we reversed and rendered this cause in the following words:

"From the court's findings of fact it necessarily follows, we think, that appellant is entitled to judgment against appellee Hollis, unless he is precluded by the statute of limitations, upon which the trial court seems to have based his decision. The taking of the second mortgage to secure the same debt secured by the first mortgage upon the same property does not operate as a satisfaction and release in law of the first mortgage. Ploeger v. Johnson (Tex. Civ. App.) 26 S. W. 432; Howard v. Bank, 44 Kan. 549, 24 Pac. 983, 10 L. R. A. 537; Challis v. Bank, 56 Ark. 88, 19 S. W. 115; Austin v. Bailey, 64 Vt. 367, 24 Atl. 245, 33 Am. St. Rep. 932. Indeed, appellee has not pleaded that the first mortgage was released, and the burden would be upon him to do so and to support the allegation by proof (Ross v. Com. Co., 18 Tex. Civ. App. 698, 46 S. W. 398); so that we have to consider only the question of limitation above suggested.

"The trial court wrongfully confounded appellant's cause of action with the grounds of recovery relied upon to establish his cause of action. In other words, appellant's cause of action against Hollis is one for the wrongful conversion of chattels upon which he held a valid lien, and in no sense a recovery upon the written instrument evidencing Johnson's indebtedness, or even upon the written contract giving the mortgage lien. Appellant's trial amendment in effect only alleged a new reason why his right to recover first alleged in his original petition should prevail against appellee. This was in no just sense a new cause of action. Johnson v. T. C. R. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 93 S. W. 433.

"Upon the trial court's findings of fact, which we adopt, the judgment is reversed, and judgment here rendered in favor of appellant against appellee J. H. Hollis for $263.72, with 10 per cent. interest thereon from November 29, 1907; but as to the other appellees the judgment is not disturbed.

"Reversed and rendered."

Upon a consideration of the motion for rehearing we have decided that we were in error in rendering the judgment for appellant against appellee Hollis for the sum of $263.72, since the findings of fact of the trial court do not show the value of the mules converted by the appellee Hollis. Of course, if the mortgaged property converted by Hollis was worth less than the indebtedness owing by appellee Johnson to appellant and secured by the mortgage lien on such property, the judgment against Hollis should be for the value of the property only, and in the absence of a finding by the court as to this value we should not render the judgment, but the same will be remanded upon the conclusions originally announced and above set forth. The motion for rehearing is therefore granted, to the extent of remanding the cause as between appellant and appellee Hollis.

Reversed and remanded.

Appeal from Tarrant County Court; John L. Terrell, Judge.

Action by J. J. Langever against the Ellison Furniture & Carpet Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

Morgan Bryan, for appellant. T. J. Powell and Theodore Mack, for appellee.

SPEER, J. Appellee recovered judgment against appellant in the sum of $488 for the contract price of a certain electric sign built for it, from which judgment the defendant has appealed.

Appellant's defense was that appellee undertook to construct for it a certain electric sign according to plans and specifications agreed on between the parties; that the lights in the word "Ellison," constituting the sign, were to burn steady; that the same should be surrounded by a border consisting of rows of electric lights, containing 296 lamps so arranged that by a system of intermittent lights the border produced the effect of two snakes chasing each other around the word "Ellison"; that appellee also agreed that he would not build another "snake" sign in the city of Ft. Worth; but he alleged that he had not only failed to construct the sign according to his agreement, in that he had placed a less number of lights in the border than called for, but had used inferior material and workmanship in the construction of the sign, and had also built and erected another crawling snake sign in the city of

Ft. Worth for a saloon man. Appellee resents the imputation that he has violated his contract or the proprieties by erecting a crawling snake sign for a saloon keeper by replying that the latter was known as a "rat chaser."

The assignments of error for the most part relate to the court's charge, which is here set out:

"(1) The law demands of a person making a contract that he should substantially comply with his contract in every material particular, as called for by a fair, reasonable, and practical construction of the contract between the parties.

"(2) If you find from the evidence that it was agreed between the parties that there were to be 296 bulbs in the sign's border, and the sign as constructed by plaintiff and tendered defendant was not in substantial compliance with the contract's terms, you will find for the defendant; but if you believe that the said number of bulbs was not in the contract, or that the sign as tendered as to the bulbs in the border was a substantial compliance with the terms of the contract, you will find for plaintiff on this issue.

"(3) If you find from the evidence that it was understood between the parties as a part of the contract that plaintiff would not make another crawling snake sign in Ft. Worth, and that said agreement, if any, of plaintiff's was a material inducement to defendant to contract for the sign, and that plaintiff did make or place in the city of Ft. Worth another crawling snake sign, then you will find for defendant; but if you find that plaintiff did not agree not to make another crawling snake sign in Ft. Worth, or that, if plaintiff did so agree, defendant was not induced thereby to enter into the contract, or that plaintiff did not make another crawling snake sign in Ft. Worth, you will find for the plaintiff on this issue of the case."

We think the court erred in permitting the jury to find, as he did, that appellee might recover upon the theory of substantial compliance with his contract. The evidence shows without dispute that the sign actually constructed contained only 283 lamps in the border, whereas appellant contended for 296. Appellant's president testified that the border of the sign was the principal thing, and he was especially desirous of having the right number of lamps in the border, so as to produce the desired effect. If the parties to the contract specifically stipulated that the border should contain 296 lights, the courts would have no power to set aside such stipulation; but the appellee would be bound by it, even though a less number of lights might be more desirable, either from the standpoint of beauty or utility. Any other rule would put it beyond the power of the parties to contract as they please, and would require the appellant to accept and pay for something it had never bargained for. The doctrine of substantial compliance has no application under the facts of this case. If appellant contracted for a specific number of lights in the border of his sign, appellee has not complied by placing therein a less number. Linch v. Harris Lumber & Grain Co. (Tex.) 14 S. W. 701. In the case of Ross Armstrong Co. v. Shaw (No. 4,888, an officially unpublished opinion by this court) 113 S. W. 558, Shaw sued Ross Armstrong Company to cancel a series of notes given for the purchase price of a piano, alleging that the piano was sold to plaintiff upon a specific representation that the same had no mandolin attachment, whereas the piano actually delivered had such an attachment, and the defense interposed was that, inasmuch as the attachment did not injure the piano, but was just that much more than was bargained for, the representation was not material, and therefore no ground for relief. We there held, however, that the representation was material, and, the evidence showing it to be false, the plaintiff was entitled to relief upon the broad ground that, as parties bind themselves, so must they be bound. The case is analogous in principle to the one under consideration. It can make no difference that the sign as actually constructed and tendered to appellant is as good or even better than if it contained the requisite number of electric lights, since that is a matter controlled by the terms of the contract entered into between the parties.

If we are correct in our reasoning above, it also follows that the court erred in the third paragraph of his charge, submitting to the jury to find whether or not the stipulation that appellee would not make another similar sign in Ft. Worth was a material inducement to appellant to enter into the contract.

The court also erred in permitting the appellee to testify that he placed a greater number of lamps in the word "Ellison" than he had agreed to, since it was wholly irrelevant to any issue in the case, and could only tend to excuse him in the minds of the jurors from a full compliance with the contract in the other important particular already discussed. There is some evidence tending to show that appellant waived appellee's breach of the contract by approving a sketch or plan of the sign showing a less number of lights than he originally contracted for, and the pleadings perhaps made pertinent this defense; but the court seems not to have submitted the question to the jury.

For the errors discussed, the judgment of the county court is reversed, and the cause remanded for another trial.

1. RAILROADS (§ 350*) — INJURIES AT CROSSINGS—HORSE SHYING AT BOX CAR—ACTIONS—NEGLIGENCE.

Where a person was injured at a railroad crossing by the shying of his horse at a box car which had been negligently placed at the crossing by the railroad company, the mere fact that he attempted to pass after he saw that the horse was shying, and knew that there was danger in doing so, would not as matter of law preclude his recovery.

Appeal from Bosque County Court; P. S. Hale, Judge.

Action by N. B. Randall against the Texas Central Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cureton & Cureton, J. A. Kibler, and E. B. Robertson, for appellant. W. T. Schenck, and H. S. Dillard, for appellee.

PRESLER, J. In this case the jury, under a substantially proper general charge of the court, supplemented by several special charges given at the instance of the defendant, fairly submitting the law of the case, found that plaintiff's injuries were proximately caused by defendant's negligence in the construction and maintenance of a certain street crossing and roadway over Shepard street, in the town of Morgan, Bosque county, Tex., and by further obstructing the free use of said street crossing and roadway by negligently leaving a box car partly on and across said street crossing and roadway.

Appellant here insists that appellee's injuries and the loss and damage resulting therefrom were the result of contributory negligence on the part of appellee, claiming that he failed to exercise ordinary care and prudence that the law devolved upon him by driving a young, scary, and wild horse into a place of known danger. This issue under proper instructions upon all material questions therein involved was submitted to the jury, and we are unable to hold that their finding against defendant is unsupported by a preponderance of evidence. In the able supplemental brief of counsel for appellant, in attempting to distinguish this case from the Morris Case, 101 S. W. 1038, 18 Tex. Ct. Rep. 527 (which in all material respects is a parallel case), we find the gist of appellant's contention for a reversal of this case thus concisely stated: "Plaintiff is precluded from recovering from the railway company for injury caused by his horse shying at a box car, although it had negligently been permitted to remain at a street crossing, because he attempted voluntarily to drive the horse near the car after he saw that the horse was shying and would shy; it appearing to him at the time to be dangerous to do so." Upon a full examination of the evidence in this case relating to the above proposition, it does not occur to us that, upon the question of voluntarily acting upon the knowledge of known danger, this case is distinguishable materially from the Morris Case. While in the latter case it does not appear that Morris made an affirmative statement to the effect that he knew of the danger, as the appellee did in this case, we are forced to the conclusion that from the circumstances necessarily observed by Morris, and occurring at the time that he drove into the place of danger, he must and did know of the danger connected with attempting to use the crossing at that time. The appellee Randall in this case, after admitting that he knew that it was dangerous to attempt to cross the road under the circumstances surrounding, on redirect examination further stated, however: "The horse that I was driving would sometimes shy, but no more than the old, gentle horse I am now driving. At the time I undertook to cross, and knowing the horse as I did, and seeing the situation, I did not expect this horse to shy and run off of this road crossing." On a review of the authorities, we are not inclined to hold, even if the facts in this case warranted its application, that appellant's above quoted proposition is a correct statement of the law of contributory negligence in acting upon known danger. This court in opinion rendered by Chief Justice Conner at this term in the case of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co. v. Mrs. Kate Shannon, 111 S. W. 1060, held that it was not error upon the part of the trial court to refuse to give the following special instruction: "You are instructed that if you find the injured party, Vernon Oliver, knew that it was dangerous to board a moving train, and that this was the cause of the injury received by him, you are instructed to find a verdict in favor of the defendant." The testimony of said Oliver upon the issue presented by the charge refused was as follows: "I know it is more or less dangerous to attempt to get on a moving train. I know that the faster it is going, the more dangerous it is. Assuming it to be true that this train was coming from 15 to 20 miles an hour, I know it would be very dangerous. If it had been going that rate of speed, it would. I know it is very dangerous to attempt to board a train moving 15 to 20 miles an hour, and I know it is dangerous to attempt to board any moving train." The court observes "that Oliver may have known that it was dangerous in a sense to board the moving train, * * * yet the evidence quoted does not necessarily constitute negligence. This was for the determination of the jury. In other words, the jury under all of the evidence could well conclude that a person of ordinary care and prudence would have attempted to board the train under the same circumstances rather than to abandon the journey. It hence would have been error to have taken this issue from the jury, as in effect sought by the special charge quoted. See Railway Co. v. Gasscamp, 69 Tex. 545, 7 S. W. 227. And, while Oliver used the language quoted in the course of his examination as a witness, we do not think it is sufficient to overturn the verdict, when considered in the light of all of his testimony." In the case of Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fe Ry. Co. v. Grisom, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 630, 82 S. W. 67, 11 Tex. Ct. Rep. 194, Associate Justice Speer of this court rendering the opinion, the plaintiff, not an employe, was injured while attempting to pass between two cars of a train by the moving of the train, the court holding the mere fact that the plaintiff knew the danger incident to his act did not prevent a recovery, this issue being expressly made by the appellant's requesting the following special charge, which was refused: "If you find from the evidence that plaintiff Ollie Grisom knew of the danger incident to climbing between cars just prior to and at the time he attempted to climb between the same, you will find for the defendant." This court held that the refusal of the trial court to give said charge was not error, observing that "it is not the law in a case of this character that a plaintiff who has received injuries through the negligence of a defendant cannot recover merely because he knew there was some danger incident to the act through which he was injured," citing Ry. Co. v. Gasscamp, 69 Tex. 545, 7 S. W. 227; Railway Co. v. Prescott, 59 Fed. 237, 8 C. C. A. 109, 23 L. R. A. 654. As indicated above, we conclude that the trial court did not err in refusing to give peremptory instruction to the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant.

We think that the evidence complained of in appellant's fourth, fifth, and sixth assignments of error, relating to the removal of the car shortly after the accident occurred, was properly admitted. One of the material issues of the case being whether this car was standing in the street or on the crossing at the time of the injury, and the time at which different witnesses saw said car varying, said evidence was necessary and explanatory on the above referred to issue.

We think the court properly rejected and refused to admit the evidence offered by appellant as to the crossing in this case being such crossing as is in common use throughout the state where public highways and streets cross railroads in towns the size of Morgan. We regard this evidence as immaterial. If other crossings were negligently maintained, the appellant could not relieve itself of liability on that ground. It was a question of fact for the jury as to whether or not this particular crossing was negligently maintained. Railway companies must obey the requisites of Rev. St. 1896, art. 4426. Ordinary care is not sufficient. Besides, this was a public crossing maintained by the public and recognized by this appellant for more than 20 years. Appellee had the right to the unobstructed use of it, and was not compelled to cross or try to cross at some other crossing. I. & G. N. R. Co. v. Haddox, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 395, 81 S. W. 1036; I. & G. N. R. Co. v. Butcher (Tex. Civ. App.) 81 S. W. 819; Pecos & N. T. Ry. Co. v. Bowman, 34 Tex. Civ. App. 98, 78 S. W. 22.

We are of the opinion that appellant's ninth, tenth, eleventh, and twelfth assignments present no reversible error and that the general charge, together with the special charges asked by defendant and given, adequately submitted the law on all the phases of the case.

Judgment affirmed.

NONA MILLS CO. et al. v. WINGATE et al.†
(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 14, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. JUDGES (§ 56*)—DISQUALIFICATION—EFFECT ON ACTS.

The acts of a judge, in a case where he is subject to any of the disqualifications mentioned in the Constitution, are void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judges, Cent. Dig. §§ 235-245; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 13*)—CONSTITUTIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

A Constitution must be interpreted liberally, so that it may accomplish the objects of its establishment and carry out the principles of government.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 9-17; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

3. JUDGES (§ 56*)—DISQUALIFICATION—EFFECT ON ACTS.

Under Const. 1845, art. 4, § 14, providing that no judge shall sit in any case wherein he may be interested, an order for the sale by a guardian of a certificate for land issued to minor heirs, at which sale the certificate was purchased by the judge granting the order, is void when invoked by him or by one claiming under him, to support the sale to him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judges, Cent. Dig. §§ 235-241; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

4. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 99*)—SALES—PERSONS WHO MAY PURCHASE.

A judge is incapable of purchasing at a guardian's sale, the validity of which must be passed on by him in his official capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

5. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 103*)—SALES—CONFIRMATION.

The confirmation of a guardian's sale of a certificate for land issued to minor heirs, by the judge who purchased the certificate at the sale, is void; and the deed to him, reciting the sale and confirmation, is also void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

6. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 103*)—SALES—CONFIRMATION.

Where the record shows on its face, in connection with the undisputed facts, that the judge who confirmed a guardian's sale of a certificate for land was the purchaser thereof, an order approving the guardian's final report, entered by another judge, is not a confirmation of the sale.

Appeal from District Court, Hardin County; L. B. Hightower, Judge.

Action between the Nona Mills Company and others and Artmes Wingate and others. From a judgment for the latter, the former appeal. Affirmed.

Smith, Crawford & Sonfield, V. A. Collins, Tallafarro & Nall, W. W. Cruse, John L. Little, and Greer, Minor & Miller, for appellants. Greers & Nall, D. Edward Greer, and G. P. Dougherty, for appellees.

NEILL, J. This appeal is from a judgment rendered in favor of appellees against appellants for two surveys of land, located by virtue of a certificate for one-third of a league, issued to the heirs of William Wingate. The appellees claim as and through the heirs of William Wingate, and the appellants through a purported guardian's sale of the certificate. If such sale was valid, appellants are entitled to recover the land in controversy. If the sale was void, the judgment must be affirmed.

The uncontroverted facts which were found by the court, who tried the case without a jury, are, in substance, as follows: On February 2, 1858, Isaiah Junker, county judge of Jefferson county, Tex., entered an order in said court, while sitting for probate and other like purposes, appointing Tabitha Wingate guardian of the estate of the minor children of William Wingate, to whom, as decedent's heirs, the certificate referred to was issued. Tabitha duly qualified as guardian of the estate of said minors under said appointment, and on February the 6th an inventory and appraisal of the estate, showing that the certificate in question was the only property of said estate, was duly filed. This inventory and appraisal was approved by said court on February 23, 1858. On the same day, upon a proper application, it was ordered by said court that the guardian of the estate, after giving lawful notice of the time and place of sale, should on Tuesday, the 11th day of March, 1858, at the courthouse door, in the town of Beaumont, between the hours prescribed by law, sell at public sale to the highest bidder, for one half cash and the balance on a credit of 12 months, with lien note and approved personal security, all the right, title, and interest of the said minors in and to said one-third league certificate. On March 29, 1858, the guardian of the estate filed in said court her report of sale, addressed to Isaiah Junker, chief justice of Jefferson county, which is as follows: "The undersigned, Tabitha Wingate, guardian of the minor heirs of William Wingate, deceased, in accordance with your order and the law in such case made and provided, on the 11th day of March, 1858, made the sale of the headright certificate of said decedent, and returns the following account: I. Junker bought the said certificate No. 5091-5092 for 1,476 acres, at 50 cents per acre, $738." On the same day an order was entered by said court, approving and confirming this report or account of sale, and the guardian ordered to execute the necessary deed to the purchaser. Whereupon a deed bearing date the 29th of March, 1858, reciting the order of sale, the report of sale, and the order of the court confirming the same, was executed by Tabitha Wingate as guardian of the heirs of William Wingate, deceased, to Isaiah Junker, who was, during all of said probate proceedings, chief justice and county judge of Jefferson county, Tex., and who presided as such judge over said court, and as judge thereof granted all the orders above mentioned affecting the sale of the certificate. Isaiah Junker lived in Jefferson county, Tex., from 1849 until 1870, the date of his death. On January 29, 1861, Mrs. Wingate filed in the county court her final account as guardian of the estate of the Wingate minors, in which she debits and credits herself as follows:

Dr.

To amount derived from sale of land certificate as per account of sale, one-half cash, and balance in six months from date thereof.....	$ 738 00
Interest thereon from the date of the receipt thereof, at 10 per cent., to this date, about.....	191 00
	<hr/> $ 929 00

Cr.

By the maintenance and support of my five wards above mentioned six years and a half after the death of my said husband, Wm. Wingate, and to the present time, at about $3.00 each per month.....	$1,170 00
--	------------

Showing a balance due this guardian of	$241 00

This account was ordered approved, and the guardian discharged by the court on the same day, A. J. Ward then being the judge of said court. Upon these undisputed facts the only question of law to be determined is, was the sale of the certificate made by the guardian of minors to Isaiah Junker, the judge of the court who ordered, approved, and confirmed the sale, void? This was answered in the affirmative by the trial court, and we have no doubt as to the correctness of its decision.

Article 4, section 14, Const. 1845, provides that: "No judge shall sit in any case wherein he may be interested." It has been uniformly held in this state that the acts of the judge, in a case where it is subject to any of the disqualifications mentioned in the Constitution, are void. Chambers v. Hodges, 23 Tex. 104; Newcome v. Light, 58 Tex. 141, 44 Am. Rep. 604; Templeton v. Giddings (Tex.) 12 S. W. 851; Andrews v. Beck, 23 Tex. 455; Burks v. Bennett, 62 Tex. 277; Gains v. Barr, 60 Tex. 676; Jouett v. Gunn, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 84, 35 S. W. 194; Johnson v. Johnson (Tex. Civ. App.) 89 S. W. 1102. It is, however, conceded by the appellants that the order of confirmation of the sale of the certificate by the judge of the court, who purchased it, was void, by reason of the constitutional inhibition. But their insistence is that, notwithstanding its invalidity, he not being disqualified when the order of sale was granted, such order was valid, and that he did not become disqualified until he became the purchaser at the sale which he had ordered. And that therefore the sale to him was valid, and the approval of the guardian's final account by another judge was, in effect, a confirmation of the sale. This contention, in our opinion, is founded upon such a narrow construction of the constitutional inhibition against a judge sitting in a case wherein he "may be interested" as would, in many cases, thwart its obvious purpose. It is a canon of construction that: "A Constitution is not to be interpreted on narrow or technical principles, but liberally and on broad general lines, in order that it may accomplish the objects of its establishment, and carry out the great principles of government." Black on Interpretation of Laws, 13. The constitutional inhibition in question is but a reiteration of the ancient maxim "Nemo debet esse iudex in propria sua causa," which is translated in the language of, and has its place in the laws of, every civilized nation in the world. It is so deeply imbedded in the human breast as to place beyond contemplation a determination by a judge of his own case, or any case in which he may be interested.

Judge Junker, having purchased the certificate at the sale made by a guardian, on an order made by himself ipso facto, became interested in the matter of guardianship pending before him. His title to the property depended upon the validity of the order of sale, which might have become the subject of review during the pendency of the matter of guardianship of the estate; and by his purchase he precluded himself from passing upon any question that might have afterwards been raised as to the validity of the order, which was the origin of his claim to the property. From this it seems to us that the order of sale should not, as between him and the wards of the guardian, be held to be of such validity as would support the sale of the property to him. But, on the contrary, it should be adjudged of no effect whatever, when invoked by him or those claiming under him. Besides, we think that a judge is incapable of purchasing at a sale, the validity of which he must in his official capacity pass upon. Frieberg v. Isbell (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 968; Halsey v. Jones (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 697; Livingston v. Cochran, 83 Ark. 205; Walton v. Torrey, Harr. (Mich.) 250. But be it as it may, the confirmation of the sale, which was essential to its validity, by the judge who purchased the certificate, was, by reason of his interest, unquestionably void, as was the deed to him by the guardian, reciting the sale and confirmation. No title having passed by the deed, based upon the void order of confirmation, neither lapse of time, nor any subsequent proceedings in the matter of guardianship, could inspire it with vitality. It was "as dead as a door nail" when it was delivered to Judge Junker, and could afterwards be no more galvanized into life than a corpse. All the cases cited by appellants in their brief, as well as any others known to us, to sustain their contention that the order January 29, 1861, approving the guardian's final report, was, in effect, a confirmation of the sale by the guardian of the certificate to Junker, rest upon the presumption that, where the record is shown to be lost, or fails to recite an order essential to the validity of a sale, such an order was duly made. But here we have a case where the record shows upon its face, in connection with the undisputed facts, that the judge who confirmed the sale of the certificate was the purchaser thereof. This excludes any presumption of a valid order of confirmation, but shows indubitably its invalidity.

There is no error in the judgment, and it is affirmed.

Appeal from District Court, Taylor County; J. H. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by G. W. Brillhart against J. M. Alexander. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hardwicke & Hardwicke and Theodore Mack, for appellant. Wagstaff & Davidson, for appellee.

SPEER, J. Appellee, Brillhart, sued appellant, and for cause of action alleged: "That on or about the ——— day of March, 1906, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract by the terms of which contract the plaintiff agreed to sell, convey, and deliver to defendant a certain piano, then owned by the plaintiff, and in consideration therefor the defendant contracted and agreed to convey to the plaintiff lots 13 and 14, in block D. Baldwin subdivision of lot No. 2, block 204, city of Abilene, in Taylor county, Tex., said lots facing east on Hickory street, in the northern part of the city of Abilene, in Taylor county, Tex. The plaintiff further shows to the court that on said date he delivered said piano to the defendant, and that the defendant received said piano and accepted the same, but refused to convey said lots to plaintiff, as he had contracted to do, and still refuses to convey said lots and to carry out said contract, although he has received the consideration for said lots, and the defendant is in position and able to carry out said contract and to convey said lots to the plaintiff." The prayer of the petition was for a decree of specific performance and for general and equitable relief. The defendant interposed general and special demurrers, general denial, and answered specially that he had agreed to convey to plaintiff's wife, in exchange for said piano, any two lots that she might select from the Steffens & Lowdon addition, while the lots sued for were not in that addition, but were in the Baldwin addition. There was a judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

Most of appellant's assignments serve as a basis for the general proposition that the minds of the parties did not meet upon the subject-matter of this transaction, and that therefore the trial court should have instructed a verdict for appellant, or at least have granted a new trial. It is true the appellant's version of the affair would have authorized a judgment in his favor upon the ground that he specially restricted Mrs. Brillhart, who appears to have acted for appellee in the matter, to a selection of lots belonging to him in the Steffens & Lowdon addition. On the other hand, Mrs. Brillhart's testimony was to the effect that the lots in controversy were pointed out to her by a Mr. Wood, whom appellant had specially deputed to show her the lots, and were selected by her, and this selection made known to appellant, and he fully acquiesced in the same. This conflict in the evidence was pointedly submitted to the jury in appellant's favor in the following language: "Unless you find from the evidence that, at the time such contract or agreement was made between the defendant and the plaintiff's wife, the defendant intended and understood that the two lots in controversy, No. 13 and 14 in Baldwin's addition, were included in the contract of sale then being made, you will find for the defendant as to said lots, but find for the plaintiff that he recover of the defendant the piano tendered by the pleadings." The verdict, therefore, implies a finding that the minds of the parties did meet upon the specific subject-matter of the contract, and we are unable to disturb this finding.

It is objected that the portion of the charge above quoted assumes that a contract had been made between the parties; but, if it does, such fact is nevertheless undisputed, since both parties testified to a contract, and the only difference was as to which lots were included in it.

The issues submitted in appellant's special charges were included in the main

ROYAL FRATERNAL UNION v. LUNDY.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 22, 1908.)

1. INJUNCTION (§ 232*)—DEGREE—OPERATION—ENFORCEMENT.

A judgment, enjoining the officers and agents of an insurance society from canceling a certificate, operates in personam only, and can be enforced only by attaching the bodies of the contumacious individuals, and the infliction of punishment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 636*)—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—MANAGEMENT—INTERNAL AFFAIRS—SUPERVISION BY COURT.

It is not within the judicial province of the courts of a state to supervise and direct the internal affairs and management of a foreign corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 2571; Dec. Dig. § 636.*]

3. COURTS (§ 12*)—JURISDICTION—TERRITORIAL LIMITS.

Where the officers of a foreign insurance society, doing business in Texas, were nonresidents, a Texas court of equity would not render a decree enforceable only in personam, restraining such officers from canceling a certificate of a Texas citizen; the rule that a court of equity in one state may enjoin the performance of acts beyond its territorial jurisdiction being limited to cases where the persons against whom the injunction is sought reside within the jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

4. INJUNCTION (§ 13*)—THREATENED INJURY.

A threatened cancellation of an insurance certificate by the officers of a society is not ground for an injunction, unless such threats, if carried into execution, would produce some substantial injury to complainant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

5. INJUNCTION (§ 22*)—THREATS—SCOPE OF REMEDY.

A person is not entitled to an injunction to restrain a threatened injury if the execution of the threats is such action as cannot be appropriately controlled by injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

6. INSURANCE (§ 730*)—MUTUAL BENEFIT SOCIETY—CANCELLATION OF POLICY.

No action of a mutual benefit society without the consent of insured, he having fully performed his part of the contract, will terminate or relieve the society from liability thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1877; Dec. Dig. § 730.*]

7. INSURANCE (§ 765*)—TERMINATION OF POLICY—REMEDIES OF INSURED.

On the alleged termination of a policy by insurer, insured in general may tender the premiums when due, wait till the policy matures, and then sue for the benefits, or when notified that the insurer has elected to forfeit the policy, may acquiesce and sue for damages, or he may institute proceedings to have the issue as to whether or not the policy has been in fact forfeited, or is still in force, judicially determined.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Dec. Dig. § 765.*]

8. CORPORATIONS (§ 665*)—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—ACTIONS—EXTRATERRITORIAL JURISDICTION.

The fact that insurer is a foreign corporation, domiciled in another state, does not deprive a court of equity in Texas of jurisdiction of a suit to determine whether a policy has been in fact forfeited or is still in force, and to pass a decree determining the status of the parties thereto.

Appeal from Bowie County Court; Sam H. Smelser, Judge.

Suit by Isaac G. Lundy against the Royal Fraternal Union. Decree for complainant, and defendant appeals. Reversed and dismissed.

Hart, Mahaffey & Thomas, for appellant. F. M. Ball, for appellee.

HODGES, J. In view of the disposition we make of this case and the issues discussed, we think it unnecessary to do more than to state the character of the suit, and give some of the pleadings in detail. The suit was instituted by the appellee, plaintiff below, asking for a writ of injunction, restraining the appellant from forfeiting and canceling a certain policy of insurance which the appellee asserts he holds, and which had been theretofore issued to him by the appellant. Omitting the formal introductory portion of the appellee's original petition, it is as follows: "That the plaintiff is an individual residing in Bowie county, Tex., and that the defendant is a corporation chartered under the laws of the state of Missouri, to which was issued a permit by the state of Texas to transact business therein, after having designated the commissioner of insurance of the state of Texas as a proper person upon whom service may be had in all suits against the said defendant in the state of Texas, and at present Hon. Robt. T. Milner is the commissioner of insurance in this state. For cause of action the plaintiff alleges that heretofore, to wit, on the 19th day of August, A. D. 1902, in the state of Texas, upon application being made and accepted in the form required, this defendant issued to this plaintiff a certain certificate or policy of life, health, and accident insurance, under which he has protection and indemnity against sickness, accident, and death, and since the issuance and delivery of the same this plaintiff has faithfully performed each and every condition and requirement imposed upon him, whether by the terms of the said policy or certificate of insurance, or the constitution and laws governing the order. That the plaintiff was born, to wit, July 1, 1848, and he is now over the age of 60 years; and 60 years is the maximum limit whereby he is eligible to procure such indemnity as that contained and afforded by such certificate or policy of insurance, or by any organization transacting a like or similar business. That there is no time limit fixed for the termination of the said policy of insurance, but by the terms of the same, so long as the dues of the plaintiff are paid as required, the instrument and relationship which it creates between the parties exists during his lifetime. That by reason of his age of over 60 years this plaintiff cannot procure such or similar indemnity, and, having in good faith relied upon the continuity of the relationship which this defendant created by the issuance of the policy of insurance, plaintiff will be without the protection and indemnity which it affords, if the defendant is permitted to wrongfully, illegally, and unjustly act as it is threatening to do, by arbitrarily terminating the contract. Plaintiff says that he is now old and infirm from age and years; otherwise well and healthy as one ordinarily of his age could reasonably expect to be. That for years he has made prompt and punctual payment of every assessment and all dues required by him, and that he is on this day, the 30th of May, 1907, remitting to the defendant at St. Louis, St. Louis exchange, for his assessment and dues for the month of June, 1907, as per contract. That this plaintiff has faithfully performed every condition and obligation imposed on him by the contract, and entered into the same, as the defendant well knew, and now does know, for the purpose of having the protection and indemnity which the contract affords, and the contract to the plaintiff is reasonably worth, for the indemnity and financial aid which it affords, the sum of $500. That plaintiff is a man of good moral character, of exemplary habits, conduct, and deportment and that he is free from any wrongdoing that would impose a hardship or burden upon the defendant in the payment of the indemnity; that he is a man of moderate means, and in his declining years and old age is in need of and entitled to the indemnity and protection offered by the terms of the policy, which was contemplated at the time of applying for and receiving the policy in his younger days; and, unless restrained by your honor's most gracious writ of injunction, this defendant will do him the irreparable wrong and injury that it is threatening to do by arbitrarily, wrongfully, and unlawfully canceling out and terminating his policy. That the plaintiff now offers to perform every condition thereof. That the plaintiff's said policy of insurance No. 23,106 has been lost, and he cannot find same after diligently searching for it, and a copy of which is in the hands of this defendant, as are the constitutions and by-laws governing the order, and it is hereby notified to produce the same on a trial of this cause, otherwise parol evidence will be resorted to, to prove the same. Plaintiff says, further, that the defendant's effort to breach this contract and terminate this contract in the above manner was unjust and wrongful. That plaintiff here tenders in court, and again offers to pay, any dues of money now owing; and there naturally arose from the wrongful effort to breach the said contract the further damage of $200, incurred in the employment of counsel to prosecute this suit, for the recovery of which the plaintiff here prays for damages, alleging that said expense was reasonable and proper in the premises. Wherefore plaintiff prays, on a hearing of this petition, for the $200 item as damages last above mentioned, and for the issuance of your honor's most gracious writ of injunction perpetually restraining the defendant from unlawfully and wrongfully canceling or terminating the said policy or certificate of insurance, and for your honor's most gracious mandatory writ of injunction and mandamus compelling the defendant to restore and keep vital and of force and effect the said certificate or policy of insurance, and for costs of suit, and for such other and further orders, judgments, and decrees, legal or equitable, as this cause of action may be shown to merit." The appellant filed a general demurrer, and general and special denials, and also alleged some matters in avoidance, which are not necessary here to notice. The cause was submitted to the court without a jury, and a judgment entered in favor of the appellee, perpetually enjoining the appellant and its officers and agents from doing any act "to impair, destroy, cancel, annul, or breach either the contractual relationship, or any right, privilege, guaranty, or immunity afforded or created by the contract, certificate, or policy of insurance. * * * That said writ shall also order, command, and require, and immediately compel, the Royal Fraternal Union, its officers, agents, and employes, whomsoever, jointly and severally, to immediately restore the said Isaac G. Lundy to full membership and fellowship," etc. It was also further ordered that the appellee take nothing upon his prayer for $200 damages, which he seeks as attorney's fees. The judgment is quite lengthy, but the foregoing gives its substance.

Putting that construction upon his petition most favorable to the appellee his allegations amount to this: That the appellant is a foreign corporation, with its domicile in the state of Missouri, and is engaged in the business of issuing policies of insurance against sickness, accident, and death; that it is doing business in this state under and by virtue of a permit from the proper officer; that the appellee is the holder of one of the appellant's policies of insurance, without naming the benefits agreed to be paid; that he has promptly paid in full, as they accrued, all of the dues and assessments required of him by the terms of his policy, and is therefore entitled to be regarded as a policy holder in good standing; that notwithstanding those facts, the appellant is wrongfully threatening to cancel and declare forfeited the policy issued to the appellee; that unless the appellant is restrained from so doing, it will cancel and declare forfeited the aforesaid policy of insurance; that the appellee is now over 90 years of age, and if his policy of insurance is forfeited, he will be without protection, inasmuch as he will be unable, by reason of his age, to obtain any further insurance. It thus appears from the allegations of the appellee that he is asking a court of equity in this state to enjoin the officers and agents of a foreign corporation, domiciled in another state, from doing certain acts in and about their business affairs in that state. The court below having granted the relief prayed for, let us suppose that this court should affirm that judgment. The question would then arise, how is such a decree to be enforced in the event the officers and agents of the appellant company should persist in doing the acts prohibited? Such a judgment could only operate in personam, and obedience to the court's mandate can be compelled only by an attachment of the body of the contumacious individuals and the infliction of some punishment. In the case before us all of the parties against whom the order of the court is directed are permanently domiciled beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the court, and cannot be reached by any process issued therefrom. It is therefore evident that such a decree would be utterly futile. Moreover, the appellant being a foreign corporation, domiciled in another state, it is not within the judicial province of a court of this state to undertake to supervise and direct its internal affairs and management. Clark v. Mutual Reserve Fund Ass'n, 14 App. D. C. 154, 43 L. R. A. 392; Ebert v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n, 81 Minn. 116, 83 N. W. 506, 834, 84 N. W. 457; 3 Cooley's Briefs on Ins. p. 2841. It is true that there are instances in which a court of equity situated in one state will enjoin the performance of acts beyond its territorial jurisdiction, but this seems to be limited to cases where the parties against whom the injunction is sought reside within the jurisdiction of the court. Bellows, etc., v. Rutland, 28 Vt. 470; Margarum v. Moon, 63 N. J. Eq. 586, 53 Atl. 179; Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 10 Sup. Ct. 269, 33 L. Ed. 538; 1 High on Inj. §§ 105, 106. Such judicial restraints imposed upon the conduct that may be enacted beyond the jurisdiction of the court are predicated upon the principle that such judgments are intended to operate only upon the person, and that, if the parties against whom they are directed are within the jurisdiction of the court, the decree can be enforced, and are not considered an interference with the jurisdiction of any other tribunal over the subject-matter of the controversy. It would seem that, if the justification for the exercise of this power is to be found in the fact that the party defendant resides within the territorial jurisdiction of the court rendering the decree, it would follow that no such authority would be exercised where this situation does not exist.

We are disposed to think that there is still another fatal objection appearing upon the face of the appellee's pleadings. That is the remedy sought. The injury which he seeks to avert is alleged to be the threatened cancellation and forfeiture of the appellee's policy of insurance, or, in practical effect, that the appellant company is threatening to consider and treat the policy as forfeited and canceled. Unless this threat on the part of the appellant, if carried into execution, would be productive of some substantial injury to the appellee, there can be no sufficient reason why he should be entitled to a writ of injunction. Neither would he be entitled to the writ if the execution of the threats is such action as cannot be appropriately controlled by injunction, leaving out of consideration the question as to whether or not there is an adequate remedy at law for any injury that might follow. The situation, as depicted by the appellee, is that the appellant is threatening to refuse to recognize the continued existence of the policy, and may decline to accept the monthly premiums tendered by the appellee. This would not in the least impair the rights of the appellee, even if done. No act of the appellant, without the consent of Lundy, will terminate the contract of insurance, or relieve the appellant from liability thereon. Assigning as a reason why it will not recognize its liability that the policy has been forfeited would not strengthen the appellant's claim. Day v. Conn. Life Ins. Co., 45 Conn. 480, 29 Am. Rep. 693. Generally, when a controversy arises between the insurer and the holder of the policy as to whether or not it is still in force, there are three courses open to the policy holder: (1) He may tender the premiums when due, wait till the policy matures, and then bring an action for the benefits; (2) he may, when notified by the insurer that it has elected to consider the policy as forfeited, acquiesce, treat the contract as terminated, and bring an action for damages for the wrongful cancellation of the policy; or (3) he may institute a proceeding in equity, and have the issue as to whether or not the policy has in fact been forfeited, or is still in force, judicially determined. Metropolitan Ins. Co. v. McCormick, 19 Ind. App. 49, 49 N. E. 44, 65 Am. St. Rep. 392; Meyer v. Knickerbocker Life Ins. Co., 73 N. Y. 516, 29 Am. Rep. 200; Day v. Conn. Life Ins. Co., supra; 3 Cooley's Briefs on Law of Ins. pp. 2840-2842. The fact that the insurer is a foreign corporation, domiciled in a state different from that in which the action is brought, does not deprive the court of jurisdiction to render a decree determining the status of the parties to the contract. 3 Cooley's Briefs on Law of Ins. 2840, 2841, and cases there cited.

We deem it unnecessary to consider the various other assignments of error presented in the brief of the appellant, in view of the fact that the case will be finally disposed of upon the objections discussed.

For the reasons stated, we think the judgment of the trial court should be reversed, and the cause dismissed, but without prejudice to the right of the appellee to institute, in a court of competent jurisdiction, another action for the proper relief. We decline to pass upon the issue as to whether or not the policy of insurance has been forfeited in fact, or that the appellant could justly so consider it, leaving that to be determined in such other action as the appellee may see fit to institute.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause dismissed.

WEBB COUNTY v. HASIE†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 20, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 931*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS.

There being no conclusions of the trial judge, all the issues on which there was evidence must be taken as resolved by the trial court in favor of the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 931.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1042*)—HARMLESS ERROR—STRIKING OUT PARTS OF PLEADING.

Where, in an action for the contract price for the construction of a county bridge, the petition alleged that the plans referred to in the contract and on file in the county clerk's office when the contract was made were those in accordance with which the contractor built the bridge, and the issue, whether the plans on file at the time of the making of the contract were the original plans or not was raised by the answer and was litigated, and the court found in favor of the contractor, the striking of allegations in the answer alleging the fraudulent substitution of plans after the execution of the contract, with the knowledge of the contractor, was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4110-4114; Dec. Dig. § 1042.*]

3. BRIDGES (§ 20*)—CONSTRUCTION—CONTRACTS—PERFORMANCE—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action on a contract for the construction of a county bridge, the petition alleged that the plans referred to in the contract and on file in the county clerk's office when the contract was made were those in accordance with which the contractor had built the bridge, the court did not err in admitting in evidence the tracing of a plan for the bridge to show the fact alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bridges, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

4. BRIDGES (§ 20*)—CONSTRUCTION—CONTRACTS.

A contract for the construction of a county bridge, calling for the construction of a bridge "in accordance with plans on file and forming a part of this contract," refers to the plans on file at the time of the execution of the contract, though the plans originally adopted differed therefrom.

5. BRIDGES (§ 20*)—CONSTRUCTION—STATUTORY AUTHORITY.

Under Rev. St. 1895, art. 4792, conferring on the commissioners' court full authority to cause all necessary bridges to be built in their respective counties, the county, in the absence of any statute restraining the exercise of such power, may contract for the construction of a bridge according to plans differing from those originally adopted.

Appeal from District Court, Webb County; J. F. Mullally, Judge.

Action by M. S. Hasie, Jr., against the county of Webb. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Atlee & Atlee, for appellant. Earl D. Scott, for appellee.

JAMES, C. J. The appellee sued the county upon a contract for the construction of a bridge according to the plans and specifications on file in the office of the county clerk made a part thereof, and obtained judgment for $4,893.

The contract, dated September 19, 1905, which was an exhibit to the petition, was "to build, paint, and erect in place, including all dirt fills, by the 19th of March, 1906, for the county, a steel bridge with approaches across the Santa Isabel creek, consisting of one 75-foot span, 175½ feet of approach and the necessary dirt fills at each end of the bridge," the "entire bridge to be built in accordance with plans on file, and forming a part of this contract," for the sum of $3,964. The petition alleged: That on or about August 17, 1905, the county commissioners advertised that bids would be received by the county clerk up to noon of September 18, 1905, for the construction of a steel bridge across said creek. That plans and specifications for same were on file and subject to inspection in said clerk's office, etc. That on the 18th of September, before noon, plaintiff filed his bid in said office in accordance with the plans and specifications then on file, etc., and that on the same day the contract was awarded plaintiff by the commissioners, who entered a special resolution and order awarding the contract to plaintiff, and ordering the contract to be signed in duplicate by the county judge on the part of the county, which was done as above stated. Plaintiff alleged compliance with what the contract required in respect to a bond and deposit, and that he proceeded in accordance with the said plans, etc., on file in the clerk's office, and furnished the bridge in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner and fully according to said plans and specifications before the date fixed, when the county became liable to him for said contract price. That plaintiff tendered the bridge and demanded the price, which defendant refuses to pay. The petition contained further allegations, which sought to assert a builder's lien or title to the bridge, and, in the event the prayer for the contract price was for any reason not allowed, he asked for other relief. The answer contained a general denial. It pleaded specially that plans and specifications for the bridge were made for the county by Chas. E. Frees, which were approved and placed on file in the office of the county clerk; that said original plans, etc., upon which bids were invited and which were submitted to all those who bid, have disappeared from the clerk's office, and diligent search has failed to trace them; that the plaintiff on September 18, 1905, examined the same and prepared his bid and submitted same, which was accepted and the contract entered into; that the contract so entered into required a bridge to have a 16-foot roadway, piers, or cylinders 3 feet in diameter, flooring 8 inches thick, etc.; that the roadway, etc., were shown on the plans submitted by appellant for competitive bids, and that the bridge was not constructed by plaintiff in accordance with such plans, but, instead, was constructed with a 12-foot roadway and with materials of lighter weight and smaller dimensions; that on or about March 8, 1906, the commissioners' court entered an order reciting that "it having been brought to the attention of the court that there is evidently a discrepancy between the original plans and specifications for the San Isabel bridge bid upon by various contractors and the tracing now in the office of the county clerk, it was ordered by the court that Webb county refuse to receive said bridge as erected by M. S. Hasie, Jr., contractor, for the present, and that payment on his contract with Webb county for such construction be temporarily suspended." And on March 18, 1906, the following order which recited: "And it appearing to the court that said bridge has not been constructed in accordance with the plans and specifications furnished by this court, and upon which bids for the construction of said bridge were invited by this court and the contract awarded; it is therefore considered and decreed by the court that the said bridge be, and the same is hereby, rejected and the claim of M. S. Hasie, Jr., for the sum of $3,964 for the construction thereof is hereby in all things disapproved, and payment refused." Said original plans or drawings for which bids were invited and received and which were submitted to all the bidders have disappeared from the office of the county clerk, and cannot be found. "(4) And defendant further says that the disappearance of said plans occurred, as defendant is informed and believes, and so alleges, after plaintiff had examined the same and had submitted his bid and had made the contract sued on, and that they were removed from the office of the county clerk of Webb county at the instance of plaintiff fraudulently and for the purpose of carrying out a scheme, and to cheat and defraud the said county, and to enable plaintiff to construct and tender a structure to said county different in dimensions and of lighter and different materials from that contracted for; that, in the perpetration of such fraud, other and different plans with the knowledge of plaintiff were thereafter substituted and returned to the office of the county clerk of said county, instead of said original plans, without the knowledge or consent of said clerk or of any officer or agent of said county, or of any member of the commissioners' court of said county, which substituted plans have there remained ever since, but the said substituted plans have never been recognized or adopted by defendant in any manner, and are not the plans of the structure or bridge for which the said contract sued on was made. (5) Wherefore defendant says that it is not liable to plaintiff by reason of any of the matters alleged in his said petition; but, by reason of the fraud and fraudulent acts of plaintiff and his failure to perform his said contract, defendant has suffered damage, to wit, in the sum of $5,000; that, by reason of the frauds and failures aforesaid, the defendant has not been able to afford and provide for public use the convenient facilities for crossing the Santa Isabel creek, in Webb county, at a point where there is a great public necessity therefor; that the pretended structure is not adapted as would have been the structure contracted for, and defendant does not desire to open the same and make of it a highway, and defendant prays that it be discharged as to any liability alleged by plaintiff, and that it have judgment against plaintiff for its said damages and for costs of suit, and for such other and further relief as in law or equity may be deemed meet and proper."

The court, upon exceptions, struck out of clause 4 that part which read, "at the instance of plaintiff, fraudulently and for the purpose of carrying out a scheme and to cheat and defraud the said county, and to enable plaintiff to construct and tender a structure to said county different in dimensions and of lighter and different materials from that contracted for" "in the perpetration of such fraud," and out of clause 5 the words; "but, by reason of the fraud and fraudulent acts of plaintiff and his failure to perform the said contract, defendant has suffered damage in the sum of $5,000" and "frauds and." This action of the trial court is the subject of the first assignment of error. Appellant's proposition (as embodied in the first assignment) is that the allegations of the answer, in connection with what was stricken out, constituted sufficient allegation to warrant the admission of testimony of the fraudulent substitution of plans for the construction of a bridge, and the clause, "but, by reason of the fraud and fraudulent acts of plaintiff and his failure to perform his said contract, defendant has suffered damages, to wit, in the sum of $5,000," and also the clause "fraud and" in connection with the remaining allegations were sufficient to warrant the admission of testimony as to the amount of damages suffered through the fraudulent acts and failures of plaintiff. It appears to us to be unnecessary to investigate the sufficiency of the allegations or the merits of the proposition. It will be seen that the fraud undertaken to be alleged by the answer consisted in the fact that, when the contract was made, the plans on file were the original ones, and these were afterwards changed by substitution, by or with the knowledge of plaintiff, for fraudulent purposes. The plaintiff's case, as made by the petition, was that the plans, etc., referred to in the contract and on file when the contract was made, were those in accordance with which he had built the bridge; that, by reason of his having built it in accordance with same, he was entitled to be paid the contract price. Now the answer, as it remained, raised the issue as to what plans, etc., were then on file; that is, whether they were the originals or not. A finding that they were the originals, as the same were alleged by defendant, would have defeated plaintiff's recovery. That issue (which was the foundation of the allegations stricken out) remained was tried, and upon evidence sufficient to sustain a finding that the plans, etc., then on file were not said originals, but such as accorded with the work as done. There being no conclusions of the judge, all issues upon which there was evidence must be taken as resolved by the trial court in favor of the judgment. There being the issue whether or not the originals or other than the originals were on file when the contract was entered into, and this issue being litigated, it must be presumed that defendant adduced what evidence it had on the subject. Our conclusion is that, had the court not stricken out the clauses referred to, defendants would have been in no better position than they now are. The fact underlying the clauses would presumably have been litigated and resolved against defendant as was done at this trial, and therefore it appears that no harm has followed to defendant from the ruling.

The second assignment of error reads: "The court erred in admitting in evidence, over objection of defendant, the tracing of a plan for a bridge; the same not being a tracing of the plans which the commissioners' court had in mind when they solicited bids for the construction of a bridge over the Santa Ysabel creek, and there being no evidence showing that such tracing or plans from which the same was made had ever been filed in the office of the county clerk of Webb county, and because the said tracing was shown, by the evidence, to have been substituted for plans which the commissioners' court had adopted, and upon which bids had been solicited, and that such substitution had been accomplished without the knowledge or consent of any officer or agent of defendant or of any member of the commissioners' court, and that such substituted plans had never been recognized nor adopted by defendant in any manner, and were not the plans of the structure or the bridge for the erection of which bids were solicited, all as shown in defendant's bill of exceptions No. 1." Other testimony of the tracing was introduced without objection. In addition to this, we conclude that, as plaintiff had alleged that the plans, etc., on file when the contract was made were those in accordance with which the work was done, he was not required to prove more than that fact, and was clearly entitled to introduce any testimony which tended to show that fact. Our opinion is that the contract is by its terms to be construed as having reference to the plans then on file in the county clerk's office, as will be explained hereafter, and which disposes of the fifth and sixth assignments of error.

The qualification of the court to the bill of exceptions disposes of the third assignment; also the qualification to the bill which is the subject of the fourth assignment.

The proposition under the seventh assignment is "that appellant alleged facts fraudulent per se, viz., that a bridge had been constructed not in accordance with plans adopted by the commissioners' court, and, such facts having been proven, the law should not hold defendant liable." As we have already stated, the plans originally adopted may have been different from those existing in the clerk's office when the contract was executed, and which were made a part thereof, yet the county by its contract adopted those then on file, so far as the contract in question is concerned, and defendant is not wronged by being held to the performance of its contract.

The proposition under the eighth assignment is: "The facts alleged in defense and proven on the trial were fraudulent per se, viz., that a bridge was constructed not in accordance with plans adopted by the commissioners' court, and the evidence showing, or tending to show, that appellee was a party to such fraudulent acts, the law applicable to such issue requires that judgment be rendered for appellant. Inasmuch as there was evidence freeing plaintiff from any connection with the change of plans, or knowledge thereof, that issue, in so far as it affected the case, must be taken to have been determined by the trial judge in his favor.

The ninth assignment is that the court erred in not granting a new trial "because the plaintiff, having brought an action at law to recover strictly according to the terms of a written contract, and having failed to show a meeting of the minds in a contract to build a bridge of the dimensions as to width, cylinders, and materials of the bridge constructed by plaintiff, is not entitled to relief at law, and plaintiff is entitled to no relief under the pleadings, unless it be the equitable relief prayed for, viz., permission to remove and take away said bridge and materials." The testimony developed the fact that there was no mutual mistake as to what plans, etc., were intended as the subject-matter of the contract. The court was authorized by the testimony to find that the commissioners thought they were contracting with reference to other plans than those which the court may have found were on file at the time, and that they so intended, but may have found, also, that there was no mistake on the part of the plaintiff, or other intention on his part than to contract with reference to what was then on file. It must be taken by us in support of the judgment that the court thus resolved the facts. This would bring the case within the rule announced in May v. Townsite Co., 83 Tex. 505, 18 S. W. 959. There was ample testimony to support a finding that plaintiff was guilty of no fraud, and the fact the court must be presumed to have found also.

Under the tenth assignment the proposition is that the county clerk did not have authority to exhibit other plans than those adopted by the commissioners' court, and, if he did exhibit other plans, his act was not binding on appellant. The testimony would sustain a finding that within the time in which bids were to be received, to wit, before noon of the 18th of September, plaintiff for the first time came to Laredo, went to the clerk's office where the advertisement directed him to go for the inspection of the plans, and that he then and there went over the same with the clerk and formulated his bid thereon which went in, and was accepted by the court and the contract executed under appropriate orders, and that, if the plans had been changed or substituted, plaintiff had no knowledge of it, and that neither party had knowledge or suspicion of it until about when the work had been completed in good faith by plaintiff and in accordance with the plans on file when the bid was formed and the contract made. The county was authorized by article 4792, Rev. St. 1895, to cause all necessary bridges to be built. We find no statute restraining the exercise of this power so that the county could not be said to be without power or capacity to enter into a contract with regard to plans then on file, or without power to contract other than for a bridge according to plans they originally adopted. There being no question of power or legal capacity to contract, the question resolves itself simply to one of contract. Sexton v. Chicago, 107 Ill. 323.

There is no proposition presented under the eleventh assignment.

The judgment is affirmed, but without damages for delay.

TAYLOR v. READ.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 14, 1908.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 174*)—APPEAL—AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

Plaintiff having sued in justice court on a contract, whereby it was agreed that he should receive a specified commission for selling land, an amendment in the county court, declaring upon a contract made between defendant and a partnership, in which plaintiff was a member, set up a new cause of action, within Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 358, prohibiting plaintiff from setting up a new cause of action on appeal from justice court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 670; Dec. Dig. § 174.*]

2. BROKERS (§ 63*)—TERMS OF SALE—BROKER'S AUTHORITY.

A broker, employed to sell land for one-half cash and balance on credit, cannot recover a commission on the owner refusing to consummate a sale for all cash, unless the term of credit required to be extended was so short as to make it, in effect, a cash payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 95; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

3. BROKERS (§ 88*)—ACTION FOR COMMISSION—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for a broker's commission, an instruction that, if defendant told plaintiff or his partner to take the land off the market, and that it was not for sale, to find for defendant was improperly refused, though the court instructed, in a general way, that plaintiff could not recover if defendant had withdrawn authority to sell.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 121-127; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

Appeal from Brown County Court; A. M. Brumfield, Judge.

Action by T. A. Read against L. H. Taylor. From a judgment of the county court for plaintiff, on appeal from justice court, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Arch Grinnan, for appellant.

FISHER, C. J. This is a suit by Read against Taylor, originally brought in the justice's court, for the sum of $146.20, in which court Read recovered judgment. Upon appeal by appellant to the county court, judgment was there rendered in Read's favor for the amount sued for.

Plaintiff, in his pleadings in the justice's court, alleged as his cause of action "that under a contract with defendant, plaintiff sold his farm in Brown county, Tex., on which defendant lived, on or about August 1, 1906, the understanding and agreement being that plaintiff was to receive a commission of 5 per cent. for selling said farm"; then goes on to allege the amount he would be entitled to under this agreement. When the case reached the county court, plaintiff there amended his pleading, and relied upon and alleged the following as his cause of action: "Plaintiff, T. A. Read, alleges that on or about August 1, 1905, he and one W. D. Woodruff were partners in the business of selling land for commission; that on or about said day and year above mentioned the said defendant, L. A. Taylor, listed and contracted with the plaintiff to sell his said lands, consisting of two tracts, to wit, the home tract of 172 acres and the lower place of 349 acres, said land being situated near Bangs, in Brown county, Tex., and agreed to pay plaintiff a commission of 5 per cent. in case of sale. Plaintiff, acting under said listment or contract of sale, on or about August 1, 1906, sold defendant's home place of 172 acres for the sum of $2,974, the price at which same was listed. Plaintiff alleges that in the winter and spring of 1906 he and the said Woodruff dissolved their said co-partnership, and the plaintiff acquired all the rights and interest of the said Woodruff in said land agency, and that he is now, and at the time of filing this suit, the sole owner of the above claim and cause of action." The defendant in the county court filed and presented a special demurrer to this amendment, on the ground that it asserted a new cause of action; or, in other words, that the cause of action there asserted was different from that relied on by the plaintiff in the justice's court. The court overruled this demurrer, and under the assignments of errors, this ruling is the first question to be disposed of. The substantial effect of the pleading of the plaintiff in the justice court is to allege a cause of action or contract between the appellant and the plaintiff in his individual capacity, and not with the firm of Read & Woodruff. The cause of action asserted by the plaintiff in the amendment filed in the county court substantially declared upon a contract between Read & Woodruff and appellant. It is clear from the statement made in this amendment that at the time the contract was made Read & Woodruff were partners in the land business, and Woodruff had an interest in the same as a partner, and subsequently upon dissolution, assigned this interest to Read.

There is a vast difference in a contract made with one as an individual and with the firm of which he may be a member, and there can be no sort of question that if he had sued upon a contract made with him as an individual, and it had been developed by the evidence that it was made with the firm of which he was a member, the variance would be fatal. Without further discussing the question, we are of the opinion that the amendment set up a new cause of action, and that the trial court erred in overruling appellant's special exception. Bingham v. Talbot, 63 Tex. 273; Lutterloh v. McIlhenney Co., 74 Tex. 73, 11 S. W. 1063; Letot v. Edens (Tex. Civ. App.) 49 S. W. 109; Stewart v. Gordon, 65 Tex. 344. Article 353, Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, provides that either party may plead any new matter in the county or district court which was not presented in the court below, but no new cause of action shall be set up by the plaintiff, nor shall any set-off or counterclaim be set up by the defendant which was not pleaded in the court below. This article is embraced in the chapter or title that refers to and relates to certiorari, but it is held in Harrold v. Barwise, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 138, 30 S. W. 498, Gholston v. Ramey (Tex. Civ. App.) 30 S. W. 713, and in other cases, that this provision of the statute applies as well to cases appealed from the justice's court as it does to cases taken up by certiorari.

We are also of the opinion that there is merit in appellant's second assignment of error. He requested, in writing the trial court, to instruct the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that the defendant employed the plaintiff to sell the land for one-half cash and the balance on time, and that the plaintiff did not so sell the same, but sold for an all cash consideration, and defendant refused to consummate the sale, they will find for defendant. There was evidence upon the trial which justified this instruction. In fact the evidence of both parties is to the effect that the agreement was that the land should be sold for one-half cash and the balance on time, and the evidence is to the effect that the terms of the sale as agreed upon between appellee Read and the prospective purchaser called for a cash consideration. It is the right of the owner of the land to prescribe the terms upon which it may be sold; and, when he directs the agent to sell on credit, or partly on credit, the latter has no power or right to depart from this instruction, and if he does so, the owner can decline to consummate the sale. The fact that the agent can procure the entire consideration in cash does not justify him in violating the instructions of the owner, for it may be to the advantage of the owner to invest the consideration in a vendor's interest-bearing paper, and the agent is powerless to substitute his judgment or discretion in this matter for that of the owner. There may be such an immaterial departure from the instructions or the terms under which he is authorized to sell as would justify the conduct of the agent in failing to literally observe them. The evidence does not inform us as to the length of time credit was to be extended, and we cannot say, from the facts upon this subject, that the time of the maturity was so short as to make it equivalent to a cash payment. In other words, if the time of the credit was merely fixed at the same day upon which the transaction occurred, or the next day, it might be regarded as of such a short period as not to materially affect the rights of the seller; but in the nature of things, and in accordance with the usual course of transactions of this character, we can safely assume that the credit was not to be extended for such a short period, but was evidently for a longer time. But, however this may be, this question will be further developed upon another trial.

It would be proper for the trial court to give the instruction requested as set out in the fourth assignment of error. The court did, in a general way, instruct the jury that the plaintiff could not recover if he had withdrawn the authority of the agent to make the sale. The charge requested, and which was refused, was a direct instruction to the effect that if the defendant informed either Read or his partner Woodruff to take the land off the market, and that the same was not for sale, to find for the defendant. There was evidence to support this instruction. The plaintiff testified that such direction was given before the sale was made to the prospective purchaser.

In disposing of the fifth assignment of error it is sufficient to say that the trial court did instruct the jury specifically to the effect that, in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover, the sale must be made within a reasonable time after the contract was entered into by the defendant, and left to the jury the question as to what would be a reasonable time.

The sixth assignment of error raises a question of fact proper to be passed upon by the jury.

The questions of fact raised in the seventh, eighth, and ninth assignments will be passed upon on another trial, the reversal having afforded the appellant the opportunity to procure the evidence which he stated, in his motion for new trial, that he could procure on another trial.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

SULLIVAN v. BITTER et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 14, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. TAXATION (§ 467*)—ASSESSMENT—BOARD OF EQUALIZATION—JURISDICTION.

Under Rev. St. 1895, tit. 104, c. 3, providing the method of making tax assessments, the commissioners' court, sitting as a board of equalization, has no power to assess property for taxes; such authority, save in exceptional cases, being vested in the county assessors.

3. TAXATION (§ 317*)—ASSESSMENT—NECESSITY.

An assessment of property for taxes by the properly constituted authority is essential to support a tax.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 317.*]

4. TAXATION (§ 467*)—BOARD OF EQUALIZATION—PROPERTY NOT LISTED AND VALUED.

In the absence of statutory authority, a board of equalization cannot assess property not listed and valued by the assessor.

5. TAXATION (§ 467*)—BOARD OF EQUALIZATION.

Rev. St. 1895, art. 5124, as amended by Acts 1907, p. 459, c. 11, provides that the board of equalization shall supervise the assessment of their respective counties, and, if satisfied that the valuation of any property is not in accordance with law, increase or diminish it, and affix a proper valuation of the same, and that, when the assessor shall furnish the commissioners' court with the rendition as provided in article 5123, it shall be the court's duty to hear evidence and fix the value of the property in accordance therewith. Held, that a board of equalization has no power to add to the rolls property not previously assessed, nor to take from the rolls property contained therein.

6. TAXATION (§ 609*)—BOARD OF EQUALIZATION—VOID ACTS—INJUNCTION—OTHER RELIEF.

The addition of alleged omitted property to plaintiff's assessment by a board of equalization being void, he was not required to show that he had applied to the board for relief in order to have the assessment of such property annulled, and the collection of the tax enjoined.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; J. L. Camp, Judge.

Suit by Daniel Sullivan against John A. Bitter and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Newton & Ward, for appellant. T. J. Newton, for appellees.

NEILL, J. This suit was brought by the appellant against P. H. Shook, county judge of Bexar county, D. M. Poor, D. A. Meyer, Frank Sommers, and W. C. Kroeger, county commissioners of Bexar county, in their capacity as board of equalization, and John A. Bitter, as tax collector of said county, for the purpose of obtaining a decree against the five parties first named, in their capacity of such board of equalization, to set aside, annul, and declare void an order alleged to have been made by said county judge and county commissioners adding to the sum of money assessed by the tax assessor of Bexar county for state and county taxes the further sum of $230,000, and assessing such additional sum for such taxes against the plaintiff, and against John A. Bitter for an injunction restraining him from collecting the taxes alleged to have been assessed upon said additional sum of money. Exceptions were interposed by defendants to plaintiff's first amended petition, and, upon his declining further to amend, final judgment was entered dismissing his petition and denying him the relief prayed for. From which judgment, this appeal is prosecuted.

Plaintiff's first amended petition is as follows:

"In this cause now comes the plaintiff, leave of the court first being had and obtained, and files this, his first amended original petition, in lieu of his original petition filed herein on January 15, 1908, and for amendment doth say:

"First. That plaintiff resides in the city of San Antonio, in Bexar county, Tex. That the defendants are all citizens of the county of Bexar and state of Texas and reside therein. That P. H. Shook is county judge of Bexar county, Tex., and that D. M. Poor, D. A. Meyer, Frank Sommers, and W. C. Kroeger are county commissioners of said Bexar county, Tex., and, together with said county judge, constitute the commissioners' court of said Bexar county, Tex. That John A. Bitter is the tax collector of Bexar county, Tex.

"Second. That plaintiff has for a long time resided in the city of San Antonio, Bexar county, Tex., and has conducted a business under the name of D. Sullivan & Co., a partnership composed of plaintiff, D. Sullivan, and W. C. Sullivan, and has heretofore and up to and including the year 1907 always rendered all property owned by him, as well as the property of said D. Sullivan & Co., for assessment for taxes in the name of D. Sullivan & Co., and for the year 1907, acting by J. C. Sullivan, rendered all his property for assessment for taxes to Albert V. Huth, assessor of Bexar county, state of Texas; said rendition for assessment being made on or about the 24th day of April, A. D. 1907, and was accepted by said Albert V. Huth, so plaintiff is reliably informed and believes.

"Third. That thereafter, the exact date of which is not known to plaintiff, the said Albert V. Huth, tax assessor of Bexar county, assessed to this plaintiff individually on the unrendered rolls the sum of twenty thousand (20,000) dollars under the head 'Money on Hand, Credits, etc.' That said assessor in making said assessment knew, and had known for a number of years, that all of plaintiff's property had been assessed in the name of D. Sullivan & Co., and, in the rendition of property in the name of D. Sullivan & Co., there had been assessed to said D. Sullivan & Co. the sum of twenty-five thousand (25,000) dollars, amount of moneys on hand or on deposit in or out of the state with banks, trust companies, corporations, firms, or individuals, and subject to order by check or draft, including certificates of deposit, January 1, 1907, subject to taxation, which assessment plaintiff is reliably informed and believes had been accepted by the said Albert V. Huth.

"Fourth. That thereafter the said commissioner's court assembled as a board of equalization, as required and authorized by law so to do, and thereafter, on August 22, 1907, said board of equalization added to said assessment made by the said Albert V. Huth of unrendered property of twenty thousand (20,000) dollars the sum of two hundred and thirty thousand (230,000) dollars. That under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Texas the said board of equalization has not now, and did not have at the time of the addition to said assessment, authority to add to or take from an assessment made by the assessor or an individual accepted by the assessor any property; their rights and duties under the law being confined to the raising or decreasing of values of property already assessed. That, in adding said sum of two hundred and thirty thousand (230,000) dollars to said assessment so made by the said Albert V. Huth, the said board of equalization, aside from acting without authority of law, acted capriciously and arbitrarily, without seeking or obtaining any evidence to support their action.

"Fifth. And plaintiff would further aver that said assessment is void, for this: That there is no description of the property attempted to be assessed, and no statement as to how much money and how much credits were so assessed and what the 'et cetera' in said assessments mean.

"Sixth. That the rate of taxation fixed by the said county and state for the year 1907 is and was 72½ cents on each $100 of assessed valuation. That the amount of the tax, both state and county, on the $20,000 so assessed by the said Albert V. Huth, tax assessor, is $145. That the amount of the tax unlawfully added to plaintiff's assessment by said commissioners' court is and was the sum of $1,667.50.

"Seventh. Plaintiff would further aver that he has tendered to the said John A. Bitter, tax collector of Bexar county, the sum of $145, the amount of taxes due on the assessment of $20,000 so made by the said Albert V. Huth, but that the said Bitter has refused and still refuses to accept the same, and which said amount he has deposited and now deposits as a continuing tender in the registry of this court.

"Eighth. Plaintiff would further aver that under the law, unless said taxes are paid on or before January 31, 1908, the same become in default, and a penalty of 10 per cent. will be added thereto, and that, in addition thereto, the said collector is authorized to seize and sell plaintiff's property in satisfaction of said unlawful taxes, and, in addition thereto, he is reliably informed and believes that it is made the duty of the county attorney to institute suits to collect the same which would greatly harass and embarrass plaintiff and cause him to expend large sums of money in the defense thereof. That, by reason thereof, he has no adequate remedy at law to protect himself from the unlawful and capricious action of said commissioners' court in adding to the said assessment so made by said Huth the said sum of $230,000.

"Wherefore, premises considered, plaintiff prays that the order of said commissioners' court sitting as a board of equalization in adding to said assessment the said sum of $230,000 be declared void, and for your honors' most gracious writ of injunction to compel the said John A. Bitter, tax collector, to accept the said amount of $145, paid into court, in full of his taxes for the year 1907, and perpetually enjoining him from collecting the said sum of $1,667.50 increase of taxes caused by the void order of said board as aforesaid, and for costs and general and special relief."

The defendants' exceptions to the petition are as follows:

"First. Now come the defendants in the above-entitled and numbered cause and except to plaintiff's first amended original petition filed herein, and say that the same is insufficient in law, in that the facts therein stated are insufficient to entitle plaintiff to the relief prayed for, no valid ground for the exercise of the equitable jurisdiction of this court by the writ of injunction prayed for being alleged; and, further, because the allegations in plaintiff's petition contained do not constitute a cause of action against these defendants. Wherefore defendants pray judgment of this court as to the sufficiency of said petition to entitle plaintiff to the relief prayed for.

"Second. And, should the foregoing demurrer be overruled, then these defendants deny each and every allegation in plaintiff's first amended petition contained, and of this they put themselves upon the country."

We are of the opinion that the court erred in sustaining the exceptions and dismissing plaintiff's petition. The commissioners' court sitting as a board of equalization has no power under the law to assess property for taxes. The authority to assess property, save in exceptional cases, is vested in the assessor of taxes of the several counties of the state, and the method of making such assessments is plainly pointed out by statute. See title 104, c. 3, Rev. St. 1895. "An assessment of necessity involves at least two things, to wit, a listing of the property to be taxed in some form, and an estimation of the sums which are to be a guide in the apportionment of the tax." Cooley on Taxation (4th Ed.) 596. An assessment by the properly constituted authority is absolutely essential to support a tax. Galusha v. Wendt, 114 Iowa, 604, 87 N. W. 512; Judy v. National Bank, 133 Iowa, 252, 110 N. W. 608. In the absence of a statute authorizing it, a board of equalization cannot assess property not listed and valued by the assessor. Cooley on Taxation, 776, 777. In this state such board "has no power to add to the rolls property not previously assessed or to take from them property which they embrace." See article 5124, Rev. St. 1895, as amended by Acts 1907, p. 459, c. 11; Davis v. Burnett, 77 Tex. 4, 13 S. W. 613; Galveston County v. Gas Co., 72 Tex. 509, 10 S. W. 583; San Antonio St. Ry. v. City of San Antonio, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 341, 54 S. W. 907; 1 Cooley on Taxation, 777. The addition and assessment of the $230,000 by the board of equalization was absolutely void, and it was not necessary for the plaintiff to show that he had applied to such board for relief in order to have such illegal assessment annulled and the collection of the tax enjoined. Davis v. Burnett, 77 Tex. 4, 13 S. W. 613; Court v. O'Connor, 65 Tex. 384; George v. Dean, 47 Tex. 73; Bank v. Rogers, 51 Tex. 606; S. W. Teleg. & Tel. Co. v. City of San Antonio, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 101, 73 S. W. 859; Johnson v. Holland, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 210, 43 S. W. 71; Schmidt v. G., H. & S. A. Ry. Co. (Tex. Civ. App.) 24 S. W. 547; 2 Cooley on Taxation, 1414; High on Inj. § 494. Where the facts alleged in a petition show that the plaintiff is entitled to the equitable relief prayed for, it is not necessary for him to allege that he has no adequate remedy at law; for this is merely a conclusion drawn from the matters pleaded.

The judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

SISK et al. v. GRAVITY CANAL CO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 21, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 254*)—IRRIGATION — CONTRACTS — DUTY TO DELIVER WATER ON LAND.

Under the contract of plaintiff, an irrigation company, with defendants, lessees of land from L., to use its best endeavors to furnish enough water through its canals and laterals to properly irrigate the land, in the absence of any understanding or agreement that it was defendants' duty to furnish laterals to connect the land with the canal, or to keep the lateral of L. in repair, it was the duty of plaintiff to furnish facilities for delivering the water on the land; and it was not enough to turn it into the lateral of L., insufficient from defects and want of repair to take it to the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 311; Dec. Dig. § 254.*]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 261*)—IRRIGATION — DAMAGES FROM INSUFFICIENT SUPPLY.

The evidence showing that defendants planted their land to rice; that it came up to a good stand; that all except 35 acres of it died because of failure to receive water at the proper time; that the land, if properly watered, would have made from 15 to 20 sacks of rice per acre; and that the loss, without fault on defendants' part, was caused by plaintiff's breach of its contract to furnish the water necessary for cultivation of the crop—they are entitled to recover all damages sustained.

Appeal from Matagorda County Court; Jesse Matthews, Judge.

Action by the Gravity Canal Company against O. L. J. Sisk and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

W. C. Carpenter and J. W. Conger, for appellants. Gaines & Corbett, for appellee.

RICE, J. In 1904 appellants rented from Lewis & Robertson a certain tract of land in Matagorda county, Tex., shown to contain 128½ acres, for the purpose of engaging in rice culture, which tract of land was situated about one-half mile from the canal of appellee, and no part thereof bordered thereon. During the spring of said year appellants made a written contract with appellee, an irrigation company engaged in the business of furnishing water for growing rice in said county, to supply them with sufficient water for the cultivation of a crop of rice, to be grown by them on said land during said year, by which contract appellee agreed to use its best endeavors to furnish a sufficient quantity of water through its canals and laterals, in addition to the natural rainfall, to properly irrigate the rice planted by appellants on said land, and appellants, in consideration of the performance of said obligation on the part of appellee, promised to pay, as full compensation for the water so furnished, one-fifth of the rice grown on said land. It was shown from the evidence that appellants in due season planted all of said land to rice, obtaining a good and sufficient stand thereon, and that during the growing season appellee failed to furnish and deliver upon said land a sufficient quantity of water, as occasion required, for the proper irrigation of said crop, by reason of which the rice so planted and growing died out, except about 35 acres thereof, upon which a crop was grown and harvested. Appellants having failed to pay the appellee any portion of the crop so raised on the 35 acres, the latter brought this suit in its original petition for the recovery of 200 sacks of rice, alleging same, in its original petition, to be one-fifth of said crop, and of the value of $2 per sack, or, in case it could not be found, then for its value, to wit, $400, setting up said contract, and alleging a compliance therewith. Defendants filed their answer, admitting the execution of the contract, but alleged a breach thereof by plaintiff, pleading in reconvention, for damages sustained by them thereby, in the sum of $800. On a trial plaintiff failed to recover, but defendants obtained verdict and judgment against it on their plea in reconvention for the sum of $600, from which an appeal was taken to the Court of Civil Appeals of the First District, and will be found reported in 95 S. W. 724, 15 Tex. Ct. Rep. 984, where the judgment of the court below was reversed and remanded; but, as that decision does not affect the questions arising upon this appeal, it will not be necessary to consider the rulings there made, except as hereinafter noticed. After the case was reversed, the parties amended their pleadings in the court below. The amendment on the part of plaintiff consisted chiefly in suing for the value of a less number of sacks than in its original petition, to wit, for 61 sacks of rice, valued at $3 per sack. Defendants again answered substantially as before by admitting the execution of the contract, and setting up plaintiff's breach thereof in failing to furnish the water required under its contract, with a prayer in reconvention for damages at the rate of $4 per acre for 128½ acres of said land planted by them to rice. Upon a jury trial plaintiff recovered a verdict against the defendants for $79.60, for which judgment was entered, and from which this appeal is prosecuted.

Appellants assign error on the giving by the court, at the instance of appellee, of the following charge to the jury: "At the request of plaintiff you are charged that the undisputed evidence shows that the plaintiff had no control over the lateral through which the defendants were to receive water, and that such lateral belonged to the landlord of defendants, and was under the control of such landlord, or his tenants, and that the contract made between plaintiff and the defendants provided only for the furnishing of water through the canals and laterals owned by the plaintiff. You are therefore instructed that, if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff had at all times a sufficient quantity of water in its canals and laterals adjacent to the lateral owned by the landlord of the defendants to properly irrigate the land of defendants, and that the defendants could have obtained sufficient water at any time, but that, by reason of the condition of the lateral or of the flume across the lateral owned by the defendants' landlord, the defendants failed to procure a sufficient quantity of water to irrigate the land cultivated by them, and that such failure was not the fault of the plaintiff, then you are instructed to find against the defendant on his cross-bill; and you will also find for the plaintiff the value of one-fifth of the rice grown by defendants on the land cultivated by them during said year." By their second proposition under said assignment appellants contend that the contract between them bound appellee to furnish water through its canals and laterals to irrigate the land cultivated by defendants, and that, there being no evidence to show any understanding, express or implied, that plaintiff should not be held liable for its failure on account of defects in the Lewis & Robertson lateral, the charge was erroneous in instructing the jury that plaintiff was not liable. And by their third proposition under said assignment they urge that, as plaintiff had bound itself to furnish water through its canals and laterals to irrigate defendants' land, and there being no understanding between them about conveying it through the Lewis & Robertson lateral, it was plaintiff's duty to build a lateral of its own, through which to convey the water.

It will be seen from the contract above referred to that plaintiff bound itself to use its best endeavors to furnish water through its canals and laterals which, together with the natural rainfall, should be sufficient to properly irrigate the defendants' land planted to rice. When appellants rented the land in question from Lewis & Robertson, it is shown that there was no agreement concerning the furnishing of water for irrigating same; Lewis remarking that the canal company was bound to furnish it. It does not appear from the evidence that when the contract sued upon was made, there was any other or different understanding than the one contained therein relative to how the water should be furnished by the canal company, nor is it shown by what means the canal company should deliver the water upon the land, nor was there any understanding relative to the Lewis & Robertson lateral. And, while it appears from the evidence that the land is about a half mile from the canal, and that, at the time the land was rented by appellants from Lewis & Robertson, there was a lateral extending from appellee's canal to this tract of land, still it is not shown that appellants had any knowledge of it, nor that they knew who owned or controlled it, nor that the canal company expected to deliver water through said lateral. While it is shown that the canal company, at all times during the season, had plenty of water in its canal to have watered the land in question, and that the failure to furnish a sufficient quantity to water appellants' crop was due to a leaky flume across a creek between the canal and appellants' tract of land, by reason of which much of the water was wasted before reaching the same, and that the Lewis & Robertson lateral was in bad repair, still there is nothing in the evidence to show, or tend to show, that there was any agreement, at the time of the execution of said contract, on the part of appellants, binding themselves to repair the same. This being the state of the record, it seems to us that the only question for our determination is whether or not the contract in evidence required plaintiff to use its best endeavors to actually deliver the water upon the land in question, or whether it could be held to have complied therewith by simply showing that the Lewis & Robertson laterals were leaky and out of repair, and that it had at all times plenty of water within its canal to water said crop. Recurring again to the contract upon which this suit must stand or fall, it will be seen that its provisions required plaintiff to use its best endeavors to furnish a sufficient quantity of water through its canals and laterals, in addition to the natural rainfall, to properly irrigate the rice planted by the defendants on the lands described therein. It therefore seems immaterial to us in the construction of this contract to determine whether appellee owned, or did not own or control, the Lewis & Robertson lateral, if in fact it was their duty to have furnished the water by delivering the same upon the land in question.

A similar question to the one here involved has been considered and determined in a Louisiana case, wherein a canal company sued for the recovery of water rents upon a certain tract of land, planted to rice by defendants under a contract which, as in this case, failed to specify whether or not the water was to be delivered upon the land to be irrigated, the court holding that "the question of the place of delivery was one which was entirely within the control of the parties; but, in the absence of any convention or particular agreement, it seems to us that the obligation rested upon the plaintiff to make the delivery at such a point, within or upon the borders of the land to be irrigated, as to enable the defendants to utilize it with the greatest facility and at the least expense." The same doctrine is stated with approval in Farnham on Waters and Water Rights, vol. 3, p. 1920. In the absence of any understanding or agreement between the parties indicating that it was the duty of appellants to furnish laterals to connect their land with the canal of appellee, or to keep the lateral of Lewis & Robertson in repair, so as to receive and discharge waters from said canal upon their land, we are inclined to believe that it was the duty of appellee, under its contract, to use its best endeavors to deliver the water upon the premises in question in sufficient quantities to enable defendants to irrigate their crop of rice growing upon said tract of land; and, if at the time of the execution of said contract they had not facilities for so delivering said water, it became their duty to provide the same, and a failure so to do was a breach of their contract in this respect, subjecting them to liability therefor. We therefore hold that the trial court erred in giving the charge complained of.

We do not believe the views here expressed are in conflict with the former opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals of the First District in this case. It is true that said court remarked that the contract under consideration did not in express terms require plaintiff to provide the means of conveying the water to the land leased by defendants, but this statement was only made incidentally, and in connection with their ruling upon the offer, on the part of appellee herein, to show that appellants had a contract with their landlord, by which he obligated himself to keep in repair the laterals connecting the land rented by them with appellee's canal; and that the contract between appellee and appellants only contemplated that plaintiff should furnish water to defendants through this lateral, and therefore the question of the construction of the contract was not properly before the court, nor did the court undertake to say what was or could be implied from the terms of said contract.

By their second and fifth assignments of error appellants urge that the court erred in overruling defendants' motion for new trial, because the verdict of the jury was contrary to the evidence, in that the evidence showed that defendants were damaged in a sum largely in excess of $4 per acre on the land cultivated by them, by reason of the failure of plaintiff to furnish the water necessary for the cultivation of said crop of rice, as it was bound to do under said contract. It appears from the evidence that the crop was planted by defendants, that it came up to a good stand, and that all except 35 acres thereof died on account of a failure to receive water at the proper time. It is further shown under the evidence that said land would have made, if it had received sufficient water in time, from 15 to 20 sacks of rice per acre. We, therefore, think that appellants are right in this contention, and sustain these assignments because they, having been damaged without any fault on their part on account of the breach of the contract by appellee, were entitled to recover whatever damages they may have sustained, if any, not to exceed $4 per acre, however, upon the land planted to rice, and the court erred in refusing to grant them a new trial.

For the errors indicated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

1. RAILROADS (§ 282*)—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON OR ABOUT TRACKS—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that if plaintiff caught and held on to a moving train, and while doing so fell under the wheels and was injured, and if defendant's employes knew that plaintiff had caught and was holding on to the train, and if plaintiff was incapable, by reason of his age, of appreciating the danger, then to find for plaintiff, was erroneous, as withdrawing from the jury the issue of whether, if any warning had been given or effort made to prevent the injury it would have been availing, and making defendant's liability conclusive if, under the other circumstances submitted in the instruction, any of the employes knew that plaintiff had caught and was holding on to the train.

Appeal from District Court, Dallam County; J. N. Browning, Judge.

Action by Aaron Cushman, by next friend, against the Ft. Worth & Denver City Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Spoons, Thompson & Barwise, J. M. Chambers, and D. B. Hill, for appellant. Stephens & Miller and Hyde & Stalcup, for appellee.

CONNOR, C. J. This suit was instituted by the father of Aaron Cushman, as next friend, for damages to his said son, a minor, about eight years old. It was alleged that Aaron Cushman had one of his feet cut off by one of appellant's trains on a transfer track in Dalhart, Tex., and it was charged that appellant was guilty of negligence in permitting children to play on its right of way, to ride on its cars while switching and moving, and in failing to keep a watchman in the switchyards, etc. The defense consisted of pleas of denial and pleas of contributory negligence.

Briefly stated, the evidence shows that the line of appellant's railway at the point in question extends from the southeast to the northwest; that the Chicago & Rock Island Railway extends from the northeast to the southwest, crossing appellant's line at about a right angle; that from a point on the Rock Island Railway, some distance south of the crossing of the two lines, a transfer track extends in a semicircle north and west to a connection with the Ft. Worth & Denver north of said crossing, this transfer track being about half a mile in length; that Aaron Cushman, then a child of about six years of age, together with three or four other small boys, ranging from eight to twelve years old, was sitting near what is designated in the testimony as the "ice-house"; that this icehouse is on the east side of the Rock Island Railway, south of the crossing of the two railways and a short distance north of the south end of said transfer track; that this transfer track was used for the purpose of transferring cars from one line of railway to the other, and on the occasion in question one of appellant's train crews was engaged in so transferring a number of cars that were standing on the southern end of the transfer track. The testimony shows that a brakeman was standing on the south end of the string of cars and another located about the center of the train. The engineer testifies that, as he came down from the Ft. Worth & Denver track to get the cars, he saw the little boys about the icehouse, but that after coupling on to the train and proceeding back toward the Ft. Worth & Denver main line he soon passed out of their vision. The evidence further indicates that several, perhaps all, of the little boys, including Aaron Cushman, left their position at the icehouse and ran across to the transfer track, some 20 feet away, and boarded the moving train. Some of the boys clung to ladders, but Aaron Cushman grasped some slight projection in the open doorway of one of the cars, and swung his feet to and upon a supporting rod extending from the front to the back end of the car, and, after riding a short distance in this position, he slipped and fell off, as he testified, and had one of his feet severed. He testified that he had ridden but some 5 or 6 steps, but there was other testimony indicating that he had perhaps ridden to a point about 90 feet from the appellant's main line. Aaron testified that at the time he got upon the car, as stated, it was going slow enough to enable him by running along the side to get upon it, but that a little later it began to go more rapidly, when he slipped and fell off. The approach of the boys to the train was on the convex side of the curve, and out of view of the fireman, and of the engineer, as he testifies, and perhaps of the middle brakeman; the testimony showing that this brakeman was sitting on top of one of the cars about the center of the train on the western or concave side of the train. Neither of the brakemen testified upon the trial, but appellant's car foreman, Osborne, testified that at the time the boy was hurt he was "something like 90 feet away from him," that he did not see the boy at the time he fell off, but saw him as he was struggling to get up from the ground. The testimony of this witness also develops that one Scott, one of appellant's track walkers, was also there working with Osborne, and it does not appear that Scott testifies. There was also testimony tending to show that for several years the transfer track and adjacent grounds were frequented by little boys of the town, which was practically bisected by appellant's line of railway, and that it was a very common occurrence for them to ride moving trains and play upon the cars, and there was evidence that no watchman had been stationed at the playground in question, and that no objection to this practice had been made. The country was level and the view generally unobstructed.

The court, after giving definitions of negligence and contributory negligence, and after defining appellant's duty to exercise ordinary care to avoid injury to children in the habit of playing upon and riding moving cars, if the jury found there was such custom, the court further gave the following charge, which is objected to: "Bearing in mind the foregoing definitions and instructions, if you believe and find from the evidence that the plaintiff, Aaron Cushman, at the time and place alleged in his petition, caught and held on to a moving train then and there being operated by the servants and employes of defendant, and while so holding on to said moving train he fell under the wheels of the moving cars, and received the injuries complained of, and you further find from the evidence that the servants and employes operating said train, or any of them, knew that the plaintiff had or would catch and hold on to said moving train, and if you further find and believe that the plaintiff at that time was incapable, by reason of his age, to understand and appreciate the danger incident to his catching and holding on to said moving train, then and in such case, if you so find and believe, you will find for the plaintiff, and assess his damages as hereinafter directed. If you do not so find and believe from the evidence, you will find for the defendant." It seems apparent without discussion that the clause of the charge quoted is subject to the objection urged, "that it authorized a verdict for plaintiff for his injuries, regardless of whether or not such injuries resulted from any negligence on the part of defendant or its employes." It is evident that the court made appellant's liability conclusive if under the other circumstances submitted in the charge any of the employes operating the train "knew that the plaintiff had or would catch and hold on to said moving train." The evidence perhaps raises the inference that one or more of the operatives of the train either did or might in the exercise of ordinary care have seen the boys after they left the icehouse with the evident purpose of getting upon the train, and, if any halt in the movement of the train, any warning or other thing to avoid injury to the boys was done, it was not developed in the evidence, but nevertheless it was for the jury, and not the court, to say whether any warning or effort under the circumstances would have availed. In other words, a necessary element of plaintiff's recovery was negligence on appellant's part proximately causing the final result, and the charge manifestly took this issue from the jury, because of which the judgment must be reversed.

Appellant further insists with much force that the evidence conclusively shows that it was not guilty of any negligence, and that the judgment, therefore, should be reversed and here rendered against appellee. The subject of a railway's duty to trespassing children has been so frequently and variously discussed in adjudicated cases that it seems profitless to review the decisions or attempt to draw distinctions available here. In many cases it has been held that it is not the duty of a railway company to guard its cars against them. See 3 Elliott on Railways, § 1260, and authorities cited in note 116, and appellant cites in support of its contention the case of St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. v. Davis (recently decided by the Court of Civil Appeals for the Sixth District) 110 S. W. 939. Every case, however, we think must depend for the most part on its own peculiar circumstances. Many authorities, and, as we think, the better reason, always require those engaged in a dangerous business to at least exercise ordinary care in conducting such business to avoid loss of life or limb of a trespasser even when a reasonable probability of such injury is known, or where in the exercise of ordinary care it would have been known; and we think that such rule is unquestionably to be applied in the protection of a trespassing child of such tender years as to be devoid of discretion, and that might be reasonably contemplated to act upon the childish impulse to assume a position of danger. Railway Co. v. Abernathy, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 613, 68 S. W. 539; Ollis v. Railway Co., 31 Tex. Civ. App. 601, 73 S. W. 30; Davis v. Railway Co., 92 S. W. 831; Railway Co. v. Edwards, 90 Tex. 65, 36 S. W. 430, 32 L. R. A. 823; North Tex. Const. Co. v. Bostick, 98 Tex. 239, 83 S. W. 12.

While the case of Railway Co. v. Davis so strongly pressed upon us in behalf of appellant is forceful, we yet think it distinguishable from the case before us in several particulars. The minor there in question was at the time of his injury of somewhat more mature age. He had been warned against riding the moving train, and the court finds that it conclusively appears that the operatives of the train did not know that he had boarded it. In the case we have, however, Aaron Cushman was but about six years old at the time of his injury, and it is not even contended before us that a child of such tender age has sufficient discretion to understand the danger of his undertaking, and, when the evidence tending to show the long-continued practice of the little boys of Dahlart to jump upon and ride trains is considered, together with the unobstructed view of the situation, the testimony of the engineer that he saw the boys so near, the situation of the brakeman upon the train, the absence of any denial on their part of the want of observation or knowledge, thus raising perhaps an inference that they not only saw the little boys at the icehouse, and hence could have reasonably contemplated the action taken by them, but further saw them after a manifestation of their purpose to get upon the moving train, with other circumstances, all render in our judgment the question of negligence chargeable to appellant one for the jury.

For the error in the court's charge, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Franklin County; Jephtha H. Evans, Judge.

Action by L. P. Gilbreath against the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lovick P. Miles, for appellant. Sam R. Chew, for appellee.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

McCULLOCH, J. Appellee boarded, at Ozark, Ark., the caboose of a local freight train, which carried passengers, for the purpose of taking passage to Altus, the next station on appellant's road. When he entered the caboose it was standing at the station, but was soon pulled down to the east end of the yards and uncoupled from the train while switching was being done. A car was backed or kicked in on the track where the caboose was standing, and struck it with such force that appellee was thrown down and received serious injuries to his person, for which he sues to recover damages. He testified that when he entered the caboose he sat down on one of the stationary seats running lengthwise of the car, and remained seated until the violent impact of the cars threw him off the seat to the floor. It threw him a distance of six or eight feet, and severely bruised his head, shoulder, and hip on the left side of his body. He testified, also, that the cars came together with great and unusual force.

Appellant proved that a printed notice was posted in the caboose warning passengers of the danger of standing up while switching was being done. The conductor and one of the brakemen testified that appellant stated to the former, immediately after the accident, that he was standing up in the caboose when the shock came, and he was thrown down. He denied having made this statement. The evidence tends to establish the fact that the conductor knew that appellee had entered the caboose as a passenger, and was in there when the other car was backed or kicked against it with extraordinary violence. But whether he actually knew of appellee's presence or not, he was operating a train which carried passengers, the caboose had just been drawn up to a station for the purpose of receiving passengers, and he, as well as all of the other trainmen, were bound to anticipate the presence of passengers aboard the caboose, and to exercise care not to injure them. St. Louis, Iron Mountain & South. Ry. Co. v. Harmon, 85 Ark. 503, 109 S. W. 295.

The court refused to instruct the jury, at appellant's request, that, "if the plaintiff was standing up at the time the cars came together, then, in the absence of any explanation of why or how long he was standing, he cannot recover." The instruction was properly refused. This court has repeatedly held that it is not necessarily negligence for a passenger on freight train to stand up, but that it is generally a question for the jury to decide under the circumstances disclosed in each case. Pasley v. Railway Co., 83 Ark. 22, 102 S. W. 387; Railway v. Brabbzson, 112 S. W. 222; Same v. Richardson, 112 S. W. 212.

Contributory negligence is never presumed from the mere silence of the record as to the particular circumstances, but must be proved, either by direct evidence or by evidence of circumstances from which it may be inferred. A bare admission on the part of a passenger that he was standing up when injured does not make a case of negligence per se, nor create a prima facie case of negligence, so as to cast upon him the burden of proving the circumstances and clearing himself of the charge. When negligence on the part of the carrier is established by evidence, the burden is upon the carrier to prove contributory negligence of the injured passenger. Railway Co. v. Eubanks, 43 Ark. 460, 3 S. W. 808, 3 Am. St. Rep. 245; Same v. Cavenesse, 48 Ark. 106, 2 S. W. 505; Hot Springs St. Rd. v. Hildreth, 72 Ark. 572, 82 S. W. 245; O., O. & G. Ry. Co. v. Dougherty, 77 Ark. 1, 91 S. W. 768.

Complaint is made at the refusal of the court to give certain other instructions asked by appellant; but we think the matters therein contained were sufficiently covered by other instructions given, and no error was committed.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from White Chancery Court; Jesse C. Hart, Judge.

Suit by W. L. Wright against S. E. Boltz. From a decree for defendant on his cross-bill, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Cypert & Cypert, for appellant. Rachels & Johnston, for appellee.

McCULLOCH, J. Appellant owned a tract of land in White county, Ark., containing 861.55 acres, farm and timber land, and sold it to appellee for $17,600, taking in exchange a farm in Illinois owned by appellee at the estimated value of $7,000, which was credited on the purchase price of the Arkansas land. There was a mortgage on the land for $6,750, executed by appellant, which ap-pellee assumed, and that, too, was credited on the purchase price. The balance of the purchase price is evidenced by notes executed by appellee, which are recited in the deed and constitute a lien on the land conveyed. Appellant instituted this suit in the chancery court of White county to enforce his lien on the land, as vendor, for unpaid accrued interest on the notes and for taxes on the land, which he had paid in order to protect it from sale; and appellee filed his cross-complaint against appellant, seeking to cancel the sale on the alleged ground of fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the vendor and his agent concerning the value of the land and quantity and value of timber thereon. The chancellor granted the relief prayed in the cross-complaint.

Appellee, up to the time that he purchased the Arkansas land, resided in Clay county, Ill., where he owned and occupied a small farm. Appellant lived in Missouri, but owned the Arkansas land, and placed it for sale in the hands of a real estate agent or broker named Martin, at Searcy, Ark.; the land being situated only a few miles distant from that place. Correspondence began in February, 1904, between appellee and Martin concerning the sale of the land, and continued up to the consummation of the trade, which occurred on November 23, 1904, at a meeting in St. Louis appointed for that purpose between appellant and appellee. Appellee came to Arkansas in March, 1904, and looked at the land, and returned again in September, 1904, when he spent two or three days and nights on the place inspecting it. Appellant met him there by appointment. The allegations of the cross-complaint concerning misrepresentations made by appellant and his agent, Martin, take a very wide range, including, not only matters affecting the lands sold, but also the manifold superior advantages afforded to those who are fortunate enough to live in this state, and particularly in the locality where these lands are situated. The chancellor, however, based his decree on a finding that misrepresentations were made concerning the quantity and value of the timber on the lands.

We are of the opinion that the decree is not correct. It is well settled that a vendee of land, seeking a cancellation of the sale on account of alleged false representations of his vendor, must show that the representations induced him to purchase, that he relied upon them, and had the right to rely upon them in belief of their truth. Yeates v. Pryor, 11 Ark. 58; Matlock v. Reppey, 47 Ark. 148, 14 S. W. 546; Neely v. Rembert, 71 Ark. 91, 71 S. W. 259. This court, in Yeates v. Pryor, supra, laid down the rule that "misrepresentations, in order to affect the validity of the contract, must relate to some matter of inducement to the making of the contract, in which, from the relative position of the parties and their means of information, the one must necessarily be presumed to contract upon the faith and trust which he reposes in the representations of the other, on account of his superior information and knowledge in regard to the subject of the contract; for if the means of information are alike accessible to both, so that with the ordinary prudence or vigilance the parties might respectively rely upon their own judgment, they must be presumed to have done so." And this court, in Neely v. Rembert, supra, speaking of the rule charging a purchaser of land who has had an opportunity to inspect for himself with "all the knowledge which he might have obtained had he pursued the inquiry to the end," said: "One ground of the rule is stated to be the practical impossibility, in any judicial proceeding, of ascertaining exactly how much knowledge a party who has examined before purchase has obtained by his inquiry, and the opportunity which a contrary rule would give to a party of repudiating an agreement or other transaction, fairly entered into, with which he had become dissatisfied."

The evidence discloses the fact that appellee twice visited the lands for the purpose of inspecting them in contemplation of a purchase, that he had abundant opportunity to examine the lands and timber, and did examine them. It is not claimed that any definite representation was made to him as the quantity or kind of timber on the land. He merely states: "Mr. Martin said there was enough on the place to pay for it, and Mr. Wright said in St. Louis there was enough timber on the place to pay half of the purchase money." These statements were obviously only expressions of opinion, not intended to be taken literally, as appellee knew that less than half of the land was unimproved, and could not have relied on the statement that the timber was worth the whole of the purchase price, or even half of it.

The same may be said of the alleged misrepresentation concerning the value and productiveness of the land. At least one of his visits to the land was during the crop season, and he was invited to make the visit in order to see the land and judge of its productiveness. That he availed himself of the opportunity shows that he traded on his own judgment, rather than that of the vendor and his agent. That he was influenced to some extent by the too favorable opinion expressed by the agent concerning the value of the land and its future possibilities is very probable; but that is not sufficient to justify a court of equity in setting aside the contract of sale. Upon the whole, we think the evidence does not entitle appellee to the relief sought.

The decree is therefore reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings, and with directions to enter a decree in favor of appellant for the amount found to be due him.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; J. W. Meeks, Judge.

Action by the state against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company. From a judgment for the state, defendant appeals. Reversed, and action dismissed.

W. F. Evans and W. J. Orr, for appellant.

BATTLE, J. The state of Arkansas seeks to recover, by this action, of the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company the penalty prescribed by statute for transporting freight at a greater rate than is allowed by the laws of this state. The issues in the case were tried upon an agreed statement of facts, which is as follows:

"It is stipulated and agreed that at all the times mentioned in the complaint the defendant was and now is a railroad corporation, organized under the laws of the state of Missouri and operating a line of road in and through the counties of Clay, Greene, Randolph, Mississippi, Poinsett, Lawrence, Craighead, Sharp, and Fulton, in Arkansas, and through many counties in Missouri.

"That prior to May 3, 1907, it operated a line of road through Hoxie and Cape Girardeau, via a bridge over and across Black river near Pocahontas, Ark.; also a line between Hoxie and Jonesboro, this forming a line between Cape Girardeau, Mo., and Jonesboro, Ark.; that Pocahontas and Biggers are stations on said line.

"That prior to May 3, 1907, defendant received and transported car load shipments over the said line between the stations of Biggers, Pocahontas, and Jonesboro, and other stations, over said bridge.

"That said bridge is the property of the Randolph County Bridge Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Arkansas.

"That on May 3, 1907, said bridge was condemned by the civil engineers as unsafe for the passage of trains, and was unsafe for the passage of trains to the present time; that since May 3, 1907, defendant has transported all car load shipments between Biggers and Jonesboro and Pocahontas and Jonesboro via Poplar Bluff, Cape Girardeau, or Chaffee, stations in Missouri, and via Big Creek, Ark., over a line operated by this defendant via said last-named station, and it has refused to route any car load shipments via the Pocahontas bridge over Black river because of the unsafe condition of said bridge.

"That it has applied the tariff rates established between Pocahontas and Jonesboro, and Biggers and Jonesboro, via Poplar Bluff and Cape Girardeau, and not the tariff which would apply between Biggers, Pocahontas, and Jonesboro via the bridge.

"That it has not since May 3, 1907, routed any car load shipments between the last-named places via the Pocahontas or Black River bridge, or via Hoxie, Ark.

"That the rates charged by the defendant since May 3, 1907, on car load shipments via its line through Missouri and between Biggers, Pocahontas, and Jonesboro exceeds the rates fixed by the Railroad Commission of Arkansas and in force during said period between said stations via the Pocahontas or Black River bridge."

The plaintiff recovered a judgment for $500, and the defendant appealed.

The only question in the case is, were the charges appellant was authorized to make and collect for transporting freight between the points named above controlled by the laws of Arkansas? This question was decided in Hanley v. Kansas City Southern Railway Co., 187 U. S. 617, 23 Sup. Ct. 214, 47 L. Ed. 333. The facts in that case as stated in the opinion were as follows: "The plaintiff owns a road running through several states and territories. The road, after leaving Missouri, runs for 28 miles and a fraction through Arkansas to the dividing line between that state and the Indian Territory, then nearly 128 miles in the territory, and then over 117 miles in Arkansas again to Texas. There is also a branch line running from Ft. Smith, in Arkansas, to Spiro, in the Indian Territory, about a mile of which is in the state and 15 in the territory; and there are other branches. Goods were shipped from Ft. Smith, by way of Spiro and the road in the Indian Territory, to Grannia, in Arkansas, on a through bill of lading; the total distance being a little more than 52 miles in Arkansas and nearly 64 in the Indian Territory. For this the railroad charged a sum in excess of the rate fixed by the railroad commissioners, and was summoned before them under the state law. The commissioners decided that the company was liable to a penalty under the state statute,

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes assert their right to fix rates for continuous transportation between two points in Arkansas, even when a large part of the route is outside the state, through the Indian Territory or Texas, and intend to enforce compliance with these rates." The court held that the transportation of the goods in that case was interstate commerce, and was under the regulation of Congress, free from interference by the state of Arkansas, and that "to bring the transportation within the control of the state, as part of its domestic commerce, the subject transported must be" for the entire distance carried "under the exclusive jurisdiction of the state."

Following Hanley v. Kansas City Southern Ry. Co., we hold that the transportation of goods in this case was interstate commerce, and was under the regulation of Congress, free from the interference of the state of Arkansas, and that no penalty is recoverable in this action.

Judgment is reversed, and the action dismissed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Franklin County; Jephtha H. Evans, Judge.

Personal injury action by Stanley Lavendusky, by his next friend, Antony Lavendusky, against the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

Walter Lavendusky, a lad about nine years old, was walking by the side of appellant's railroad track in its yards at the town of Denning, Ark. While Lavendusky was thus walking, the yard master of appellant threw from one of its freight cars as it passed along the track a large lump of coal, which struck the lad upon his head, severely injuring him. An eyewitness testified that the yard master was looking down towards young Lavendusky when he threw the coal off. It was shown that the switch or yard crew of appellant threw coal off its cars near where one Kelly lived "pretty often," and that this had been done for a year or two. The witness explained that the crew would throw the coal off "sometimes every day, and then again they would check up, and not throw off any for a few days, and then they would go to throwing it off again." It was shown that after the cars were loaded with coal they were taken down into appellant's yard. The cars were under the supervision of appellant's yard master. The coal on the cars did not belong to the yard master, but to the parties to whom it was billed. Neither the yard master, nor any switchman, nor any one connected with the yard service, had any authority to throw coal from the cars. When this was done, it was in direct violation of the rules of the company. It was not done for the benefit of appellant. When Lavendusky was injured, he was in a path along the railroad "where all the people passed." He was about 10 or 15 yards from the public road. These are the undisputed facts, upon which appellee recovered a judgment against appellant for $2,500, which this appeal seeks to reverse.

Lovick P. Miles, for appellant.

WOOD, J. (after stating the facts as above). It was beyond the scope of the employment of the yard master to throw coal from appellant's car in the manner shown by the evidence. Appellant had not invested him with such authority, either real or apparent. The act was not for the benefit of appellant, and was a tort, for which appellant was not liable. St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Grant, 75 Ark. 579, 88 S. W. 580, 1133; St. L. S. W. Ry. Co. v. Bryant, 81 Ark. 369, 99 S. W. 693; Railway Co. v. Bolling, 59 Ark. 395, 27 S. W. 492.

The evidence does not show that Lavendusky was upon the public highway. It is not shown that the path where he was at the time of his injury was a part of the public highway. He was therefore a trespasser. Adams v. St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 83 Ark. 300, 103 S. W. 725; St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Wilkerson, 46 Ark. 513. The appellant owed him no positive duty to exercise ordinary care to protect him from injury. The doctrine that railway companies are liable for injuries to trespassers caused by failing to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring them after their perilous situation has been discovered can have no application in cases where the servant's acts causing the injuries are beyond the scope of their employment.

The case of Fletcher v. Baltimore & P. Ry. Co., 168 U. S. 135, 18 Sup. Ct. 35, 42 L. Ed. 411, relied upon by appellee, is not in point. Fletcher, the plaintiff in error, at the time of his injury was upon a street crossing, where he had the right to be, and where the company owed him the duty to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring him. Likewise, in the case of St. L. S. W. Ry. Co. v. Underwood, 74 Ark. 610, 86 S. W. 804, the party injured was upon the public street. Other reasons, also, distinguish these and other cases, relied upon by counsel for appellee in his oral argument, from the case at bar.

For the reasons expressed, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

3. PERJURY (§ 33*)—FALSITY OF TESTIMONY—EVIDENCE.

On a trial for perjury, based on accused falsely testifying in a civil action that at the time he executed a note to a bank he obtained a receipt from the cashier stating that the note was accommodation paper, the state offered no evidence that a receipt was not given, but showed that after the cashier had absconded the attorney for accused procured a duplicate receipt. Accused testified that he had found the original and had exhibited it at the trial of the civil action. It was not proved that this testimony was false and that he had exhibited the duplicate. One who had been attorney in the civil action testified that the copy of the receipt exhibited by accused varied from the duplicate produced by the state. Held, that the failure of accused to exhibit on his trial either the original or duplicate receipt affected only the credibility of his testimony, and was not evidence of the falsity of the testimony in the civil action.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Sevier County; Jas. S. Steel, Judge.

H. N. Baker was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

Wm. F. Kirby, Atty. Gen., and Daniel Taylor, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

McCULLOCH, J. Appellant, H. N. Baker, was indicted by the grand jury of Polk county for the crime of perjury, alleged to have been committed by giving material false testimony in the trial of a civil action pending in the circuit court of that county wherein J. H. Skillern, as receiver of the Howard County Bank, was plaintiff, and said H. N. Baker was defendant. A trial of the case, on change of venue, in the circuit court of Sevier county, resulted in conviction of the accused, and he appealed to this court.

The facts of the case are as follows: On September 2, 1902, appellant executed to the Howard County Bank, of Nashville, Ark., his negotiable promissory note in due form for the sum of $568.30, payable 90 days after date. The bank was subsequently adjudged to be insolvent and its assets were placed in the hands of a receiver. Skillern was appointed as receiver, and instituted an action at law against appellant to recover the amount of the note. On the trial of that case appellant, in support of his defense to the action, testified that there was no consideration for the note, that he executed it to the bank as accommodation paper to enable it to use the note as collateral to borrow money on, and that at the time of the execution of the note the cashier of the bank, one D. P. Terry, executed to him a written receipt, which he exhibited to the trial jury, stating that the instrument was an accommodation note. This is the testimony that is alleged to be false, and its material bearing upon the issue involved in that case is obvious. It is sufficiently proved that the appellant gave the testimony above recited in the trial of said civil action, and that he exhibited to the jury a writing which he testified was the receipt given him by Terry, the bank cashier, at the time he executed the note, stating that the note was executed as accommodation paper. The defect in the evidence is in its failure to establish the falsity of appellant's testimony.

It will be seen that the alleged false testimony consists of two statements: One, that the note was executed for accommodation; and the other, that the cashier gave appellant at the time a written receipt showing that it was accommodation paper. There is no evidence at all in this record that the statement in the first-named particular was false. No testimony at all was introduced by the state tending to show that the note was not in fact given as accommodation paper. The note was introduced, reciting on its face that it was given for a valuable consideration, and that would have been legally sufficient in a civil action to sustain a recovery for the amount of the note, even in the face of appellant's testimony that it was in fact given as accommodation paper and without consideration; but in a criminal prosecution for perjury the recitals of the note do not prove the falsity of appellant's testimony. It will not do to say that the mere recitals of the note are sufficient to convict the appellant of falsely swearing in contradiction of those recitals. The recitals might be considered in corroboration of some direct testimony of the falsity of appellant's testimony; but they are not sufficient to establish its falsity. In prosecutions for perjury, the falsity of the testimony which is the basis of the accusation must be affirmatively proved. In Blevins v. State, 85 Ark. 195, 107 S. W. 893, we said: "The falsity of the testimony is a material ingredient of the offense. It is the gist of the offense, and must be proved as alleged. The mere improbability of the truth of the testimony given, without affirmative proof of its falsity, is not sufficient, in a prosecution for perjury, to establish its falsity."

Nor is there any proof that the cashier did not give the receipt testified to by appellant. Neither Terry, the cashier, nor any other witness, was introduced to show that a receipt was not given. The state introduced testimony to the effect that, after Terry absconded and fled to Mexico, appellant, through the latter's attorney (who was also appellant's attorney in the civil action), procured from Terry a receipt, which he claimed was a duplicate of the one given at the time of the execution of the note, and paid him $50 to execute the duplicate. But appellant testifies that he found the original, and that it was the original which he exhibited at the trial of the civil action. It is not proved that this was false, and that appellant exhibited the so-called duplicate, which he obtained from Terry while in Mexico. One of the attorneys for the plaintiff in the civil action testified in the trial of the present case that at the former trial he copied precisely the receipt exhibited by appellant; but the copy which he made varies from the copy of the duplicate adduced by the state in evidence, in that the former copy contains several words which do not appear in the latter. The identical paper which appellant exhibited at the trial of the civil action was not filed as a part of the record of that case, and appellant did not, at the trial of the present case, produce either the original, which he claimed that Terry gave him when he executed the note, or the duplicate, which Terry sent him from Mexico. His failure to do so, however, affected only the credibility of his testimony in the present trial, and did not tend to establish the falsity of his testimony in the trial of the civil action. It gives his story an appearance of improbability, but does not furnish affirmative proof of its falsity. It might serve as corroboration, if there was any direct evidence of the falsity of his testimony; but it is not affirmative evidence of the falsity of the testimony given at the trial of the civil action. We therefore find no evidence upon which the verdict of conviction can be sustained, and the judgment must be reversed.

There are numerous other assignments of error in the motion for new trial; but, as appellant's counsel has not favored us with an argument of the other question relied on for a reversal, we need not discuss them.

On account of the legal insufficiency of the evidence, the judgment of conviction is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

MULLINS et al. v. COLUMBIA COUNTY BANK.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 26, 1908.)

1. TRIAL (§ 412*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—SECONDARY EVIDENCE—WAIVER OF CONDITIONS OF ADMISSION.

Plaintiff waived the conditions precedent to the admissibility of secondary evidence of the contract evidencing the transaction in question on the part of defendant, where it introduced copies of the contract, which were competent secondary evidence; it not having possession of the original.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 976; Dec. Dig. § 412.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 802*)—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—SUFFICIENCY OF STATEMENT OF GROUNDS.

Where an exception was taken to a ruling excluding from the jury part of a deposition after it had been read, which was the only evidence excluded, and the motion for a new trial urged error in excluding "Exhibit C," attached to the deposition, but concluded "that the evidence excluded was admission (adduced) by the plaintiff, which could not be withdrawn and became a part of the evidence in the cause when filed," the motion was sufficiently specific to include as a ground the court's ruling in excluding all the portion of the deposition not admitted.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Columbia County; G. W. Hays, Judge.

Action by the Columbia County Bank against J. E. Mullins and another. There was a directed verdict for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

Stevens & Stevens, for appellants. McKay & Lile, for appellee.

BATTLE, J. The Columbia County Bank instituted an action against J. E. Mullins and U. C. Mullins on two promissory notes executed by the defendants to the order of J. C. Karner for $147 each and transferred by payee to the plaintiff. The defendants answered, and alleged, in part, as a defense thereto, that the notes were given by them in payment of "patent right territory" and "were not executed upon a printed form showing upon their faces that they were executed in consideration of said patent right territory," as is required by sections 512, 513, and 514 of Kirby's Digest of the Statutes of Arkansas.

The issues in the case were tried by a jury. The notes sued on did not show on their faces for what they were given. The deposition of J. C. Karner, to whom the notes were executed, which was taken by agreement, upon interrogatories, to be read as evidence in behalf of plaintiff, was read as evidence by plaintiff in the trial. He testified that the notes sued upon were executed by the defendants to him, and further testified upon interrogatories, in part, as follows:

"Q. Did you execute to him [them] a receipt for these two notes?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Does this receipt show in full for what these notes were given?

"A. Yes.

"Q. If you executed to them a receipt, will you attach a copy of same, marked 'Exhibit B,' and make it a part of your deposition?

"A. I have done so.

"The following is the receipt, marked 'Exhibit B':

"Received from J. E. and U. C. Mullins two hundred and ninety-four dollars in full payment for seventy royalty checks for $4.20 each, being advanced royalty on Karner sash locks, the purpose of which is to carry locks in stock ready for shipment to such points in the United States as they may direct.

"[Signed] Jo C. Karner."

"Q. Did you employ them to represent you in the sale of Karner sash locks?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Did you have a written contract to that effect?

"A. Yes.

"Q. If so, will you please attach a blank copy of that contract, marked 'Exhibit C,' and make it a part of your deposition?

"A. I have done so; that is, I attach an exact copy of the printed part, which contains the terms of the agreement. I do not remember names of counties, etc., and cannot fill blanks.

"Exhibit C is in the following words and figures:

"This is to certify that Jo C. Karner, of Mexia, Texas, is the exclusive owner of letters patent No. 686,673, for an improved automatic window lock to be hereafter known as the "Karner sash lock." I have therefore this day appointed or legal representatives, sole and exclusive agents for the sale of the Karner sash lock in the county of, state of, in which to begin work, and from one year from date hereof I hereby authorize said agent to order locks from Nickel Manufacturing Co., of Morris, Ill., and I join said manufacturers in agreeing to furnish said agents all the sash locks may order at the price of one dollar and seventy cents ($1.70) per dozen, according to my contract with them for furnishing the goods, a copy of which is hereto attached. I further agree that for every sixty dozen locks ordered by said agent shall have exclusive control of an additional county for one year from date of selection, such election to be made by and upon any unoccupied county in the United States, and I agree to furnish with well-settled counties to select from five years from date hereof. Said agent having full authority to sublease any field accumulated under this contract for one year from date of selection. shall also have equal privilege with other agents of selling the Karner sash locks in the counties of, state of, for one year from date.

"I further agree to furnish free of charge one perfect model, one hundred order blanks, and one hundred cards with which to begin work on or before day of, A. D. 19...

"It is understood that for having leased the above field, and for any privileges which said agent may enjoy under this contract, I make no requirement of whatever further than that agrees to use ordinary diligence in selling said goods, and for not less than the established retail price of fifty cents.

"Given under my hand this day of, A. D. 19..."

"Q. For what were these notes given by them to you?

"A. For coupons.

"Q. Did you furnish them with coupon checks upon the Nickel Manufacturing Company, of Morris, Ill., for the amount of these notes with which to pay the said Nickel Manufacturing Company as much as 35 cents per dozen on every dozen 'Karner sash locks' that might be ordered by them from the Nickel Manufacturing Company?

"A. Yes.

"Q. If so, will you please attach a copy of said book of coupon checks, marked 'Exhibit D,' and make same a part of your deposition?

"A. I have so marked and attached one out of said book containing 70. They are all alike.

"Exhibit D is as follows:

"Morris, Ill.,

"Nickel Manufacturing Co., Morris, Ill.

"Upon presentation of this check, duly indorsed by one of my authorized managing agents, you will accept the same in payment of 35 cents per dozen, on 12 dozen Karner sash locks at the price of $1.70 per dozen, and charge the same to my account on royalty.. [Signed] Jo C. Karner."

"Q. Who manufactured the Karner sash locks?

"A. The Nickel Manufacturing Co., of Morris, Ill.

"Q. Are they the sole manufacturers of this lock?

"A. Yes.

"Q. Is the Nickel Manufacturing Company under contract with you to manufacture the Karner sash lock for you and your agents, under your special manager's contract, and to furnish same to you and your agents at $1.70 per dozen, receiving your coupon check for $4.20 as part payment on each 12 dozen locks so ordered?

"A. Yes."

J. C. McNeill, cashier of the plaintiff, was then introduced by plaintiff as a witness, and he testified substantially as follows: "Said he was cashier of the Columbia County Bank, and had been for some years; * * * was cashier of the bank in April, 1904; said the two notes executed on the 27th day of April, 1904, by J. E. & U. C. Mullins to J. C. Karner, were bought by the Columbia County Bank for a valuable consideration before maturity, in the regular course of business, without any notice that they were given for a patented instrument or for patent right territory, and that the bank was the owner of the notes, and was at the time the suit was brought." The plaintiff then closed.

The defendants then introduced U. C. Mullins, one of them, as a witness, and asked him what was the contract between defendants and Karner upon which the notes sued upon were based; and he said there was a written contract, but he did not have it, but J. E. Mullins did, and he (witness) did not know what had become of it. Upon objection of the plaintiff the court refused to allow him to answer the question. Defendants then asked witness "if J. C. Karner furnished a model and 100 order blanks with which to begin work as set out in Exhibit C to his deposition. The court refused to permit defendants to ask the witness any question pertaining to the contract between the parties, or of the consideration of the notes as testified to by J. C. Karner, and the court, of its own motion, took from the jury all of J. C. Karner's deposition," and Exhibits B, C, and D thereto, which are set out in this opinion, except that which says the notes were executed to him. To the exclusion of this evidence, and the refusal to allow the defendants to ask witness the questions, the defendants at the time excepted.

No other evidence being adduced, the court instructed the jury to return a verdict for plaintiff, and they did so for $363.85.

The defendants moved for a new trial, in part, upon the following grounds:

"Because the court erred in excluding from the jury the paper, Exhibit C, attached to J. C. Karner's deposition in answer to question 15, where he says that he had a written contract with J. E. & U. C. Mullins to represent him in the sale of the Karner sash locks. The question propounded to him in question 14 is, in substance: 'Did you have a written contract with them to represent you in the sale of Karner sash locks? A. Yes. Question 15. If so, will you please attach a blank copy of the contract, marked "Exhibit C," and make it a part of your deposition. A. I have done so; that is, I attached an exact copy of the printed part, which contains the terms of the agreement. I do not remember names of the counties, etc., and cannot fill blanks.' The court erred in excluding this evidence, the court's reason being that the original contract was not in the hands of the plaintiff, and that this evidence was the same as parol evidence to establish the contents of the contract. The court erred because this evidence had been introduced by plaintiff and had become part of the record in this case, to which there had been no exceptions filed, and on which evidence the defendants had relied in the trial of this case, and for it to be withdrawn in the trial of the cause works a hardship on the defendants and was a surprise to them, and because the court erred in not permitting the defendants to show the contents of the original agreement between J. C. Karner and them in the transaction made at the time of the execution of the notes sued on.

"That the evidence excluded was admissions (adduced) by the plaintiff, which could not be withdrawn, and became a part of the evidence in the cause when filed."

The court denied the motion, and the defendants appealed.

Evidence substantially the same as that excluded in this case was held by this court in Columbia County Bank v. Emerson, 110 S. W. 214, to be sufficient to sustain a good and valid defense to the action upon notes in that case, and to show that the notes were void, because in violation of section 513 of Kirby's Digest. But it seems the court excluded it in this case because it was an effort to prove the existence of writings by copies, instead of introducing the originals. But the copies were competent secondary evidence. The plaintiff had the right to waive the conditions on which their admissibility depended, and did so by adducing the evidence, and thereby gave to it its full force as evidence, and virtually admitted what he sought to prove. Allen v. Ozark Land Co., 55 Ark. 549, 555, 18 S. W. 1042. The trial court erred in excluding the evidence.

But appellee contends that the only part of the exception to the exclusion of a part of the deposition of Karner that was made a ground of the motion for a new trial is that which relates to Exhibit C, and that the other part of the exception was waived. This is not true. There were only four exceptions to the rulings of the court, and they were to the exclusion of a part of the deposition of Karner, to the refusal to allow witness to answer questions, to the instruction to the jury directing them to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and to the overruling of the motion for a new trial. The part of the deposition of Karner which was excluded is set out in full in the bill of exceptions, and stress is given to the error committed in excluding it. In enumerating in their motion for a new trial the reasons for asking a new trial, the defendants say at the conclusion: "That the evidence excluded was admissions (adduced) by the plaintiff, which could not be withdrawn, and became a part of the evidence in the cause when filed." This appears among the reasons given for asking a new trial, and could mean only that the court erred in excluding the part of the deposition of Karner because it was read as evidence by the plaintiff and could not be withdrawn. It was sufficiently specific, because this was the only evidence excluded, and it could not refer to anything else. If it was not intended as a reason for asking a new trial, why did defendants say it? What place can it fill in a motion for a new trial? It can serve no other purpose.

Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

AYER & LORD TIE CO. et al. v. GREER.
(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 19, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 547*)—NECESSITY OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Refusal to transfer a cause to equity is not reviewable, in the absence of a bill of exceptions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2427-2432; Dec. Dig. § 547.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 547*)—NECESSITY OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

It cannot, in the absence of a bill of exceptions bringing before the court the evidence and instructions, on which, as shown by the record proper, the cause was heard, be said that the verdict and judgment were prejudicial to defendant, or that the result should have been different, had the motion to transfer to equity been granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 547.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 11*)—CAUSES FOR EQUITY DOCKET—ISSUE RAISED BY ANSWER.

The answer in replevin for cross-ties presents no matter of purely equitable cognizance, entitling defendant to a transfer to equity, the issue presented by the complaint and answer being the ownership and right to possession of the ties, and the title to the land from which the ties were cut being only incidental and a matter which could be shown at law, under the issue raised by such pleadings, and the issue raised by the cross-bill, to have title quieted as against an alleged void tax title, being entirely independent of and not germane to the question to be tried, the right to the ties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 29; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

4. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 54*)—AUTHENTICATION BY BYSTANDERS—PRESENTATION TO JUDGE.

An attempted authentication of a bill of exceptions by two bystanders, under Kirby's Dig. § 6226, is insufficient, in the absence of a showing that the bill was first presented to and rejected by the judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. § 89; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, White County; Silas D. Campbell, Special Judge.

Action by B. W. Greer against the Ayer & Lord Tie Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This is a suit in replevin brought by appellee against appellants for certain cross-ties. The appellee claimed to be the owner of the ties by virtue of his alleged ownership of the lands from which the ties were cut. The appellants answered, setting up title to the land in appellant L. A. Smith, from whom the timber was bought, and averring that appellee held under a void tax deed, that the deed was void because the land was sold for the taxes of 1892 at a sale in June, 1893, and the clerk failed to authenticate the delinquent list by making the affidavit required by law and failed to record same, and failed to publish the delinquent list as required by law, and alleged various other illegalities in the tax sale. Appellants asserted that such alleged void tax deed was a cloud on the title of L. A. Smith to such an extent that his title was not merchantable. They asked that Smith's title be quieted, and that the cause be transferred to equity, so that appellee's tax deed might be canceled, etc. A motion was made to transfer the cause to equity, which was overruled, and to which ruling the appellant excepted, and had his exceptions noted of record. The record shows that the cause then progressed at law, the issues being submitted to the jury, "who, after hearing the testimony of witnesses, arguments of counsel, and the instructions of the court," returned a verdict for the appellee. The record shows that a motion for new trial was filed and overruled, and the record recites that "the defendants [appellants] are given sixty days to file their bill of exceptions." The record does not show that any bill of exceptions was presented to and signed by the trial judge and filed by the clerk as a part of the record. On the contrary, there is an affidavit in the transcript by one of the attorneys for appellants showing why a bill of exceptions was not duly authenticated by the trial judge and filed within the time allowed for its presentation and filing, and there are affidavits to the effect that "the foregoing and annexed statement called bill of exceptions is a true transcript of the evidence in said case which was taken down by the official stenographer of the First judicial circuit, and that same contains all the evidence and exceptions made in the trial of the cause." But there is no "foregoing and annexed statement" called "a bill of exceptions" in the record.

Cypert & Cypert, for appellants. S. Brundidge, Jr., for appellee.

WOOD, J. (after stating the facts as above). There is no bill of exceptions, and the alleged error of the trial court is therefore not before us for review. Adler v. Conway Co., 42 Ark. 488; Toliver v. State, 35 Ark. 395; Watson v. Watson, 53 Ark. 415, 14 S. W. 622; Stinson v. Shafer, 53 Ark. 110, 23 S. W. 651. The record proper shows that the cause was heard upon the evidence and instructions of the court. In the absence of a bill of exception bringing the evidence and instructions before us for review, it is impossible for us to say that the verdict and judgment were prejudicial to appellant. The result, for aught that appears to the contrary, should have been the same, even if the cause had been transferred to the equity court. But the answer of appellants presented no matters of purely equitable cognizance as in American Soda Fountain Co. v. Futrall, 73 Ark. 464, 84 S. W. 505, 108 Am. St. Rep. 64. See Daniel v. Garner, 71 Ark. 484, 76 S. W. 1063. The issue involved on the complaint and answer was the ownership and right to possession of the cross-ties. The title to the land from which the timber was cut was only incidental and could have been shown at law under the issue raised by the complaint and answer. The cross-bill raised an entirely independent issue, one not germane to the question to be tried, namely, the right to the cross-ties.

The attempted authentication of the bill of exceptions by two bystanders, under section 6226 of Kirby's Digest, was insufficient. "A bill of exceptions signed by bystanders will not be considered on appeal where it does not appear that it was first presented to the circuit judge and was rejected by him." Morris v. Thomasson, 72 Ark. 264, 79 S. W. 790; Vaughan v. State, 57 Ark. 1, 20 S. W. 588; Fordyce v. Jackson, 56 Ark. 594, 20 S. W. 528, 597.

As appellants have not made it appear that there was any prejudicial error in the ruling of the lower court, its judgment must be affirmed. So ordered.

BLACKWOOD v. LIEBKE.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 26, 1908.)

DAMAGES (§ 79*)—LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

Provision in a contract of sale, at $3.50 per 1,000 feet, of ash trees, 14 inches in diameter, 12 feet above the stumps, on a large tract of land, to be cut clean as the land is gone over, not leaving isolated trees of the kind and size thereon, that, if any trees of the kind and size are left standing at expiration of time limited for cutting, the buyer shall pay the seller $1 per tree therefor, is enforceable as one for liquidated damages, and not for a penalty; the evidence showing that the market value of such isolated trees is decreased by increased cost of logging, and difficulty of finding a purchaser therefor, and the measure of the damages being indeterminate and dependent on many conditions, and this, though the price of such timber has risen during the life of the contract, the validity of the provision depending on the status when the contract was made.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Phillips County; Hance N. Hutton, Judge.

Action by G. T. Blackwood against C. F. Liebke. From a judgment for plaintiff for less than claimed, he appeals. Reversed in part, and remanded for new trial.

This suit grew out of the following contract: "This agreement made this 7th day of August, 1905, between G. T. Blackwood, party of the first part, and C. F. Liebke, party of the second part, witnesseth: First party hereby grants, bargains, and sells to second party all the merchantable ash timber standing on first party's land in state and county aforesaid in consideration of the sum of three dollars and fifty cents ($3.50) per thousand feet, and in further consideration of said sum grants to second party right of ingress to and egress from said land for the purpose of cutting, hauling, and removing said timber. First party hereby acknowledges receipt from second party of an advance cash payment of three hundred dollars ($300.00); the first timber taken by second party shall be applied to said advance until same is balanced, after which payments shall be made as hereinafter specified. Second party hereby agrees to cut, haul, and remove said timber and to pay for same within the time and in the manner hereinafter specified. It is understood between the parties hereto that the term 'merchantable timber' means all ash timber measuring fourteen inches in diameter at small end twelve feet above the stump. It is further agreed between the parties hereto that second party shall cut and haul the timber from said land without unnecessary delay; that said timber shall be dumped on the banks of Mound Lake or Arkansas river, as may be most convenient to haul; that when so dumped said logs shall be scaled by both parties; that in making said scale said logs shall be measured from bark to bark at small end; that the footage to be paid for by second party shall be thus ascertained; that all logs cut during the month shall be thus scaled at the end of the month; that as soon as the sale is completed and quantity thus ascertained second party shall pay first party for same. Second party agrees to cut said timber clean as he goes over the land, not leaving isolated merchantable trees thereon. If upon the termination of this agreement by limitation any merchantable trees are left standing on land, second party shall pay first party therefor the sum of one dollar per tree. If any timber has been cut, but not hauled to river or lake bank, same shall be scaled, as above provided, and paid for by second party at the rate of three and a half dollars per thousand feet. It is further understood and agreed between the parties hereto that second party's rights hereunder cease and determine on the 1st day of January, 1907, on which date second party shall quit said land and leave all timber standing thereon, but second party may have right of ingress for a period of 200 days after said 1st of January.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes 1907, for the purpose of removing such logs as have been cut, scaled, paid for, but no other purpose. In token of the assent of the parties hereunto witness their signature in duplicate, this day and date above written. G. T. Blackwood. C. F. Liebke. By W. C. Kirk, Agent."

Blackwood filed suit against Liebke in the Phillips circuit court on August 30, 1907, in which he alleged the execution of the foregoing contract; that the same expired by limitation on the 21st day of July, 1907; that the defendant had failed to comply with the contract, in that on the 1st day of January, 1907, there were left standing on the land covered by the contract 1,339 merchantable ash trees of the value of $1,339, for which he had not paid $1 per tree, and prayed judgment for said sum. He also alleged a violation of the contract, in that defendant had cut certain timber which he had failed and refused to scale and pay for as required by the terms of the contract, and prayed judgment for $350 on that account. Defendant in his answer admitted the execution of the contract, but denied that the number of feet of timber alleged was cut and unpaid for, but admitted that a small amount of timber had been cut and left in the woods owing to weather conditions, for which he was ready to pay. He denied liability for the value of the trees left standing, asserting that the provision of the contract in reference to payment therefor is penal, and that plaintiff is not entitled to recover according to its terms, and that plaintiff had suffered no damages on this account, as the value of standing timber had greatly enhanced since the execution of the contract. While there is no acreage mentioned in the contract, the evidence shows that Mr. Blackwood's tract was about 2,800 acres, but does not show the extent of the cutting. Evidence was adduced to prove the amount of timber which had been cut remaining on the ground at the termination of the contract, and the value thereof. As there is no longer any controversy over that issue, the facts in regard thereto are unimportant on this appeal.

There was testimony tending to prove that there were 1,339 ash trees left standing upon the land of the size and quality called for as merchantable in the contract. There was testimony to prove that the value of the timber in said trees left standing was $1.50 per 1,000 feet more than it was at the time of the execution of the contract. The following occurs in the testimony of one of defendant's witnesses, and is all the testimony upon the subject: "Q. If you find a tract of timber or land which is well covered with timber, and lying by the side of it there is a tract which is sparsely covered with the same kind of timber, is there not a difference in the market value of the timber on the two tracts? A. I would not think there would be, if the sizes would run the same. Q. If you were to find 160-acre tract of timber which would run 2,500 feet of ash timber to the acre, would you not pay more per 1,000 feet for that timber than you would on another 160-acre tract which would only run about 500 feet per acre? A. I would pay a little more for the reason that it could be logged cheaper. Q. After a tract of timbered land has been cut over, and a large percentage of the merchantable ash timber cut therefrom, is not the remaining timber much depreciated in value by reason of the fact of its sparsity? A. It would, if it was cut all over. Q. Say, for instance, that 60 per cent. of the timber had been removed, would it not be a very difficult matter to obtain as great a price for the remaining 40 per cent., as for the original tract as an entirety? A. You might take a part of the land and cut on that and not all over it, and that would not hurt it, but you might cut on the lowland and leave the highland. That would be all right; or you could cut on the low and leave the high. That would not affect it. Q. Then, if it was pretty freely culled over in all parts, such isolated trees that were left would command a very low market value in comparison with what that originally had? A. About the only difference would be in the cost of logging. It depends a good deal on the character of the timber. Q. Is it not almost impossible to induce a lumberman to buy standing timber on land which has been pretty well culled over? A. Well, it depends on how bad he wants it."

The court refused to give the following instruction: "If you find from the evidence that on or after January 1, 1907, there were standing on plaintiff's land ash trees measuring 14 inches in diameter at small end 12 feet above the stump, you will find from the evidence the number of such trees, and return a verdict for the plaintiff therefor at the rate of $1 per tree." The court instructed the jury on that issue as follows: "The jury are instructed that for the breach of the contract by the defendant in not cutting the trees mentioned in the contract the plaintiff is entitled to recover only nominal damages." The jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff to the amount of $210 for 60,000 feet of timber cut and not hauled, and also find $1 damages for failure of defendant to comply with the contract." Judgment was accordingly entered for the plaintiff for $211. Plaintiff filed a motion for new trial, which was overruled and exceptions were saved, and has appealed.

R. P. Cary and F. M. Rogers, for appellant.
John I. Moore, for appellee.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The sole question presented on this appeal is whether the stipulation in the contract for the payment of $1 per tree for all the merchantable trees of the dimensions mentioned in the contract is a penalty, or whether it is stipulated damages. The circuit court held it was a penalty, and the plaintiff, appellant here, contends that it was stipulated damages.

A learned discussion as to when agreements in contracts will be treated as stipulated damages and when as penalties by Mr. Chief Justice Watkins may be found in the case of Williams v. Green, 14 Ark. 315. Summing up the matter, he says: "Our impression is that wherever the act to be done or abstained from is other than the payment of money the circumstance that the actual damages may be more or less easily susceptible of ascertainment ought not to influence the construction of an agreement to be one way or the other, a stipulation for damages or merely by way of penalty. Where the damages are at all uncertain or unliquidated, the parties ought to be allowed to anticipate and stipulate them, if they choose to do so. Whenever courts attempt to take a distinction among contracts of this class, where no uniform or intelligible rule can be laid down to govern the distinction, they not only assume a most vexatious jurisdiction to reform the contracts of weak or sanguine men, but it tends to impair the confidence which all men ought to have in the obligation of contracts." In Lincoln v. L. R. Granite Co., 56 Ark. 405, 19 S. W. 1056, this statement was quoted from and approved. In Nilson v. Jonesboro, 57 Ark. 168, 20 S. W. 1093, the court said: "The authorities, however, show that, where the intention to liquidate the damages is not obvious, the stipulated sum will usually be given the effect of a penalty if it exceeds the measure of a just compensation and the actual damage sustained is capable of proof [citing authorities]. But, where the contract is of such a nature that the damage caused by its breach would be uncertain and difficult of proof, the sum named by the parties is generally held to be liquidated damages, if the form and language of the instrument are not unfavorable to that construction, and the magnitude of the sum does not forbid it." In Stillwell v. Paepcke-Leicht Lumber Co., 73 Ark. 432, 84 S. W. 483, 108 Am. St. Rep. 42, the court said: "Usually the surest test of liquidated damages is where the actual damages caused by the breach would be uncertain and difficult of proof, and the sum stipulated appears to be reasonable compensation for the injury occasioned by the failure to perform the contract." A learned writer on the subject, after discussing the difficulties in applying the principles involved, says: "Notwithstanding the deplorable state of the decisions, it may be assumed, first, that if, by the terms of the contract, a greater sum is to be paid upon default in the payment of a lesser sum at a given time, the provision for the payment of a greater sum will be held a penalty; second, where, by the terms of a contract, the damages are not difficult of ascertainment according to such terms and the stipulated damages are unconscionable, the latter will be regarded as a penalty; third, within these two rules parties may agree upon any sum as compensation for the breach of a contract." 1 Sutherland on Damages, § 283.

Applying the foregoing principles to the facts in this record, the court is of opinion that the agreement was enforceable as one for stipulated damages, and was not a penalty. The evidence shows that this was a large body of land, and the contract called for the cutting of only one kind of trees thereupon, with the stipulation that the trees of merchantable size and quality must all be cut clean, so that isolated merchantable trees would not be left. The purpose of this was plain and reasonable. The landowner sold all of the merchantable ash timber upon this large body of land, and his compensation therefor was dependent upon the amount of timber cut. He desired it all cut, in order that he might obtain the full price for all of his ash timber on this tract. The evidence shows that where a tract is sparsely timbered, with just a few isolated trees of merchantable value left standing, that the market value thereof would be less than the market value of the same amount of timber on a heavily timbered tract on account of the increased expense of hauling it out, and, it might be added, on account of the difficulty to find purchasers for small quantities of timber. In order to avoid having isolated merchantable trees scattered over a large tract, the landowner exacted this clause in the contract. It would be difficult to find a more positive element of damage, and yet the measure of it is indeterminate and dependent on many conditions. Turning to Mr. Sutherland's test, which is a fair deduction from the authorities, the contract cannot be condemned as one requiring a greater sum to be paid in default of the payment of a lesser sum at a given time, nor as one where the damages are not difficult of ascertainment and the amount stipulated is unconscionable. It will not do to say that the amount is unconscionable because the price of ash timber had risen $1.50 per 1,000 feet during the life of the contract. Had it fallen $1.50 during that time, certainly there could be no claim that it was unconscionable, and the fluctuation in the market of salable commodities is just as liable to be on the one side as on the other. This fact furnishes a reason why the parties might contract for a fixed price, and thereby escape market fluctuations.

It is argued that the landowner is not damaged, that his trees have increased in value, and that he is seeking to exact a higher price therefor than they were worth at the time he made the contract and yet retain the trees. And it is further argued that, where the damages are capable of ascertainment, the amount fixed will be disregarded, although declared to be liquidated damages. But the question is not as to the status of the parties when the contract terminated, but as to the status of the parties at the time they made the contract. It may be as the contract works out, that it would be easy to ascertain the damages for the breach of it, or to prove that there were none. But, if the status of the parties at the time of the contract was such that it would be difficult or impossible to have anticipated the damage for a breach of it, and there was a positive element of damage, then under the authorities there is no reason why that may not be anticipated and contracted for in advance. The Supreme Court of the United States have reviewed this subject fully in Sun Ptg. & Pub. Ass'n v. Moore, 183 U. S. 642, 22 Sup. Ct. 240, 46 L. Ed. 368. Referring to the contention made in that case, which was sustained by some decisions, that, where actual damages can be assessed from testimony, the court must disregard any stipulation fixing the amount and require proof of the damage sustained, the court, speaking through Mr. Justice White, said: "We think the asserted doctrine is wrong in principle, was unknown to the common law, does not prevail in the courts of England at the present time, and it is not sanctioned by the decisions of this court." And then the court reviewed the authorities, seeking, as it said, to demonstrate the soundness of its repudiation of that asserted doctrine; and said: "The decision of this court on the doctrine of liquidated damages and penalties lend no support to the contention that parties may not bona fide in a case where the damages are of an uncertain nature, estimate, and agree upon the measure of damages which may be sustained from the breach of an agreement. On the contrary, this court has consistently maintained the principle that the intention of the parties is to be arrived at by a proper construction of the agreement made between them, and that whether a particular stipulation to pay a sum of money is to be treated as a penalty, or as an agreed ascertainment of damages, is to be determined by the contract, fairly construed, it being the duty of the court always, where the damages are uncertain and have been liquidated by an agreement, to enforce the contract." The contract for the $1 per tree was valid, and should be enforced.

There was no error in the trial of the issue on the count for timber cut and not hauled, and the judgment on that count is affirmed. The judgment on the count for trees left standing is reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial on that count.

ELDRED et al. v. HART et al.
(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 19, 1908.)
USURY (§ 18*)—USURIOUS CONTRACT.

Money was borrowed under an agreement for 8 per cent. interest. Notes payable on or before five years, with coupon notes attached, for 5½ per cent. of the interest, payable semi-annually, were secured by a mortgage. For the remaining 3½ per cent. interest 10 notes, one payable each six months, each for the amount of interest at that rate for six months, and bearing interest after maturity, were secured by second mortgage. At the end of a year the principal and all interest to that date was paid, the first mortgage was released, and all notes secured thereby and the first two secured by the second mortgage were surrendered. Held, that the remaining eight notes secured by the second mortgage were valid obligations; the contract, valid if the principal was not paid till maturity, not being rendered usurious by the exercise of the option, though more than 8 per cent. interest for the time the money was retained would thus be collected.

Appeal from Benton Chancery Court; T. H. Humphreys, Chancellor.

Action by John L. Eldred, administrator, and others, against C. L. Hart and others. Decree for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

McGill & Lindsey, for appellants. Rice & Dickson, for appellees.

HART, J. This is an action brought by appellants in the Benton chancery court against appellees to foreclose a mortgage on certain lands situate in said county. In 1902 the appellees, C. L. Hart and Ella L. Hart, desired to procure a loan of $2,500 and secure the same with a mortgage on the lands in controversy then owned by Ella L. Hart. She appointed the appellee C. L. Hart, her husband, as her agent to negotiate the loan. In furtherance of this purpose, he entered into the following contract: "Bentonville, Ark. April 28, 1902. To Holmes & Hibbard, Springfield, Mo. I hereby appoint you my agent to negotiate for me a loan of $2,500.00 for five years, to be secured by note or notes and deeds of trust, in form required by you, upon my real estate described in my application herewith. I agree to pay 8 per cent. per annum interest, payable semiannually. Of the said interest it is understood that all the excess above 5 and ½ per cent. per annum (or 5 per cent., if you so elect) may be secured by separate notes and a second deed of trust, leaving the principal notes and deed of trust to draw only 5 and ½ per cent. interest (or 5 per cent. if you so elect). Upon said principal note I shall have the privilege to pay $100.00 or any multiple thereof at the maturity of any coupon by giving the holder thirty days' notice. That part of the interest above specified which is secured by the second deed of trust shall be payable to Holmes & Hibbard, Springfield, Mo. (semiannually or in the annual installment). In consideration of your services in the negotiation of said loan, I hereby agree to pay you a commission of ——— per cent. on said sum, cash, payable out of said loan. I also agree to pay the actual cost necessary to procure an abstract of title, to perfect the same showing the deeds of trust to be the first lien, and to deliver said abstract to you to be held until the loan is paid off. I also agree to pay for recording the deeds of trust. And, further, in case I shall refuse or be unable to execute the papers in accordance with said application after the loan has been approved by you, I agree to pay the expenses which you have incurred in the examination of the title and security. And you are hereby authorized and instructed to pay off and discharge all existing liens on the above-described lands with the proceeds of the loan applied for, paying me or my appointee the balance, after deducting the above-named commission and charges and money advanced to remove existing liens. I make W. H. Conine, of Bentonville, Ark., my local agent in the negotiation of this loan. [Signed] C. L. Hart." Pursuant to this contract, C. L. Hart and Ella L. Hart received from Holmes & Hibbard the sum of $2,500 in cash, and executed to Holmes & Gay or bearer their three promissory notes of the date of June 17, 1902—two for $1,000 each and one for $500, payable on or before July 1, 1907, and bearing interest at the rate of 5½ per cent. from date until paid, payable semiannually on the 1st day of January and July of each year; said interest being evidenced by coupons attached to said notes. The notes had stamped upon them "Privilege reserved to pay $100.00 or any multiple thereof at the maturity of any coupon"; but this clause was not stamped upon the deed of trust, which was executed by them at the same time, conveying the lands in controversy to L. H. Holmes as trustee, to secure the payment of said notes and interest coupons. The deed of trust was duly recorded June 20, 1902. At the time of the execution and delivery of said notes and deed of trust, said C. L. Hart and Ella L. Hart also executed and delivered to said Holmes & Hibbard 10 promissory notes of the same date for $31.25 each, payable to Harry Hibbard or bearer, and due each six months thereafter—that is, payable in January and July of each year from January, 1903, to July, 1907, inclusive—and each bearing 6 per cent. interest after maturity. The aggregate amount of these notes is $312.50. They were secured by a second deed of trust conveying the same lands to L. H. Holmes, trustee, which was recorded on the same day as the first deed of trust, but after the first deed. Neither of these 10 notes nor the deed of trust given to secure the same contained the words "or before" as to time of payment, nor any privilege of paying any part of any note before it became due by its terms. After the notes and deeds of trust were delivered to Holmes & Hibbard, they delivered the first-mentioned three notes and deed of trust to Holmes & Gay, retaining the authority to collect the interest and principal as agents for said Holmes & Gay. The other notes payable to Harry Hibbard they retained as their own property. The interest coupons due on said first three promissory notes January 1, 1903, and the first of said 10 notes due at that time, were paid to Holmes & Hibbard when due, and, shortly after the next interest coupons on the $2,500 and the next note for $31.25 became due, the said Ella L. Hart paid them with interest to time of payment, and also paid the principal sum of $2,500. Said Holmes & Hibbard delivered up to them the note of $31.25, and procured from Holmes & Gay and delivered up to her said three notes for $2,500. They also had Holmes & Gay to execute a deed of release thereof. The remaining eight notes of $31.25 each and the second deed of trust given to secure the same were retained by said Holmes & Hibbard. Afterwards, in a division of notes between the said L. H. Holmes and Harry Hibbard, said eight notes and deed of trust fell to Harry Hibbard as his individual property. On the 11th day of December, 1903, he sold and assigned them to H. G. Peabody, of Green county, Ill., who afterwards died intestate. Appellant John L. Eldred was duly appointed administrator of her estate by the probate court of said county. After the execution of the deeds of trust, and before the commencement of this action, Ella L. Hart and C. L. Hart, her husband, conveyed the lands to other parties, who were duly made defendants. The court held that the contracts and agreements in evidence constituted one transaction, and was a loan of $2,500 at 8 per cent. interest per annum, payable on or before five years from date; that the payment of $2,500 with 8 per cent. interest from date of notes till time of payment discharged the entire indebtedness represented by all obligations executed by them; that the notes sued on were thus paid off and discharged, and are not enforceable for want of consideration; that, if the notes sued on are considered a separate obligation from other notes and enforceable after the payment of the principal obligation of $2,500 and a further sum equal to 8 per cent. per annum thereon to date of such payment, such contract would be usurious, and void. Accordingly the complaint was dismissed for want of equity, and an appeal has been taken to this court.

It will be observed that the parties to the contract by its terms made the principal sum of $2,500, with interest on it at 5½ per cent., should become due on or before five years after date. In other words, it was payable within the prescribed time at the option of the borrower. The balance of $312.50 consisted of 10 notes of $31.25, payable semiannually without any conditions whatever. The intention of the parties as shown by their written contract was to provide for a loan for five years, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent., and the time of payment was fixed by the notes. It is well settled that the interest which will accrue during the period of the loan may be divided up to suit the parties and separate obligations given for all or any part of it, and this is usually done.

Scruggs v. Scottish Mortgage Co., 54 Ark. 566, 16 S. W. 563; Banks v. Flint, 54 Ark. 40, 14 S. W. 769, 16 S. W. 477, 10 L. R. A. 459. If the parties had the right to divide up the principal sum and the interest which would accrue into separate obligations to suit their convenience, it necessarily follows that the time of payment of these separate obligations might be fixed at a given date, or an option might be given the makers within which to pay the notes, or some of the notes might be made payable on or before a given date, and the remainder payable on fixed date. The latter plan was adopted in the present case. So then, each note became a binding obligation payable according to its own terms. It is claimed by appellees that this construction renders the contract usurious and void. If it appears that the contract in its inception was a result of a device or subterfuge by which the borrower was compelled, in order to get the money, to pay a larger amount of interest than is allowed by statute, the notes will be determined to be usurious. Jordan v. Mitchell, 25 Ark. 258. In the present case Hart had the option to let the loan run for the entire period of five years, and, if he had done so, the undisputed facts show that he would have paid 8 per cent. interest. The parties had the right when the contract was made to divide up the payments for interest to suit their own convenience and to have separate obligations given for all or any part of it. This seems to have been the plan adopted. If Hart had let the loan run for the full period of five years, he does not claim that he would have paid more than 8 per cent. interest. He could not have been compelled to have paid it before that time. He did not obligate himself to do so. He only obligated himself to pay the interest as it accrued before the principal sum fell due. So, then, it is undisputed that, by the terms of the contract as it could have been enforced against him, it was not affected with usury. The payment made by appellee Hart was voluntary, and was in the exercise of an option given him by the contract. "When a debt, including both principal and interest and due by installments, if paid according to the terms of the contract, is free from usury, the transaction is not rendered usurious by the voluntary payment of the debt in full before some of the installments matured, although as a result the creditor would receive, in the aggregate, a sum amounting to more than the principal and the maximum legal rate of interest." Savannah Savings Bank v. Logan, 99 Ga. 291, 25 S. E. 692; Keckley v. Union Bank, 79 Va. 458. If the lenders had exercised their option to declare the whole indebtedness due for failure of the borrower to fulfill a certain stipulation of the deed of trust, still there would have been no usury, but in such a case a court of equity would treat the stipulation as a penalty, and refuse to enforce it except upon a cancellation of the unearned interest notes, as was done in the case cited by appellees of Dugan v. Lewis, 79 Tex. 246, 14 S. W. 1024, 12 L. R. A. 93, 23 Am. St. Rep. 332. This salutary rule was applied in this court in the case of Chaffe & Sons v. Landers, Admr., et al., 46 Ark. 364, and in earlier cases cited therein. As stated by Judge Riddick in the case of Leonhard v. Flood, 68 Ark. 162, 56 S. W. 781: "Our law visits on a lender who contracts for usurious interest, however small, a forfeiture of his entire loan and the interest thereon. It follows from the plainest principles of justice that such a defense should be clearly shown before the forfeiture is declared. For this reason usury will not be inferred where, from the circumstances, the opposite conclusion can be reasonably and fairly reached." We are of the opinion that the chancellor erred in refusing to hold that the notes sued on were valid obligations of the appellees, C. L. Hart and Ella L. Hart, and in dismissing the complaint for want of equity.

The decree is therefore reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a decree in accordance with this opinion.

SMITH v. ST. LOUIS TRANSIT CO.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Oct. 20, 1908.)

1. DAMAGES (§ 159*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—LOSS OF EARNINGS—PLEADING.

Plaintiff was injured in July, 1904, when he was a guard at the St. Louis Exposition, and suffered no loss of earnings until the close of the Exposition, on December 1, 1904. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to recover for loss of earnings due to his injury from that date to the trial under an averment that he "had or would lose" them.

2. PLEADING (§ 252*)—AMENDMENT—EFFECT.

Where an amended petition was not objected to as pleading a new cause of action, it related back to the commencement of the action, so that an allegation that plaintiff would lose earnings in the future was not a waiver of any claim for loss of earnings prior to the filing of the amendment.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Geo. H. Shields, Judge.

Action by Vasco V. Smith against the St. Louis Transit Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Boyle & Priest and T. E. Francis, for appellant. Jos. A. Wright, for respondent.

GOODE, J. This plaintiff recovered a judgment of $2,000 against the defendant company for the fracture of his arm. The accident occurred on July 25, 1904. Plaintiff was on said date a passenger on one of defendant's west-bound cars on Market street. He was seated on the south side of the car, next to a window, with his elbow resting on the window sill. According to the petition, his elbow projected two inches outside the car he was in, and a car passing in the opposite direction on a parallel track struck his elbow, and broke the arm.

The main propositions involved in the case were considered and settled on a former appeal. 120 Mo. App. 328, 97 S. W. 218. But one question is presented for decision on the present appeal, and this is an assignment of error relating to the instruction given on the measure of damages. Said instruction is as follows: "If the jury find for plaintiff, they should assess his damages at such sum as they believe from the evidence will be fair compensation to him (1) for any pain of body and mind that plaintiff has suffered, or will suffer by reason of his injuries, and directly caused thereby; (2) for any loss of earnings of his labor that he suffered, or will suffer, by reason of his injuries and directly caused thereby." Two grounds are urged against the propriety of the foregoing instruction. One is that it authorized an award of damages for a loss of earnings previously sustained by plaintiff, when there was no proof he had lost any earnings in consequence of his injury, and the other is that the petition does not allege plaintiff had lost earnings, but only that he would lose them in the future. This portion of the petition may be quoted: "That, as a direct result of the injuries thus sustained, plaintiff's arm has been rendered permanently stiff, and its use greatly and permanently impaired; that he has and will suffer great pain of body and mind. He has incurred and become obligated for, and will incur and become obligated for, large expenses for medical attention, medicines, and nursing, and his earning capacity has been permanently impaired, and he will in the future lose greatly from the earnings of his labor, all to his injury and damage in the sum of four thousand five hundred dollars ($4,500), for which sum he prays judgment against defendant and for his costs." We have quoted from the second amended petition, which was filed after the case was reversed and remanded on the first appeal. What the previous petitions alleged regarding loss of earnings we do not know, as they have not been preserved in the record. As has been stated, the accident occurred in July, 1904, and, according to the testimony, plaintiff had suffered no loss of earnings prior to the date the case was begun. When hurt he was employed as a guard on the grounds of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition, and he swore his salary as guard was paid, notwithstanding his injury, until the close of the Exposition, December 1, 1904. Therefore it appears plaintiff could not have alleged truly when he began the action he had suffered loss of earnings. But, though he had lost no salary or earnings by said date, he was entitled to a verdict for whatever earnings he had lost from then to the trial in consequence of his injury on an averment either that he had or would lose them. Cook v. Redman, 45 Mo. App. 497; 1 Sutherland, Damages (3d Ed.) § 113. The true question is whether the allegation that plaintiff "will in the future lose greatly from the earnings of his labor," contained in the amended petition filed long after the suit was brought, ought to be regarded as waiving any claim for loss of earnings prior to the date it was filed. Was it apt to lead defendant to believe no demand was made on account of earnings except such as would be lost subsequent to said date, and thereby prevent defendant from getting ready to contest a claim for a loss of that kind sustained before the filing of the amended petition? We think this view ought not to be accepted. It has not been shown or asserted the amended petition filed December 10, 1906, set up a new cause of action. Hence it related back to the date of the commencement of the action, to wit, September 7, 1904, when the first petition was filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court. 1 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 621; Fleenor v. Taggart, 116 Ind. 189, 18 N. E. 606; Mann v. Schroer, 50 Mo. 306; Wheeler v. Milling Co., 73 Mo. App. 672.

It is insisted the evidence has no tendency to prove plaintiff had lost any earnings in consequence of the accident to his arm. The injury was a permanent one. At the time of the trial plaintiff could not move his arm easily, and the physician swore the condition would be permanent. Besides, the arm was shrunken in size in comparison with the uninjured one. It is conceded these facts tend to prove a loss of earning capacity, but counsel insist they do not prove actual loss of time or earnings. Before plaintiff came to St. Louis in March, 1904, and took employment as an Exposition guard, he lived in Bellingham in the state of Washington, and was engaged as a salesman in a shoe store. His salary was $20 a week. His salary as guard was $55.25 a month. After the Exposition closed, he went to his home in Ohio, stayed there three months with his father; then came to St. Louis for the first trial of the case, afterwards went to Bellingham again and accepted employment in a drug store where he worked for four months at $2 a day, or, at most, $14 a week. Subsequent to that employment he had rheumatism in his injured arm for a month and did nothing. He went to Medical Lake, Wash., and took treatment; working, however, in caring for the baths there for three months. He then went to Marion, Ind., where he was idle a year; but the reason for his idleness was not stated, defendant's counsel objecting to plaintiff's stating the reason. We think the foregoing testimony conduces to prove plaintiff had lost time from work and earned less while at work in consequence of his injury. It is a fair inference that he was forced into idleness by rheumatism in his injured arm, and what wages he received when employed were less than had been paid him before.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

T. S. HOLLENBECK & CO. v. MERCANTILE TOWN MUT. FIRE INS. CO.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Oct. 6, 1908.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 335*)—FIRE INSURANCE—INVOICES—FAILURE TO KEEP—EFFECT.

A fire policy covering merchandise was voided for insured's failure to keep a cash account of goods sold, an invoice of goods purchased, and an inventory, as required by the policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 853; Dec. Dig. § 335.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 283*) — FIRE INSURANCE — MORTGAGES—FAILURE TO DISCLOSE—EFFECT.

A fire policy is voided by insured's failure to disclose a mortgage in his application, when asked whether any existed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 636, 640, 641; Dec. Dig. § 283.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 379*) — APPLICATION — ANSWERS BY INSURER'S AGENT—EFFECT.

Insured is not bound by the answers to the questions propounded in the application, unless when he signed it he knew of the questions and answers as written by insurer's agent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 999; Dec. Dig. § 379.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 668*) — APPLICATION — CONTENTS—INSURED'S KNOWLEDGE—JURY QUESTION.

In an action on a fire policy, held, under the evidence, a jury question whether, when insured signed the application, he knew the nature of the questions and answers written therein by insurer's agent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1735, 1758; Dec. Dig. § 668.*]

5. INSURANCE (§ 559*) — PROOFS OF LOSS — WAIVER—DENIAL OF LIABILITY.

By denying any liability, insurer waives formal proof of loss, as required by the policy.

Appeal from Circuit Court, New Madrid County; Henry C. Riley, Judge.

Action by T. S. Hollenbeck & Co. against the Mercantile Town Mutual Fire Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Partly reversed and partly affirmed.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes.

Brown & Hubbard and Barclay & Fauntleroy, for appellant. H. C. Riley, Jr., and Ward & Collins, for respondent.

BLAND, P. J. Defendant company by its policy, dated May 30, 1904, insured plaintiff against loss by fire as follows: Six hundred dollars on his one-story frame building, situated on lot 11, block 18, in the town of Portageville, New Madrid county, Mo.; $400 on his stock of merchandise, consisting principally of drugs and medicines, located in said building. In December, 1904, and during the life of the policy, the building was totally destroyed by fire, as was the greater part of the merchandise covered by the policy. The action is on the policy, to recover the fire loss. Plaintiff recovered the full amount of the insurance. The policy contained the following provisions: "Book and Inventory Clause.—It is expressly stipulated and made a condition of this contract that: First. The assured will take an itemized inventory of stock hereby insured at least once in each calendar year, and unless such inventory shall have been taken within twelve (12) calendar months prior to the date of this policy, the same shall be taken in detail within thirty (30) days after said date, or this policy shall be null and void from and after the expiration of said thirty (30) days, and upon demand of the assured the unearned premium for the unexpired time of this policy shall be returned. Second. The assured will keep a set of books, which shall clearly and plainly present in detail a complete record of the business transacted, including all purchases, sales and shipments of said stock, both for cash and credit, from the date of the inventory provided for in the first section of this clause, and during the continuance of this policy. Third. The assured shall keep such books and inventory, and also the last preceding inventory, securely locked in fireproof safe at night, and at all times when the building mentioned in this policy, or the portion thereof containing the stock described therein, is not actually open for business; or, failing in this, the assured will keep such books and inventories, at night and at all such times, in some place not exposed to a fire which would ignite or destroy the aforesaid building; and, in case of loss, the assured specifically warrants, agrees and covenants to produce such books and inventories for the inspection of said company. Fourth. In the event of failure on the part of assured to keep and produce such books and inventories for the inspection of said company, this entire policy shall become null and void, and such failure shall constitute a perpetual bar to any recovery thereon."

1. Plaintiff's evidence shows affirmatively that he failed to comply with the iron-safe clause of the policy, in this, that he kept no cash account of goods sold, no invoice of goods purchased, nor did he have on hand any invoice taken before or after the policy was issued. This was a failure to comply with the substantial provisions of the iron-safe clause, and takes the case out of the ruling of Malin v. Ins. Co., 105 Mo. App. 625, 80 S. W. 56, cited and relied on by plaintiff, and brings it within the ruling of Gillum & Co. v. Fire Ass'n, 106 Mo. App. 673, 80 S. W. 233, and Johnson v. Fire Ins. Co., 120 Mo. App. 80, 96 S. W. 697. The policy was voided as to the merchandise, for failure to comply with the provisions of the iron-safe clause (Johnson v. Fire Ins. Co., supra; Gillum & Co. v. Fire Ass'n, 106 Mo. App., loc. cit. 679, 80 S. W. 233; Bruer v. Kansas Mut. Life Ins. Co., 100 Mo. App. 540, 75 S. W. 380; Gibson v. Mo. Town. Mut. Ins. Co., 82 Mo. App. 515; Origler v. Ins. Co., 49 Mo. App. 11), and the court should have given defendant's instruction to the effect that plaintiff could not recover for the loss of the merchandise.

2. The following printed interrogatories appear in the application for insurance: "(1) Are you the sole and absolute owner of the property to be insured?" The answer in writing is "Yes." "(2) Is the property mortgaged or otherwise incumbered?" The answer in writing is "No." The policy contained the following clause: "This entire policy shall be void if the insured has concealed or misrepresented, in writing or otherwise, any material fact or circumstance concerning this insurance or the subject thereof; or if the interest of the insured in the property be not truly stated herein; or in case of any fraud or false swearing by the insured touching any matter relating to this insurance or the subject thereof, whether before or after a loss." Plaintiff's evidence shows he was the owner of the building, but that it was mortgaged to the county of New Madrid, to secure a school note, for the sum of $450, at the time the application for insurance was made, and that the debt had not been paid at the time of the trial. Plaintiff testified that defendant's agent came to the premises and solicited the insurance; that he inquired about the dimensions of the building, asked about the flues, etc., but asked no questions about mortgages or incumbrances; that after he (plaintiff) had agreed to take the insurance, and had truthfully answered such questions as he was asked about the property, the agent went away, and in a few hours returned with the application for insurance, with the blanks filled in, and asked him to sign it, but did not read or offer to read the application to him; that he (plaintiff) "skimmed" over it, and then signed it. Plaintiff testified that he did not see the answer "No" to the question, "Is the property mortgaged or otherwise incumbered"; that the agent did not call his attention to it, and at no time asked him any such question; that the answer to the question was not his answer, was not in his handwriting, and he did not know it was in the application at the time he signed it; that he made truthful answers to all questions asked him by the agent; that he did not think the fact that the property was mortgaged was material to the risk; that if he had thought so, he would have volunteered the information to the agent, and testified that all he did to secure the insurance was done in good faith. The agent testified that his wife wrote the answers to the questions (not in plaintiff's presence) as dictated by him (the agent), and the answer "No," to the question in regard to the mortgage was in the application when plaintiff signed it. On this evidence the court gave the following instructions: "(2) The court instructs the jury that, if you believe and find from the evidence that plaintiff's application for insurance was prepared by defendant's agent, not in the presence of, and without the assistance of, plaintiff, and that said agent, after preparing the said application, presented the same to the plaintiff, and requested the plaintiff to sign the same, which plaintiff then and there did, then you are instructed that the fact that said property was mortgaged or incumbered at the time plaintiff signed said application for insurance constitutes no defense to this action provided that you further find from the evidence that the answer 'No,' relative to the question in said application as to whether or not said property so insured was mortgaged or incumbered, was the act of defendant's agent, and without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, and the answer 'Yes' to the question, 'are you the sole and absolute owner of the property to be insured.'" "(4) The court instructs the jury that all that was required of plaintiff in making his application for insurance was to make truthful answers to all questions asked him by the agent of defendant, and to make known to defendant's agent any fact, known by plaintiff to be material, touching said application and insurance not inquired of by the agent or defendant, and if you believe from the evidence that plaintiff made truthful answers to all questions put to him by the agent of defendant at the time said application for said insurance was made, and the plaintiff did not intentionally fail to communicate any material fact to said agent of defendant touching said application and insurance, and that said application for insurance was prepared by the agent of defendant, by said agent writing the answers to the questions contained in said application, and that said agent, after having so prepared said application, presented the same to plaintiff, and at the same time represented and stated to plaintiff that the said application was properly and correctly prepared, and requested the plaintiff to sign the same, and that plaintiff, confiding in the honesty and veracity of the statements and representations of the defendant's agent, thereupon signed said application for insurance without reading the same, or having the same read to him, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff." The mortgage was material to the risk, and, if plaintiff failed to disclose it (if he was requested to do so), his failure voided the policy as to the building. Cagle v. Ins. Co., 78 Mo. App. 215; Baxter v. Ins. Co., 65 Mo. App. 255. But the undisputed evidence is that plaintiff was not required to disclose the mortgage, and that the application for the insurance was prepared by defendant's agent in the absence of plaintiff, and that, after being prepared, it was not read to him; therefore the application was the act of defendant, not of plaintiff. Bushnell v. Ins. Co., 110 Mo. App., loc. cit. 227, 228, 85 S. W. 103, and cases cited therein. Plaintiff is not bound by the answers to the questions propounded in the application, unless he had knowledge of the questions and answers thereto, as written in the application, when he signed it. Whether or not he had such knowledge was a question of fact for the jury, which they found in plaintiff's favor, under proper instructions given by the court and set out above.

3. Timely proofs of loss were not furnished, and defendant sets up this fact as a defense. In his reply plaintiff pleads that defendant waived proofs of loss by denying all liability on the policy, assigning as a ground therefor that plaintiff made false statements in his application for insurance. The evidence shows that defendant denied all liability for the reasons stated in the reply. On this feature of the case the court gave the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that, if you believe from the evidence that within 60 days after the destruction of said building, merchandise, and drugs the defendant was notified thereof, and that the defendant denied any liability upon the policy of insurance, on the sole ground of an alleged false statement as to a mortgage upon said property in procuring said policy, and has continued to deny all liability for said reason, then this amounted to a waiver of formal proof of loss, and defendant's failure to keep a set of books and inventory is waived, and the jury will find the issues for the plaintiff." This instruction is in accord with sound reasoning, and in harmony with the ruling of Weber v. Ins. Co., 35 Mo. App. 521; Hooker v. Ins. Co., 60 Mo. App. 141.

4. Exceptions were saved to the giving of other instructions, as well as to the admission of evidence tending to show plaintiff acted in good faith in applying for the insurance. We deem it unnecessary to discuss these exceptions, for the reason the evidence is clear and convincing that plaintiff is entitled to recover for the loss on the building.

The judgment for the loss of the merchdise is reversed. The judgment for the loss of the building is affirmed. All concur.

CENTRAL MANTEL CO. v. THALER et al.
(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Oct. 20,
1. PLEADING (§ 139*)—COUNTERCLAIM—NECESSITY.

Where plaintiff sued on a quantum meruit for the reasonable value of certain mantels and materials furnished, and defendant pleaded only defects in the work, an instruction that if plaintiff failed to furnish proper mantels, or did not properly set them, the jury might deduct from the balance owing plaintiff such an amount as would compensate defendant owner for the damage he had sustained from plaintiff's default, was erroneous, as permitting defendant to recover on a counterclaim not pleaded for breach of contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 287; Dec. Dig. § 139.*]

2. CONTRACTS (§ 305*)—PERFORMANCE—PAYMENT—EFFECT.

Where defendant, after having made specific objections to plaintiff's work in installing certain mantels, agreed to pay plaintiff the balance due on the contract if he would alter the work in accordance with the objections, that defendant gave plaintiff an order for the balance on the belief that the objections had been obviated would not estop him from thereafter objecting that the alterations had not been properly made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Dec. Dig. § 305.*]

3. CONTRACTS (§ 349*)—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—RES INTER ALIOS ACTA.

Where defendant objected to plaintiff's work in installing certain mantels because of broken tiles, evidence that other floor contractors whom plaintiff claimed had broken the tiles had agreed to pay plaintiff for relaying them was irrelevant.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Jesse McDonald, Judge.

Action by the Central Mantel Company against Solomon Thaler and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

S. N. & S. C. Taylor, for appellant. E. E. Schnepf, for respondents.

GOODE, J. This action was instituted to enforce a mechanic's lien for a balance alleged to be due plaintiff for furnishing and setting mantels and tiling in four flat buildings. The total charge for the mantels and the tiling around them was $900, and of this sum the owner of the premises, Thaler, paid $850. He refused to pay the balance because he found three faults in the material and workmanship after the mantels had been set. These faults were a patch glued on an upright column of one of the mantels, a warp or bend away from the wall of the room in one column of another mantel, and corners broken off some of the tiles. Thaler called attention to those faults, and plaintiff agreed to correct them and sent workmen to the building for the purpose. Testimony for plaintiff shows all the matters of which Thaler complained were altered to his satisfaction, and on May 15, 1906, he gave a written order for the balance of $50 to one of the Murphys, who are the other defendants in the case, and whose interest grows out of a deed of trust held by them on the premises. The order was given pursuant to an arrangement by which the Murphys were to advance money to pay obligations incurred by Thaler in building the houses. Thaler admitted giving the order, but sought to obviate the force of the circumstance as showing an acceptance of the work. He swore, as did plaintiff's witnesses, it was agreed between him and plaintiff the defects in the tiles and mantels should be made good, and that while he was on the premises one day a workman of plaintiff's came there to make the proper alterations, and he (Thaler), taking it for granted they would be made according to the agreement, signed the order for the balance of the price and sent it to plaintiff; but, on subsequently finding the defects had not been corrected, he stopped payment of the order. There is a conflict of evidence regarding whether the faults in the tiles and mantels were corrected as agreed, and also whether Thaler gave the order under the circumstances he swore and then stopped payment of it, or gave it after he had fully examined the alterations and expressed satisfaction with them. The action is quantum meruit for the reasonable value of the work and materials done and furnished by plaintiff, after crediting the lien account with the amount defendant has paid. No counterclaim was filed, but at the trial counsel for Thaler offered testimony of the amount of damage sustained by Thaler in consequence of defects in the job. This evidence was excluded by the court, and, as far as the reception of testimony was concerned, the case was tried on the theory that the essential issue was the reasonable value of plaintiff's work and material. This theory was adopted, too, in the instructions granted on plaintiff's request, but at the instance of defendant the court gave the following instruction, of which complaint is made: "The court instructs the jury that if you believe from the evidence that the Central Mantel Company failed to furnish material and work for said mantel work for Solomon Thaler for furnishing mantels for the building No. 4530-32 Washington avenue, St. Louis, and furnished inferior mantels or failed to properly set same, or all the above, then the jury may, if in your judgment you see fit, deduct from the balance owing said plaintiff company under said claim such an amount or amounts as you believe from the evidence will compensate the said Thaler for damage,

If you so find, he has sustained from the failure of said company to furnish work and materials of the reasonable value of $900."

1. The language of that instruction is confused; but plainly it diverged from the issue of the reasonable value of the work and material, and threw into the case the question of damage sustained by Thaler on account of a breach by plaintiff of either an express or implied contract to furnish a certain quality of material and do a certain quality of work. No contract of either sort was declared on by plaintiff or interposed as a counterclaim by defendant. It appears from the evidence the original agreement between plaintiff and Thaler called for mantels of medium grade, and it was not shown those furnished were inferior to this grade, but only that there were defects in two of them. Neither ~~was~~ it said or proved the tiling was of an inferior kind, but only that the corners of some of the tiles were broken off. Therefore the jury was permitted to find against the plaintiff on a counterclaim not pleaded, and of which there was no evidence. It was competent for defendant to show the faults of which he complained, not as proof of damages suffered from a breach of contract, but as bearing on the reasonable value of the work and material. As the instruction under review submitted the cause on a question not presented by either the pleadings or the proof, it is erroneous. McClure v. Feldmann, 184 Mo. 710, 84 S. W. 16.

2. Counsel for defendant maintain that, because the instructions given for plaintiff advised the jury they should return a verdict in plaintiff's favor if they believed the material furnished and labor performed were reasonably worth $900, the proper view is that the above instruction given for defendant left it to the jury to say whether, if plaintiff furnished inferior or defective mantels or failed properly to set them, the job was of the reasonable value of $900. This interpretation cannot be accepted without disregarding the language of the instruction, which implies the breach of a contract to furnish material and do work of a certain quality, thereby entitling defendant to compensation for his damages. In other words, the charge proceeded on the theory that defendant ought to recover whatever damage he had sustained to his property as a whole on account of plaintiff's breach, instead of having the defects taken account of in arriving at the reasonable value of the work and material. The instructions for plaintiff and the one given for defendant are inconsistent, and, in view of the pleadings, the latter should not have been given. Desnoyers Shoe Co. v. Lisman, 85 Mo. App. 340.

3. Plaintiff asked the court to instruct that if the jury found defendant made specific complaint of the tiling and mantels after they were in place, and agreed with plaintiff to pay the balance of $50 if plaintiff would alter the work in accordance with defendant's objections, and further found plaintiff, pursuant to this agreement, made the requested alterations, and thereafter Thaler gave a written order for the $50 balance, he was estopped to assert the work was defectively done. The order under those conditions would not estop Thaler, at least, unless he knew fully the character of the alterations when he gave it. But, if he agreed, if plaintiff would make certain changes in the work, he would pay the balance claimed, and those changes were made, he was, of course, liable for the balance. The order was simply an item of evidence tending to show the alterations were made as agreed.

4. The corners of some of the tiles were broken by the men who laid the hardwood floors, and the evidence tends to prove the contractor to lay the floors paid the mantel company to replace the broken tiles with whole ones. Evidence of these facts was received over the objection of plaintiff's counsel, for the purpose, the court said, of showing the feeling existing between the parties to this cause. We think it was not competent for any purpose, as it was a transaction between the contractor for the floors and the mantel company, with which Thaler had no concern. Both parties to this action concede plaintiff agreed to fix the tiles; and the question of whether or not some third party paid the expense of fixing them is immaterial. The true question at this point was whether plaintiff did fix them in accordance with its agreement to do so.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded. All concur.

Jno. T. Murphy, for appellant. Arthur N. Sager, for the State.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

GOODE, J. This appellant was convicted of the crime of petit larceny for stealing rugs, portieres, scarfs, towels, napkins, and other similar articles from the Usona Hotel in the city of St. Louis. The indictment was for grand larceny, and the evidence shows the property stolen was worth several hundred dollars; but the jury returned a verdict for petit larceny. Appellant's name is spelled sometimes in the record before us as Wolken, but as Walken in the indictment. No briefs or abstracts have been submitted, and we only know the errors relied on for reversal from the motion for new trial, which says the verdict is against the evidence and that the court erred in rulings on the evidence and in giving instructions.

We have gone through the entire record of more than 400 pages, and find the evidence leaves no doubt of appellant's guilt. She was housekeeper for six months prior to April 15, 1907, at the Usona Hotel in St. Louis, of which Mrs. Elizabeth Boogher was proprietor. As housekeeper, appellant had charge of the bed linen and napery of the establishment and keys to all the rooms. It was her duty to take care of the linen and distribute it as needed to the different rooms. Prior to April 15th she had rented a house at No. 4000 Delmar avenue wherein to take lodgers—a rooming house it is called. When she left the Usona Hotel she took away, or had sent after her, three trunks and several boxes, and besides had a negro boy, who worked at the hotel, carry away a wash basket full of stuff. This negro went with her to her rooming house and worked for her a short time. When the trunks and boxes were opened, several rugs and various articles of linen, like napkins, tablecloths, etc., were taken out of them. The boy recognized these articles as property of the Usona Hotel, and, indeed, the name of the hotel was on many of them. He reported the fact to Mrs. Boogher, and on May 7th she and her son and two officers went to the lodging house on Delmar avenue to search it. Mrs. Walken at first said, on being accused of taking the articles, that she had taken nothing but two napkins. Some rugs were found on the floors, and she admitted taking them, but said they were all. Afterwards table linen was discovered with the name of the Usona Hotel on it, and she said she had taken that, but no more; and so as the searching party went through the establishment, finding articles in each room, she admitted taking them, but protested against further search, saying her lodgers would be disturbed and she had nothing more.

According to the testimony of the officers, and of Mrs. Boogher and her son, appellant admitted she had taken away the various pieces they had discovered and offered no explanation of her act. Circumstances besides those narrated, and tending to prove appellant's guilt, were put in evidence. A physician, who was put on the stand by appellant, apparently to account for her admissions, testified her nervous condition, when the searching party was going through her house, was such that she could not make clear answers to questions. Her own explanation, when on the witness stand, as to how she came to take table linen with the name of the Usona Hotel on it, was about as follows: She had arranged, several weeks before she left the Usona, to keep the rooming house on Delmar, and another woman was going to be her partner in the enterprise. This woman had advanced her money with which to buy rugs and linen to be used in their business. She used the money to buy napkins, and perhaps other pieces, and these became mixed with the Usona linen in laundering, while she was still housekeeper there, and when she was leaving she did not think it was necessary to select her own articles from among the Usona linen, but thought it would be all right to take the same number of pieces with the Usona's name on them. Appellant also swore the rugs she had at the Delmar house had been sent to her by the woman who was to be her partner. It is useless to pursue the evidence in this case, for it amply supports the verdict.

We have examined the instructions given by the court, which covered the entire case, and find no error in them. It is permissible to convict a defendant of petit larceny under an indictment for grand larceny, if the evidence shows the value of the property stolen was less than $30. Rev. St. 1899, § 1911 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 1304). The jury must have found the property taken by appellant was less than $30 in value, and this was a merciful verdict.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

TOWER GROVE PLANING MILL CO. v. HORNBERG et al.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Nov. 5, 1908.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 271*)—PRESENTATION AND RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW —EXCEPTIONS—NECESSITY.

The denial of a motion to amend a notice of appeal from a justice's court to the circuit court, and the granting of a motion to dismiss the appeal because sufficient notice had not been given, cannot be reviewed, where no exceptions were saved to either ruling, notwithstanding a motion for rehearing was thereafter filed and overruled, and exception saved thereto.

Appeal from Circuit Court, St. Louis County; J. W. McElhinny, Judge.

Mechanic's lien foreclosure in a justice's court by the Tower Grove Planing Mill Company against R. J. Hornberg and others. There was a judgment in the justice's court for plaintiff, and defendants appealed to the circuit court, which appeal was dismissed, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. M. Kittrell, for appellants. Lubke & Lubke, for respondent.

GOODE, J. This was an action instituted before a justice of the peace to enforce a mechanic's lien. It went on appeal to the circuit court, where the appellee filed a motion to dismiss the appeal because sufficient notice of it had not been given. This motion was sustained, and a motion filed by appellants in the appeal from the justice for permission to amend the notice of appeal was overruled. The rulings on those two motions, to wit, the one for leave to amend notice of appeal and the other to dismiss the appeal, have been brought to this court for examination; but we are of the opinion they cannot be reviewed here, because appellants saved no exception to the ruling of the court on either of the motions. Afterwards a motion for rehearing was filed and overruled, and appellants saved an exception to that; but this was not enough. It was necessary to except to the rulings on the motions when made, if appellants desired to have them examined here. This very point was determined in Am. Wine Co. v. Scholer, 13 Mo. App. 345.

There being no error in the record proper, the judgment is affirmed. All concur.

HEIDBRINK v. UNITED RYS. CO.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals, Missouri. May 28, 1908. Rehearing Denied Oct. 20, 1908.)

1. JURY (§ 97*)—DISQUALIFICATION OF JURORS—BIAS.

In a personal injury action against a street railway, a juror on his voir dire stated that his mother had been struck by one of defendant's cars and that a claim had been presented to defendant, but that it was "not exactly settled satisfactorily"; that the settlement made "would not exactly" influence him against defendant, but he thought it would "almost cause" him to give plaintiff "the benefit of the doubt"; that he thought he could give a fair decision. To the question whether he would lean toward plaintiff on account of the accident to his mother, he answered that if the testimony was about equally balanced he supposed that he would give the benefit of the doubt to plaintiff; and to the question whether he would have a feeling of partiality toward plaintiff, "No, not exactly." Held, that he was disqualified because of bias.

2. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—MATTERS NOT SUPPORTED BY EVIDENCE.

An instruction in a personal injury action to allow any expense necessarily incurred for nursing was improperly given, where there was no evidence that any such expense had been incurred.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Geo. H. Shields, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by Lizzie Heidbrink against the United Railways Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Boyle & Priest, for appellant. Thos. D. Cannon, for respondent.

BLAND, P. J. Olive street runs east and west through the center of the city of St. Louis. Sarah street is in the western part of the city, and runs north and south, crossing Olive street at right angles. In 1906 defendant operated a street railroad over Olive street, and the St. Louis & Suburban Railway Company operated one over Sarah street. The usual place to stop cars running west on Olive street, to receive and discharge passengers, is the west corner of the street crossing. On February 11, 1906, plaintiff, in company with her sister, boarded a west-bound Olive street car, at about 10 o'clock p. m., to be carried to Sarah street. She and her sister occupied the back seat in the car. Just before the car reached Sarah street, plaintiff's sister signaled the conductor to stop the car at the Sarah street crossing. The conductor gave the motorman a bell to stop, and the speed of the car was slackened before it reached the railway tracks on Sarah street, and plaintiff arose from her seat and walked out of the door to the rear platform. After reaching the platform she was either thrown off by a lurch of the car, or walked off and fell upon the street. Plaintiff was badly injured, and the action is to recover her damages.

The petition alleges, and plaintiff's evidence tends to show, that plaintiff arose from her seat when the car was entering the Sarah street crossing, walked to the platform, and stopped and stood at the door, holding to the door handle, waiting for the car to reach the corner and stop, to allow her to get off; that as the car crossed the Sarah street tracks it was given a sudden propulsion, from which an unusual jolt and jerk resulted, causing plaintiff to lose her hold on the door handle and to be thrown off the car to the street. The evidence for defendant, coming from passengers standing on the back platform and a bystander on the street, tends to show there was no spurt of speed and no unusual jerking or jolting of the car as it crossed over the Sarah street tracks, and that plaintiff did not stop on the platform, but walked off the car while it was in motion and fell to the street. Ten of the jurors signed a verdict for plaintiff, and assessed her damages at $2,500.

1. Error is assigned in the action of the court in overruling defendant's challenge for cause of juror Meyer. The examination of this juror on his voir dire disclosed the fact that his mother, about one year previous to the trial, was accidentally struck by one of defendant's cars and injured; that she and the juror presented a claim to the company on account of the injury, and it was settled, but, to use the language of the juror, "not exactly settled satisfactorily." The juror stated that the settlement as made "would not exactly" influence him against the company in any way; but he thought it would "almost cause" him to give plaintiff "the benefit of the doubt"; that he thought he could give a fair decision in the case, and could consider the testimony of both sides, and give the evidence the same consideration as he would any controversy between man and man. On further examination of this juror, the following occurred: "Q. I understood you to state a while ago that you would lean toward the plaintiff in this case on account of that accident having occurred to your mother. Didn't you state that? A. Well, I suppose, if the testimony was about equally balanced, I would have to lean on one side. Q. So that, if the evidence for the defendant would equally balance the evidence for the plaintiff in your judgment, you would give the benefit of the doubt to the plaintiff, and vote to return a verdict in her favor, would you not? A. Well, I suppose I would. I would have to put the doubt either one way or the other. Q. So you will go into the jury box, if selected as a juror, with a feeling of partiality in favor of the plaintiff? A. No, not exactly."

We think the examination of this juror clearly shows that his mind was biased against defendant to such an extent as to disqualify him. He stated over and over that if the evidence was equally balanced he would give the plaintiff "the benefit of the doubt"; in other words, that to his thinking the plaintiff would not be required to prove her case by a preponderance of the evidence, as the law requires she should to entitle her to a verdict. Lord Mansfield said: "A juror should be as white as paper and know neither plaintiff nor defendant, but judge of the issue merely as an abstract proposition upon the evidence produced before him. He should be superior even to a suspicion of partiality." Judge Marshall, in Theobald v. St. Louis Transit Co., 191 Mo., at page 428, 90 S. W., at page 363, after reviewing many cases, said: "The streams of justice should be kept pure and free from prejudice. In the administration of justice, the courts and all judges, as well as the jurors, should, as far as human precaution can avail, be kept free from bias or prejudice." Although Meyer's answers to some of the questions propounded to him were to the effect that he would be governed by the evidence and instructions of the court if selected as a juror, yet his examination as a whole shows he was biased against defendant and could not be a fair juror, though he might be an honest one, and we think the court erred in overruling defendant's challenge.

2. The third clause of the instruction on the measure of damages is as follows: "For any expenses necessarily incurred for medicines, medical attention, or nursing, which the jury may believe from the evidence the plaintiff has sustained or will hereafter sustain by reason of said injuries and directly caused thereby." There was no evidence that plaintiff incurred any expense for nursing, and for this reason the instruction is erroneous.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded. All concur.

BAUM v. STEPHENSON.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Oct. 20, 1908.)

1. PLEADING (§ 8*)—ALLEGATIONS—CONCLUSIONS—EXISTENCE OF PARTNERSHIP.

An allegation that plaintiff and defendant were partners is only a conclusion of the pleader; whether a partnership existed being a question of law, to be determined from the facts alleged and proved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

2. PARTNERSHIP (§ 20*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION.

Plaintiff and defendant agreed to purchase the majority of the shares of a turnpike corporation, and the shares were purchased and divided equally between themselves, each holding the stock in his individual right, and they were afterwards elected officers of the corporation and directed its business, their ultimate purpose in securing control of the turnpike being to construct an electric railroad over the road. Held, that they did not carry on the business as partners, but acted for the corporation, even though they agreed to and did work for the ultimate benefit of each other.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Dec. Dig. § 20.*]

3. PARTNERSHIP (§ 1*)—RELATION.

A "partnership" is a status resulting from contract, its essential elements being a contract to share, as common owners, the profits of the business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 6, pp. 5191-5202; vol. 8, pp. 7746, 7747.]

4. JURY (§ 12*)—RIGHT TO TRIAL BY JURY—LEGAL OR EQUITABLE ACTIONS—RECOVERY OF MONEY ONLY.

Even if plaintiff and defendant were partners, the action not being for a settlement or accounting, but for a money judgment for defendant's fraud in secretly retaining a part of the purchase price of partnership property, the action was one at law, and hence, was triable by jury, within Rev. St. 1899, § 691 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 700), requiring issues of fact in actions for money only to be tried by jury.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Jas. R. Kinealy, Judge.

Action by William Baum against Lloyd Stephenson. From a judgment in part for plaintiff, both parties appeal, defendant being designated as appellant. Reversed and remanded.

Geo. B. Webster, for appellant. W. J. N. Mayer and Lee Sale, for respondent.

BLAND, J. Omitting captions and signatures, the pleadings are as follows:

Petition.

"Plaintiff states that prior to the month of November, 1890, plaintiff and defendant had been associated together in business for several years; that between the years 1884 and 1889 he and the said defendant had been engaged as partners in the practice of law at the city of Shelbyville, in the state of Illinols; that in or about the month of November, 1897, plaintiff and defendant agreed to form a partnership for the purpose of obtaining or controlling a right of way between the cities of East St. Louis and Belleville, in the state of Illinois, over the turnpike between said cities, with a view to the construction and operation of an electric railway between the said cities; that in pursuance of said agreement, and as part thereof, plaintiff and defendant agreed to attempt to obtain a controlling interest in the St. Clair County Turnpike Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Illinois, owning and operating a turnpike road between said cities of East St. Louis and Belleville; that it was further agreed between said parties that all stock so to be purchased should be divided equally between them; each party paying his one-half of the cost thereof, and that all stock so to be purchased should be held and managed in common and by the parties hereto as partners; that neither of said parties should, without the consent of the other, sell any portion of the stock so purchased. Plaintiff further states that, in pursuance of said agreement, plaintiff and defendant did, in November, 1890, purchase three hundred and fifty-seven (357) shares of the capital stock of the said St. Clair County Turnpike Company, each of said parties paying one-half of the purchase price thereof. Plaintiff states that thereafter, in pursuance of said partnership agreement, shares of the capital stock of said St. Clair County Turnpike Company were purchased, from time to time, by said plaintiff and defendant, severally, and that the shares of stock so purchased were thereupon divided equally between plaintiff and defendant, and paid for by the plaintiff and defendant, share and share alike; that the amount of stock so purchased and owned by plaintiff and defendant in the year 1897 aggregated the sum of six hundred and twenty-five (625) shares; that the entire capital stock of said St. Clair Turnpike Company aggregated twelve hundred and seventy (1,270) shares, of which two hundred and seventy (270) shares were at all times herein mentioned retained in the treasury thereof as treasury stock of said company; that for some years prior to the year 1897, in pursuance of said agreement, defendant had occupied the position of president of the said St. Clair County Turnpike Company, and plaintiff during the same time had occupied the position of secretary and treasurer of said company, both plaintiff and defendant receiving the same salary as such officers; that during the entire period prior to 1897, during which plaintiff and defendant were connected with the said turnpike company, plaintiff had active control and management of said company, and devoted all the necessary attention to the business of said company, defendant being, during all said period in poor health, and unable to give his time and attention to the business of the said company. Plaintiff further states that for several years prior to the year 1897, he and the defendant, in conjunction with one D. P. Alexander, had made efforts to obtain franchises that would enable them to build an electric railway over the said turnpike road, and during the said years had respectively obtained various franchises with the view and purpose of building said electric railway from East St. Louis to Belleville, and that each of the said parties had during said period made efforts to interest capitalists in the building of said electric railway, but that prior to the month of November, 1897, all of the efforts of said parties had been of no avail; that in the month of November, 1897, the firm of Townsend, Reed & Co., being desirous of constructing and operating an electric railway between the said cities of East St. Louis and Belleville, over the turnpike then owned by the said St. Clair County Turnpike Company, entered into negotiations with the defendant for the purchase of the six hundred and twenty-five (625) shares of the capital stock of the St. Clair County Turnpike Company, then owned and held by plaintiff and defendant as partners in the manner and upon the terms hereinbefore set out; that all of said negotiations were had by the said firm of Townsend, Reed & Co., with defendant, who was acting on behalf of himself and plaintiff in the city of St. Louis, while plaintiff was residing in the city of Shelbyville, Ill., and attending to the business of said St. Clair County Turnpike Company.

"Plaintiff further states that, in pursuance of said negotiations, plaintiff and defendant did, on November 12, 1897, enter into a contract with said firm of Townsend, Reed & Co., by the terms of which plaintiff and defendant agreed to sell the said six hundred and twenty-five (625) shares of stock so held by them in the St. Clair County Turnpike Company for the sum of forty thousand dollars ($40,000), payable one thousand dollars ($1,000) in cash, and the balance of thirty-nine thousand dollars ($39,000) in one year from the date of the making of said contract, and did further agree to obtain for the said firm of Townsend, Reed & Co. the right to construct and operate a double track railroad on the property and right of way of the St. Clair County Turnpike Company from East St. Louis, Ill., to Belleville, Ill.; that thereupon, and in pursuance of said contract, the sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000) was paid by the said Townsend, Reed & Co. to plaintiff and defendant, each of whom received one-half of the amount so paid, to wit, the sum of five hundred dollars ($500). Plaintiff further states that all of the negotiations leading up to the making of the said contract with Townsend, Reed & Co. were conducted by the defendant Stephenson, acting for himself and plaintiff, and that during the whole of said negotiations the defendant acted as the representative and agent of plaintiff, and of the joint interests held by plaintiff and defendant in the said turnpike company as hereinbefore set out. Plaintiff further states that, at the time of entering into said contract, and as part of the consideration moving from said firm of Townsend, Reed & Co. to plaintiff and defendant for the making of said contract, the said firm of Townsend, Reed & Co. had orally agreed with the defendant that they would deliver to him individually, as an additional consideration, five thousand dollars ($5,000) of first mortgage bonds in a railroad company thereafter to be organized under the laws of the state of Illinois for the purpose of owning and operating a double track railroad between the cities of East St. Louis and Belleville. Plaintiff states that at the time of the making of the contract aforesaid, and during all of the negotiations leading up to the execution of the said contract, defendant concealed from plaintiff the fact that he was to receive the said additional consideration, and for the purpose of concealing said fact did enter into a separate agreement in writing with the said firm of Townsend, Reed & Co. for the delivery to the defendant individually of the said five thousand dollars ($5,000) of bonds. Plaintiff further states that the said agreement so made by defendant was a secret agreement, entered into by defendant in fraud of the rights of plaintiff; that plaintiff at the time of the making of the contract was ignorant of the said secret agreement between defendant and said firm of Townsend, Reed & Co., and did not learn of the making of same until some time during the year 1900.

"Plaintiff further states that after the making of the agreements hereinbefore recited, said firm of Townsend, Reed & Co. proceeded to organize a corporation for the purpose of building an electric railway between East St. Louis and Belleville, and did, in pursuance of the secret agreement hereinbefore mentioned between them and the defendant, deliver to defendant five thousand dollars ($5,000) of first mortgage bonds issued by said corporation. Plaintiff further states that said five thousand dollars ($5,000) of first mortgage bonds so delivered to defendant were sold by the defendant some time during the year 1899, the exact date being unknown to plaintiff; that defendant received therefor the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars ($2,500), no part of which has ever been paid to plaintiff. Plaintiff states that, by reason of the premises, there is due to him from defendant the sum of twelve hundred and fifty dollars ($1,250), together with interest thereon from date when the said sum of twenty-five hundred dollars ($2,500) was received by the defendant. Plaintiff further states that on, to wit, the 7th day of November, 1898, the said firm of Townsend, Reed & Co., finding that they would be unable to carry out their contract with plaintiff and defendant to pay them the sum of thirty-nine thousand dollars ($39,000) on November 12, 1898, as hereinbefore set out, did enter into a new agreement with plaintiff and defendant, in cancellation of the agreement theretofore entered into by them, dated November 12, 1897; that in and by said new agreement, it was provided that the said firm of Townsend, Reed & Co. should pay to plaintiff and defendant, on or before twelve (12) months from date, the sum of thirty-five thousand dollars ($35,000). Plaintiff states that after the making of said new agreement, the defendant represented to plaintiff that, in order to obtain the said new agreement, he and defendant had been compelled to surrender to Townsend, Reed & Co. all bonus that he had received from said firm on account of moneys loaned by defendant to assist said firm of Townsend, Reed & Co. in the building of an electric railway, and that he (the defendant) had received nothing whatever from said firm of Townsend, Reed & Co. in return for the surrender of said bonus. Plaintiff further states that thereupon, and by reason of the representations so made by defendant to plaintiff, plaintiff was induced to agree, and did then and there agree, to give to defendant the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) out of the seventeen thousand five hundred dollars ($17,500) thereafter to be received by plaintiff under the new contract of November 7, 1898, hereinabove referred to.

"Plaintiff further states that on said seventh day of November, 1898, and at the time when he agreed to give to defendant the said sum of five hundred dollars ($500), as aforesaid, the defendant had in his possession the five thousand dollars ($5,000) of first mortgage bonds hereinbefore referred to; that plaintiff at the time he agreed to give defendant the said sum of five hundred dollars ($500) was ignorant of the fact that defendant had received the said mortgage bonds, or that he then had the same in his possession, and that plaintiff did not learn until a long time thereafter that defendant had received anything from the said firm of Townsend, Reed & Co. other than what plaintiff himself had received, and that he entered into the said agreement with defendant in utter ignorance of the fact that defendant had theretofore received any consideration from the firm of Townsend, Reed & Co. in addition to what plaintiff had received. Plaintiff further states that thereafter, to wit, on November 28, 1899, he received from the firm of Townsend, Reed & Co. the sum of seventeen thousand five hundred dollars ($17,500), as provided in said contract of November 7, 1898, and that he paid to defendant out of said amount the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) as theretofore agreed; that the payment of said sum of five hundred dollars ($500) by plaintiff to defendant was paid as a gratuity wholly in consideration of the representations theretofore made by defendant to plaintiff, and in ignorance of the fact that defendant had received, and then had in his possession, the five thousand dollars ($5,000) of mortgage bonds referred to; that the defendant at the time he induced plaintiff to agree to give him said five hundred dollars ($500) and for the purpose of inducing plaintiff to agree to give the said five hundred dollars ($500) as a gratuity, concealed from the plaintiff the fact that he had received, and then had in his possession, the said five thousand dollars ($5,000) of mortgage bonds. Plaintiff further states that the conduct of the defendant in inducing plaintiff to agree to give him the said sum of five hundred dollars ($500), and in concealing from plaintiff the fact that he had received, and then had in his possession, said mortgage bonds, contrary to equity and good conscience and of the acceptance by defendant from plaintiff of the sum of five hundred dollars ($500), so paid by plaintiff was and is in fraud of the rights of plaintiff. Plaintiff avers that by reason of the premises there is due to plaintiff from defendant the further sum of five hundred dollars ($500), together with interest thereon from the 28th day of November, 1899. Wherefore, the premises considered plaintiff prays that defendant may be adjudged to pay to plaintiff the said sums of twelve hundred and fifty dollars ($1,250) and of five hundred dollars ($500), together with interest thereon and costs of suit."

Answer.

"Now comes the defendant in the above-entitled cause and for his answer to the plaintiff's petition denies each and every allegation therein. And, further answering, the defendant avers that on or about the seventeenth day of November, 1899, he and the plaintiff had a full and complete accounting and settlement between themselves, and struck a balance, and that he thereupon paid the amount thereof to the plaintiff, and that since said date he has had no dealings or transactions whatever with the plaintiff. Wherefore, having fully answered, defendant prays to be dismissed with his costs."

On the next day plaintiff filed his reply in the nature of a general denial. Defendant's counsel demanded trial by jury. The court ruled that the petition stated an action in equity, and denied the request for a jury trial, from which ruling defendant's counsel saved an exception. After hearing the evidence, and making a special finding of the facts, the court rendered judgment on the first count of the petition for plaintiff, assessed his damages at $1,565, and found the issues on the second count for defendant. Both parties appealed from this judgment.

The action is for the sole purpose of recovering a money judgment. The allegation that plaintiff and defendant were partners is but the conclusion of the pleader. Whether or not they were partners is a question of law, to be determined from the facts alleged in the petition and shown on the trial. We do not think the facts alleged in the petition show that plaintiff and defendant were partners. The gist of the first count is that plaintiff and defendant agreed to purchase, and did purchase, the majority of the capital stock of the turnpike company, a corporation, and divided it equally between themselves, each holding his stock in his individual right; that after procuring a majority of the stock, they caused themselves to be elected chief officers of the corporation, thereafter managing and controlling its property and business; that the ultimate object plaintiff and defendant had in view in acquiring the capital stock of the turnpike company was to interest other capitalists, and build an electric railway over the turnpike road from East St. Louis to Belleville, Ill.; that they did not succeed, and defendant, acting for himself and plaintiff, with plaintiff's consent, sold the stock of both to Townsend, Reed & Co., and by a secret and fraudulent agreement with that company secured for himself, over and above the money consideration for the stock, $5,000 in bonds, which he afterwards sold for $2,500 in cash; that said secret agreement was in fraud of plaintiff's rights, and he is entitled to one-half the amount realized on the bonds. The gist of the second count is that defendant, by false and fraudulent representations, in respect to the second deal concerning the stock, induced plaintiff to part with $500, for which judgment is asked. The answer put these allegations in issue. The issues thus raised were cognizable at law; and, as only a money judgment is asked, the petition stated a cause of action at law.

The evidence offered by plaintiff shows that he and defendant bought, from time to time, 630 shares of the capital stock of the St. Clair County Turnpike Company, a corporation, for the purpose of getting a controlling interest in that corporation, with the view of promoting the construction of an electric railway over the turnpike road, running from East St. Louis to the city of Belleville, in the state of Illinois; that the stock purchased was at the equal expense of both parties, and each received and had transferred to himself an equal number of the shares so purchased; that no share or shares were held in common as the joint or partnership property of plaintiff and defendant; that they agreed to hold their stock and work together, and plaintiff was elected secretary and treasurer of the turnpike company, and defendant president, each receiving the same salary, and having the exclusive management and control of the business of the company; that they expended equal amounts in making repairs on the road and acquiring franchises for the contemplated electric railroad, and worked together, as they had agreed, to a common end; that they were unsuccessful in their effort to organize a company, or to raise the necessary capital to build an electric railroad, and in November, 1897, sold their stock to Townsend, Reed & Co. for $40,000, $1,000 in cash, the balance to be paid in 12 months; that defendant, with plaintiff's consent, acting for himself and plaintiff, negotiated the sale of the stock in St. Louis, Mo., in plaintiff's absence; that Townsend, Reed & Co. agreed to build the electric railroad from East St. Louis to Belleville, over the turnpike road, but on the same day, and about the same time, said company made a supplemental contract with defendant, whereby they agreed to give him $5,000 par value of certain first mortgage bonds to be thereafter issued; that Townsend, Reed & Co. were unable to carry out their contract to build the electric railroad or pay the balance of the purchase price for plaintiff's and defendant's turnpike stock; that a new company was formed, which took over all the turnpike stock, and agreed to pay, and did pay, plaintiff and defendant $35,000 in full for the balance due them from Townsend, Reed & Co.; that the $5,000 in bonds were at some time delivered to defendant, in pursuance of the supplemental contract of November, 1897, and defendant afterwards surrendered these bonds in consideration of $2,500 in cash; that plaintiff ratified the sale of stock made in November, 1897, to Townsend, Reed & Co. by signing the contract. Plaintiff testified that at the time of signing the contract, and for a long time thereafter, he was totally ignorant of the supplemental contract, or that defendant had received the $5,000 in bonds under said contract, and his evidence tends to show the $5,000 in bonds was given as an additional consideration for his and defendant's stock in the turnpike company.

In regard to the second count, plaintiff's evidence shows Townsend, Reed & Co. began the construction of the electric road in 1897, got into financial difficulties, and defendant let them have $13,000 in money, for which they agreed to give him a bonus of $60,000 par value capital stock, and to pay him 10 per cent. interest on the money advanced; that in order to carry out the agreement of 1898 (stated in the petition), it was necessary that defendant surrender the $60,000 in stock received as a bonus for the advancement made to Townsend, Reed & Co., which he did, receiving nothing therefor; that in consideration of this surrender, plaintiff agreed to take $17,000, and let defendant take $17,500 of the $35,000 agreed to be paid for the balance due them for their turnpike stock, and the money ($35,000) was paid over to defendant, and he in turn paid plaintiff $17,000. Plaintiff transferred 25 shares of his turnpike stock to his wife, one to his brother-in-law, and one to another person, for the purpose of qualifying them to be directors in the turnpike company. Defendant's evidence puts a different phase on the transaction with respect to the bonds, and tends to show, as does also the supplemental contract, that when the contract of 1897 was entered into, whereby the turnpike stock of plaintiff and defendant was transferred to Townsend, Reed & Co., it was agreed that plaintiff and defendant should have an interest in the construction company organized, or to be organized, to build the electric railway, and that plaintiff declined to become interested in that company, and the $5,000 in bonds was given defendant in consideration of his surrendering his right to become a partner or stockholder in said company. In respect to the second count, plaintiff's own evidence clearly shows he was not entitled to recover. A partnership is said to be "a status resulting from contract." Its essential elements are a contract between the partners to share as common owners in the profits of the business. Plaintiff's evidence clearly shows he and defendant held no property as partners, and carried on no business as partners. Their management of the turnpike road was for the benefit of the St. Clair County Turnpike Company, a corporation, and their acts in the management of the road were done as president and secretary of the company, not as partners; and, there being other stockholders than plaintiff and defendant in said corporation, whatever profits were made inured to the benefit of all the stockholders, not to the exclusive benefit of plaintiff and defendant, and this is so, notwithstanding the fact they agreed to and did work especially for the benefit of each other. What they did was in the name of the corporation, and not in their names, as partners, and if defendant is liable at all, it is on the theory that in negotiating the sale of his and plaintiff's stock, he acted as agent of plaintiff and is liable to him as such. But even if it be conceded that plaintiff and defendant were in some ways partners, the action is not for an accounting and settlement of such partnership affairs as was conceded by plaintiff's counsel on the oral argument. The action is for the recovery of money only, and was triable by jury. Rev. St. 1899, § 691 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 700); Donovan v. Barnett, 27 Mo. App. 460; Whetstone v. Shaw, 70 Mo. 575; Van Raalte v. Epstein, 202 Mo. 173, 99 S. W. 1077.

For the reason defendant was erroneously refused a trial by jury, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded. All concur.

CONSERVATIVE REALTY CO. v. ST. LOUIS BREWING ASS'N.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Oct. 20, 1908.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 134*)—LEASES—CONSTRUCTION—USE OF PREMISES.

A lease bound the lessor not to lease "to another saloon or dramshop on said block during this lease," and that, if a saloon license could not be secured on the premises, the lease should be null and void on 90 days' notice. Held to show that the premises were let for a dramshop.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see *Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. § 134.]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1051*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where a lease shows on its face that the premises were let for a dramshop, the admission of extrinsic evidence to show that that was the purpose, if error, is harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see *Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4168; Dec. Dig. § 1051.]

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 37*)—LEASES—CONSTRUCTION—INTENTION OF PARTIES.

In construing a lease, the court must give an effect to each clause which will promote the general purpose, if possible, in view of the language used, and to that end the intention of both parties regarding the purpose of the demise must be given great weight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see *Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 98; Dec. Dig. § 37.]

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 39*)—LEASES—CONSTRUCTION.

If the language of a lease is clear, its meaning will be obligatory on the parties, though the consequences may be harsh and the stipulation contrary to the mode in which men ordinarily bind themselves by contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see *Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. § 39.]

5. CONTRACTS (§ 147*)—CONSTRUCTION—PATENT AMBIGUITIES.

The old rule that a patent ambiguity in a clause of a contract might render the stipulation void is no longer strictly observed, and, whether an ambiguity be patent or latent, a court will endeavor to glean the parties' intentions from the whole instrument, and the incidents attendant on its execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see *Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 730, 743; Dec. Dig. § 147.]

6. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 42*)—LEASES—CONSTRUCTION—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show that a provision in a lease for five years that, if a saloon license should not be secured on the premises, the lease should be null and void on 90 days' notice, gave the lessee the right at any time during the term to terminate the lease on 90 days' notice, whenever it became impossible to obtain a license, and not merely in the event a first license could not be procured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see *Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. § 42.]

7. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 58*)—CONTRACTS—VALIDITY—LEASE OF PREMISES FOR SALE OF LIQUOR.

That a corporation cannot be licensed to keep a dramshop, does not make it unlawful for a brewing corporation to lease premises so as to have its beer sold in them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see *Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 58.]

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Geo. H. Shields, Judge.

Action by the Conservative Realty Company against the St. Louis Brewing Association. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This appeal involves the interpretation of the following lease:

"This indenture made the twelfth day of October, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and three, between J. H. McClure of the one part and the St. Louis Brewing Association, a corporation, of the other part, witnesseth:

"That the said J. H. McClure in consideration of the rents, covenants and agreements hereinafter mentioned and reserved on the part of the said J. H. McClure, executors, administrators and assigns, has leased, and by these presents does lease to the said St. Louis Brewing Association, a corporation, building situated on the northwest corner of Twentieth and O'Fallon streets and known as No. 1301 North Twentieth street, in block No. 2302, in the city of St. Louis, to commence on the first day of December, 1903, for and during the term of five years at the yearly rental of nine hundred dollars, payable in equal monthly instalments in advance, seventy-five dollars.

"Said lessee to make all inside repairs necessary inside of building, pay water license assessed against the property.

"Any failure to pay each month's rent when due, and after a demand of the same, to produce a forfeiture of this lease, if so determined by said lessor or his successors. The lease of said tenement, or any part of it, is not assignable, under penalty of forfeiture, without the written consent of said lessor, and it is hereby covenanted that at the expiration of this lease, the said tenement and premises are to be surrendered to said lessor, his heirs, assigns or successors, in the condition received, only excepting natural wear and decay, or the effects of fire. All inside repairs deemed necessary by the lessee to be made at the expense of said lessee, with the consent of said lessor, and not otherwise.

"The said lessee, and all holding under it, hereby engage to pay the rent above reserved, and double rent for every day it or anyone else in its name, shall hold onto the whole or any part of said tenement after the expiration of this lease, or of its forfeiture for nonpayment of rent, etc.

"This tenement and premises to be kept free of any nuisance thereon, at the expense of said lessee. Said lessor agrees not to lease, rent, etc., to another brewery, saloon or dramshop, on said block, during this lease. Should said saloon license be not secured on said premises in said block, then this lease is null and void on ninety days' notice from said lessee.

"Made and signed in duplicate this twelfth day of October, 1903.

"Per Henry Nicolaus, President. [Seal.]

"Attest: Philip Stock, Secy. [Seal of St. Louis Brewing Association.]"

After the quoted lease had been executed, Henry Wuertenbacher conducted a dramshop on the premises under two licenses of six months each. Wuertenbacher had been an employe of the defendant company, and the record is doubtful as to whether he occupied the premises as a subtenant of the brewing company and was a bona fide proprietor of the saloon, or an agent of defendant. At the end of a year a petition was circulated among the property owners in the block for a third license to be issued to August Gorka, but, as the majority remonstrated against the saloon, the license was refused by the excise commissioner. Subsequent to the date of the lease, and on September 28, 1903, J. H. McClure, the lessor, sold and conveyed the premises to Amanda Twelker, who sold and conveyed them to plaintiff, the Conservative Realty Company, in June, 1905. Mrs. Twelker was the owner of the fee and the landlord early in 1905, when the effort to procure a third license failed; wherefore defendant served a written notice on her April 25, 1905, that, as it had been found impossible to procure a license for the keeping of a dramshop on the lot, the lessee (St. Louis Brewing Company) elected, under the terms and provisions of the lease, to terminate the tenancy on the 1st day of August, 1905, and would then surrender possession of the premises to her. Two men took the keys of the building to the office of plaintiff's agent July 31, 1905, and on the refusal of the agent to accept them threw them on the floor. The Conservative Realty Company, which, as said, had become the owner of the premises, notified plaintiff in writing on August 1, 1905, of the acts of the men who had brought the keys, of plaintiff's refusal to accept the keys or possession of the premises or a surrender of the lease, and, further, that the keys were subject to plaintiff's disposal. This action was brought before a justice of the peace for $75, the rent for August, 1905, and was appealed to the circuit court. On the trial in the latter court evidence was received, over the objection of plaintiff, to show that at the expiration of the second license it was impossible to procure another, that the rental reserved was more than the property would bring for any other purpose than a saloon, and it was rented by defendant to have a saloon conducted on it. At the instance of defendant, the court declared the intention of the parties to the lease, and all the facts and circumstances attending its execution were matters for consideration, and, if the court found from the evidence the parties entered into the lease with the understanding a saloon should be kept on the demised premises during the term, and further found this was the inducement to defendant to enter into the lease and it otherwise would not have done so, and that at the time stated in the evidence defendant was unable, after an honest effort, to procure a license to conduct a dramshop, and thereafter defendant served on the owner of the premises 90 days' notice of its intention to terminate the lease, then the verdict must be for defendant. Plaintiff requested the court to declare the law to be that, if defendant paid one or more monthly instalments of rent and the instalment for August had not been paid, the finding must be for plaintiff; and that, if the court found defendant caused a saloon to be conducted in the premises under a license granted to one Wuertenbacher after the beginning of the term fixed in the lease, to wit, December 1, 1905, and at the end of six months an additional license was procured, defendant thereafter had no right to declare the lease terminated on account of failure to procure a license. The court found the issues of fact for defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

Kinealy & Kinealy, for appellant. Marlon C. Early, for respondent.

GOODE, J. (after stating the facts as above). If evidence to prove the purpose for which defendant leased the premises was incompetent, its admission was harmless, because the lease document shows on its face what was understood by both the parties to it to be defendant's purpose. The lessor (McClure) bound himself not to lease or rent to another saloon or dramshop in said block during the existence of the lease in question. That proviso not only shows the premises were let for a dramshop, but that the lessor agreed to protect the lessee against competition in the block. The next clause, which provided that, if a saloon license could not be procured, the lease should be null and void on 90 days' notice, speaks to the same intent. There is no ambiguity concerning this point, and, in determining whether the lessee had a right to terminate the tenancy whenever a saloon license could not be procured, whatever help may be drawn from the clear purpose to let the premises for use as a saloon is available to the court on the face of the lease without reference to extrinsic evidence. The intention of both parties regarding the purpose of the demise must wield potent influence in interpreting any clause of it; for the duty of the court is to give an effect to each clause which will promote the general purpose, if it is possible, in view of the language, to do this. Union Depot Co. v. Railroad, 113 Mo. 213, 20 S. W. 792; Bent v. Alexander, 15 Mo. App. 181. The clause in question runs in these words: "Should said saloon license be not secured on said premises in said block, then this lease is null and void on ninety days' notice from said lessee." Plaintiff's counsel contend this stipulation means that only in the event a single license, to wit, the one for the first six months, could not be procured, defendant might end the term by giving 90 days' notice; whereas, defendant contends the meaning of the clause and the intention of the parties was that if, at any time during the term of 5 years, a license could not be procured, the lessee might surrender the term. In aid of this interpretation, they point to the statutory law of the state which limits saloon licenses to a term of six months, and to the obvious purpose of the demise, arguing that it would be unreasonable to hold defendant was willing to commit itself for the entire five years on the strength of a license for the first six months. If the language was clear, its meaning would be obligatory on the parties, although the consequences might be harsh and the stipulation contrary to the mode in which men ordinarily bind themselves by contracts. Sachleben v. Wolfe, 61 Mo. App. 28. But the clause to be construed is ambiguous in this: The language is "should said saloon license be not secured on said premises," etc. Those words convey the impression that some license had been mentioned in the previous part of the lease to which the phrase "said saloon license" referred. But no particular license had been mentioned, nor had the word "license" been used before in the instrument. Hence there is no more reason to hold the words "said saloon license" referred to a license for the first six months than to hold they referred to one for any other six months. There is some weight in the argument of defendant's counsel that they referred to one license, and not the numerous licenses which would need to be procured for a dramshop during the five years' term, since the word "license" is in the singular number. According to old law, the patent ambiguity of the clause might make the stipulation void; but this doctrine is no longer enforced as strictly as formerly, and, whether an ambiguity is patent or latent, a court will endeavor to glean the intention of the parties from the whole instrument and the circumstances attendant on its execution. 2 Parsons, Contracts (9th Ed.) *581 et seq. Taking into account the law regarding saloon licenses, and the purpose for which the premises were taken by defendant, we have no doubt the intention of the parties was to make the existence of the lease contingent on the ability of defendant to procure from time to time a license; that is to say, defendant was accorded the privilege of ending the term on 90 days' notice whenever it became impossible to obtain a license. It is highly improbable the brewing association would have entered into the lease to have a saloon kept on the premises unless it knew beforehand a license for the first six months could be procured. Indeed, testimony was admitted without objection to prove the officers of defendant had investigated this matter before the lease was executed, and were assured a license would be granted. Therefore it was useless to put the stipulation in the lease, if it related, as plaintiff's counsel say, only to the first license. To adopt such a view we must conclude the parties stipulated for a cessation of the term in case it turned out to be impossible to get a license for the first six months, when, in fact, defendant made sure of this contingency before it took up with plaintiff the proposition to rent the property.

Plaintiff's counsel insist that, inasmuch as a corporation cannot be licensed to keep a dramshop, the clause providing for the surrender of the term in the event a license for a dramshop could not be procured is against public policy, and void. It is argued that, if defendant was permitted to put an individual in possession of the premises to conduct a saloon for its benefit, this would be doing indirectly what it was forbidden to do directly. It does not appear the defendant was going to put a man in there to conduct a saloon as its agent; but merely that the property was rented for saloon purposes, and probably to increase the sale of defendant's beer. The lease does not reveal what arrangement defendant contemplated making with the person who would keep a dramshop on the property, nor are we informed by the evidence what terms it actually made with Wuertenbacher who kept one there. The record will support the conclusion that the arrangement was not one by which defendant was the real owner of the saloon and the keeper its custodian. Hence, if an arrangement of the latter sort would be unlawful, and we do not decide the point, it was not established. The argument for defendant in this connection, if sound, would avoid the entire lease on which it sues as against public policy, rather than a particular clause, because the lease shows McClure demised the property for dramshop purposes. However, it is not unlawful for a brewing corporation to lease premises for the purpose of having its beer sold in them. Such contracts have been upheld. Holm v. Brewing Co., 21 App. Div. 204, 47 N. Y. Supp. 518; Koehler v. Reinheimer, 26 App. Div. 1, 49 N. Y. Supp. 755.

We are clear the judgment is for the right party, and will be affirmed. All concur.

STATE v. JAMES.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Oct. 20, 1908.)

1. LARCENY (§ 1*)—ELEMENTS—DEFINITION—“LARCENY.”

Larceny is the wrongful or fraudulent taking and carrying away by any person of the personal goods of another without the owner's consent, with a felonious intent to convert them to the taker's use.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 3991-4003.]

2. LARCENY (§ 1*)—ELEMENTS—OWNERSHIP AND CONSENT.

In larceny for taking a pocketbook from another's possession, the state must prove that the person from whom it was taken was the owner, and that it was taken without her consent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

3. LARCENY (§ 62*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—TAKING OF PROPERTY—CONSENT.

In larceny, proof that a pocketbook was snatched from another's pocket while she was looking at goods in a store was sufficient to show that she did not consent to the taking.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Dec. Dig. § 62.*]

4. LARCENY (§ 60*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY.

In larceny for taking a pocketbook from one's pocket, while her possession was prima facie evidence of her ownership, it was not sufficient evidence of ownership to overcome the presumption of innocence, and warrant a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. § 156; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 559*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—REASONABLE DOUBT—INFERENCES.

One should not be convicted of a crime upon proof of an essential element thereof by mere inference.

Appeal from St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction; Wilson A. Taylor, Judge.

Walter F. James was convicted of petit larceny, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Richard A. Jones, for appellant. Phillips W. Moss, for the State.

BLAND, P. J. On an information filed in the St. Louis court of criminal correction, defendant was found guilty of petit larceny, and his punishment assessed at a fine of $10. His contention in the court below and on his appeal here is that the evidence was insufficient to support a verdict of guilty. Nettie Nolan, a witness for the state, testified as follows: “I reside at 6416 Wade avenue, in the city of St. Louis. About 9 a. m. Wednesday, on the 14th of August of this year, myself and mother, Mrs. Annie Nolan, and Mrs. Amanda Rose, the complaining witness, went downtown in the city of St. Louis, Mo., to do some shopping. We shopped all day until about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and then while in the Knox Ten-Cent Store on Washington avenue, near Broadway, where Mrs. Amanda Rose stood, looking at some things on the counter, while she was so engaged, I noticed the defendant put his hand in her pocket and take therefrom something, which I afterwards found to be a pocketbook. I told her she had better look and see if the pocketbook was gone. She found it was, and the defendant was just then going out on the street, and my mother ran after him, but they were unable to catch him. I identify the defendant as the man whom I saw put his hand in Mrs. Rose's pocket and take therefrom the pocketbook.” Mrs. Annie Nolan testified as follows: “I reside at 6416 Wade avenue, in the city of St. Louis. Wednesday morning, August 14th of this year, my daughter, who has just testified, and myself, went downtown in the city of St. Louis, Mo., with Mrs. Amanda Rose, who was visiting us from Illinois, for the purpose of making some purchases. In the afternoon, while in the Knox Ten-Cent Store, on Washington avenue near Broadway, my daughter called my attention to the defendant, who was just going out of the door of this store, and said he had taken a pocketbook from Mrs. Rose's pocket. I ran after him, but was unable to overtake him, and did not again see him until on Saturday, August 17th, thereafter, when I was called down to the Four courts, and there identified, and now identify, the defendant as the man who ran out of the Knox Store with the pocketbook which he had taken from Mrs. Rose. Mrs. Rose had this pocketbook taken by the defendant in her possession when she went downtown with us in the morning, and she placed therein a $10 bill, of which at the time the pocketbook was taken she had not spent over $3 or $4, and there was at least $6 in the pocketbook when it was taken from her possession. Mrs. Rose is an elderly lady, and lives at Pana, Ill. She is not in the city of St. Louis at this time." Officer O'Brien testified he arrested defendant August 18, 1907. This was all the evidence offered by the state. Defendant and his mother testified that defendant was at his home, No. 5211 Kensington avenue, all the afternoon of August 14th, and are strongly corroborated by the evidence of Dr. J. B. Rule. Defendant proved by several creditable witnesses, including Dr. Rule, that he is a young man of good character. Wilbur C. Allen testified for defendant as follows: "I reside in the city of St. Louis, and am a floor walker in Knox Ten-Cent Store on Washington avenue near Broadway, where the occurrence detailed, in which a pocketbook was said to have been taken from the pocket of Mrs. Amanda Rose, occurred. I saw Mrs. Nolan run to the street after a man, but did not try to stop him. He disappeared in the crowd on Washington avenue. The man she ran after was not the defendant. It was a fellow who had been hanging around a poolroom in the next block from the Knox store. I once played pool with him. I did not try to stop him, because I did not think it was my business to. Saw him putting something in his pocket as he went out the door." Witness also stated, that although he saw the person pick Mrs. Rose's pocket and was close to the door he ran out of, and could have stopped him if he had tried, yet he made no attempt to do so.

1. The cause was tried to the court without a jury. No declarations of law were asked or given. It seems to me that the learned trial judge failed to give defendant the benefit of a reasonable doubt of his guilt, and found him guilty on a doubtful preponderance of the evidence in respect to the identity of the person who picked Mrs. Rose's pocket. Neither of the Nolans were acquainted with defendant. Nettie Nolan testified she saw him put his hand into Mrs. Rose's pocket, and go out on the street. Mrs. Annie Nolan testified she saw him from the inside of the store as he was going through the door. She only saw his back, and could not, with any degree of certainty, identify him. The other state witness' view of him was but for a moment and under circumstances calculated to excite her, and she might very well have been mistaken as to his identity. Allen testified the man Mrs. Nolan ran after on the street (whom she identified was defendant) was not defendant, but a fellow who had been hanging around a poolroom in the adjoining block. This evidence, in connection with the evidence of defendant's good character, was ample to raise a reasonable doubt as to whether or no defendant was the person who picked Mrs. Rose's pocket.

2. East defines larceny to be "the wrongful or fraudulent taking or carrying away by any person of the personal goods of another, from any place, with a felonious intent to convert them to his [the other's] own use, and make them his property, without the consent of the owner." 2 Bishop's New Criminal Law, § 811. To prove the offense charged, it was incumbent on the state to prove that Mrs. Rose was the owner of the pocketbook and its contents, and that they were taken without her consent. Proof that they were taken from her pocket, under the circumstances narrated by the state's witnesses, was sufficient to show that she did not give her consent to have her pocket picked. But there is no direct or positive evidence that she was the owner of the pocketbook and its contents, though her possession of them was prima facie evidence of her ownership. But this mere prima facie evidence of ownership, proof of which is indispensable to warrant a conviction, is not sufficient to overthrow the presumption of innocence which attended defendant throughout the trial. One presumption cannot overthrow another, nor should a man be convicted of a degrading crime upon a mere inference of an essential fact. State v. Shelley, 166 Mo., loc. cit. 618, 619, 66 S. W. 430; Klein v. Laudman, 29 Mo. 259.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

GOODE, J., and NORTON, J., concur in second paragraph.

CONNELLY v. ILLINOIS CENT. RY. CO. et al.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Oct. 20, 1908.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 177*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—CONNECTING CARRIERS—INJURIES TO GOODS—STATUTES—APPLICATION.

Rev. St. 1899, § 5222 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 2718), providing that, when shipments begin in Missouri, the initial carrier shall be liable for damages accruing anywhere on the route, does not apply to transportation of goods wholly without the state.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 177.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 185*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—CONNECTING CARRIERS—INJURIES TO GOODS.

When property is delivered to a carrier in good order to be transported over its line and that of one or more connecting carriers, and the property is damaged en route, proof that the goods were delivered to the owner at destination by the final carrier in bad order establishes a prima facie case against it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 848; Dec. Dig. § 185.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 177*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—CONNECTING CARRIERS—LIABILITY OF INITIAL OR INTERMEDIATE CARRIER.

To make a case against an initial or intermediate carrier on its common-law liability, the owner must prove that the damage happened while the property was in such carrier's custody.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 779, 780; Dec. Dig. § 177.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 187*)—CONNECTING CARRIERS—INITIAL CARRIER—INJURY TO GOODS—PRESUMPTIONS—INSTRUCTION.

Where, in an action against an initial carrier for injuries to goods, there was evidence justifying the submission of the question whether the injury occurred on such carrier's line to the jury, it was error to charge that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it would be presumed that any damage to the goods occurred while they were in the hands of the last carrier before the damage was discovered was erroneous, as conceding the possibility that there was no evidence that the loss occurred on the initial carrier's line.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Dec. Dig. § 187.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 588*)—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY—CONCLUSIVENESS ON PARTY.

Plaintiff was not bound by the testimony of witnesses introduced by defendant, nor was the jury bound to believe them if their manner discredited them, or if the evidence as a whole supported a different inference.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2437; Dec. Dig. § 588.*]

6. CARRIERS (§ 136*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—INJURIES TO GOODS—IMPROPER LOADING AND PACKING—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action against a carrier for injuries to goods, whether they were improperly loaded and packed held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 596; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—REVIEW—REVERSIBLE ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries to goods in transit, an instruction, not within the issues, that defendant would not be liable for any damages which occurred while the goods were stored in its warehouse prior to shipment, while erroneous, would not constitute reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Matt G. Reynolds, Judge.

Action by Thomas L. Connelly against the Illinois Central Railway Company and others. From a judgment in favor of defendant Illinois Central Railway Company, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

H. A. Leary, for appellant. Samuel McPheters, for respondents.

GRUDGE, J. This cause was reviewed by us before on questions different from those now presented. A report of the former decision will be found in 120 Mo. App. 652, 97 S. W. 616, but it will help the reader to restate the principal facts. The action counts on the common-law liability of a carrier, and was brought to recover for damage done to appellant's household furniture while in transit from Jackson, Miss., to East St. Louis, Ill., over three railroad companies; the respondent the Illinois Central Company, the Southern Railroad Company, and the Mobile & Ohio Railroad Company. The goods were received by respondent company at Jackson, and loaded in one end of a freight car which contained in the other end 20 barrels of flour. The car doors were sealed, and the car carried by respondent to Winona, Miss., where it was turned over to the Southern Company, which carried it to West Point, Miss., and there, after considerable delay, turned it over to the Mobile & Ohio Company. The delay at West Point was due to the refusal of the agent of the Mobile & Ohio Company to receive the car, on account of the damaged condition of the goods, until an arrangement was made by which the Southern Company delivered the property to the Mobile & Ohio as in bad order. Because the goods were damaged before delivery to the Mobile & Ohio Company, the action, which was originally against the three railway companies, was dismissed as to it. On the second trial a verdict was returned in favor of respondent, and appellant brought the case here, complaining of instructions given by the court.

It will be observed the carriage of the goods was entirely outside this state, and hence was not affected by our statutes, providing that, when shipments begin in this state, the initial carrier shall be liable for damage occurring anywhere on the route. Rev. St. 1899, § 5222 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 2719); Crouch v. Railroad, 42 Mo. App. 248. The case was tried by both parties on the assumption that either defendant was liable only for whatever damage occurred while the goods were in its charge and on its own line. The instructions given at the request of appellant allowed a verdict against the Illinois Central Company in the event the jury found the furniture was in good order when loaded on said company's car, and, while it was in transit and before delivery to the Southern Company at Winona, it was broken or otherwise damaged. A counterpart of said instruction was granted at respondent's request, advising the jury it was not liable if the goods were delivered by it to the Southern Company at Winona in the same condition they were in when received for shipment at Jackson. But, at the request of respondent, the court also instructed that if the car was opened on June 26th between Winona, where the Southern Company received it, and West Point, to which said company carried it, and the goods were then in a damaged condition, and the goods on said date had been in the possession of the Southern Company since June 24th, the law, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, would presume any damage done after the goods were loaded at Jackson occurred while they were in the possession of the Southern Company, and under the terms of the bill of lading offered in evidence the Illinois Central Company was not liable for this damage. Appellant assigns the giving of this instruction for error. It advised the jury as to what the law would presume in a given instance; i. e., the absence of evidence to prove the damage to the goods occurred prior to June 24th, when the car passed into the care of the Southern Company, and that in said contingency the presumption was the damage occurred while the goods were in the custody of the Southern Company, and respondent was not liable. The argument of counsel for respondent in favor of the instruction is that the law presumes damage done to property in the course of its transit over the lines of two or more public carriers occurred while it was in charge of the final carrier, unless there is evidence to the contrary; and in support of this proposition they cite Crouch v. Railroad, 42 Mo. App. 248; Flynn v. Railroad, 43 Mo. App. 424; Hurst v. Railroad, 117 Mo. App. 25, 94 S. W. 794.

When property is delivered to a carrier in good condition to be transported over its own line and the line or lines of one or more other carriers, and the property is damaged en route, for the purpose of giving an effective remedy to the owner, who can rarely prove what carrier was to blame for the damage, it is held proof the goods were delivered to the owner at destination by the final carrier in bad order establishes a prima facie case against said carrier. This is because it could have protected itself from responsibility for losses occurring prior to its reception of the property by an inspection of its condition at the transfer point. And, moreover, sources of evidence regarding where the blame rests are more accessible to the last carrier than they are to the shipper. Flynn v. Railroad, 43 Mo. App. 424, 438. In order to make a case against an initial or intermediate carrier on its common-law liability, the owner must do more than show the property was found to be damaged when it reached destination—must introduce evidence to prove the damage happened while the property was in the custody of the company he sues. We are speaking now of shipments not affected by our statutes. But this presumption in favor of initial and intermediate carriers, like other legal presumptions, is not one which properly can be declared to the jury if there is evidence touching the issue of where the property was when it was injured. The reason of this rule is that submitting the question to the jury as one of fact implies there is evidence regarding it, and to tell them what the law will presume in the absence of evidence may lead them to think there is no evidence one way or the other—a conclusion contrary to the hypothesis on which the issue is submitted. Moberly v. Railroad, 98 Mo. 183, 11 S. W. 569; Rapp v. Railroad, 106 Mo. 424, 428, 17 S. W. 487; Myers v. Kansas City, 103 Mo. 490, 487, 18 S. W. 914. The appropriate use of presumptions of law is to indicate to the court where the burden of proof rests. If the law presumes so-and-so in the absence of evidence, then, unless the party who relies on the fact introduces evidence to prove it, it will be presumed the fact did not exist, and the court will as a matter of law hold against said party. If appellant put in no evidence which conduced to prove the damage to his goods occurred on respondent's line, a verdict in favor of the company should have been ordered. Instead of doing this, the court left it to the jury to determine whether or not the loss occurred on said company's line, thereby taking for granted there was evidence to prove it did. Therefore the instruction in hand under the authorities, supra, was erroneous and harmful, because it conceded the possibility of there being no evidence the loss occurred on respondent's line—a theory opposed to the instructions given for appellant.

This error must be held material, unless we can say there was no evidence tending to prove the goods were damaged while in respondent's custody, and therefore the demurrer offered by respondent to appellant's evidence should have been sustained. To our minds the weight of evidence shows the damage was done after the furniture was received by the Southern Company and while in its custody, as the jury found. Said company's agent at Winona said he examined the car at that transfer point, and its contents were in good order. The car was opened between Winona and West Point, where it was to be delivered to the Mobile & Ohio Company, and then the property was found to be damaged. But the witnesses who testified to those facts were introduced by respondent and appellant was not bound by their testimony. Neither was the jury bound to believe them if their manner on the stand discredited them, or if the evidence as a whole would support another inference. Gannon v. Gaslight Co., 145 Mo. 502, 46 S. W. 968, 47 S. W. 907, 43 L. R. A. 505; Mowry v. Norman, 204 Mo. 191, 103 S. W. 15; Hunter v. Wethington, 205 Mo. 292, 293, 103 S. W. 543. Testimony was given that the furniture, which consisted of chairs, rocking chairs, sewing machines, and other household property, was packed at one end of the car with a space of over six feet between it and the barrels of flour which were in the other end. Many of the articles were neither boxed, crated, nor burlapped, but some of them were tied together to hold them in place. One witness swore the goods were improperly loaded and packed. It is plain the furniture was so arranged that it was apt to be shaken about and broken while in transit over appellant's line to the transfer point, and whether it was or not was for the jury to say.

The instruction that respondent was not liable for any damage to the furniture which occurred while it was stored in respondent's warehouse prior to shipment was outside the issues made by the pleadings, but would not constitute reversible error.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded. All concur.

GREENVILLE LUMBER CO. v. NATIONAL PRESSED BRICK CO.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Oct. 20, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 17, 1908.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 14*)—AGENCY—EXISTENCE OF RELATION.

About the time of a negotiation for the purchase of brick from plaintiff by defendant, resulting in a disagreement as to whether there was a positive agreement of sale, S. took an option on plaintiff's factory, the sales made thereafter to be credited against the purchase price, but the option was never closed. Pending the option, S. contracted to sell defendant a quantity of brick, which was shipped by plaintiff under an arrangement with S., the bills of lading for the first two orders being issued in S.'s name, the others showing plaintiff as consignor, but they were turned over to S., who collected from defendant the price. Defendant had no knowledge of the option, or of plaintiff's agreement with S. for the delivery of the brick. Held, that S. did not act as agent for defendant, but the sale was made by him as principal, and plaintiff hence could not recover from defendant for the brick.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. § 29; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. SALES (§ 363*)—ACTION FOR PRICE—DEMURRER TO THE EVIDENCE.

In an action for goods sold and delivered, where the evidence failed to show that the goods were purchased from plaintiff, or that defendant promised to pay plaintiff for them, a demurrer to the evidence was properly sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Dec. Dig. § 363.*]

3. SALES (§ 17*)—REQUISITES OF CONTRACT—PARTIES.

If defendant and another colluded to induce plaintiff to ship brick to defendant, plaintiff could recover their value from defendant, though the latter's contract was with such other, and the purchase price had already been paid to him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 28-30; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

4. CARRIERS (§ 58*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—BILLS OF LADING—PURCHASE OF BILL OF LADING.

Where plaintiff transferred to another the bills of lading for goods shipped defendant, defendant having ordered the goods from such other, and having no knowledge of plaintiff's understanding with him by which the bills were turned over to him, he could pay such other for the goods.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Robt. M. Foster, Judge.

Action by the Greenville Lumber Company against the National Pressed Brick Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John B. Denvir, Jr., for appellant. E. N. Robinson, for respondent.

GOODE, J. Plaintiff, a corporation, engaged in business in Greenville, Ill., began this action to recover $696.53, the purchase price of eight car loads of brick alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant at different dates from January 12, to January 24, 1907. The petition is in the form of assumpsit for goods sold and delivered, and avers plaintiff, at the special instance and request of defendant, sold and delivered to defendant certain goods and merchandise of the value aforesaid, the items of which and the dates when they were sold, would appear from a bill of items annexed to the petition. It is also averred the prices charged were reasonable, and defendant promised and agreed to pay the total amount, but afterwards refused to pay. Defendant does business in St. Louis. Charles W. Irwin, secretary of the defendant company, had negotiated with C. E. Davidson, manager of the Greenville Lumber Company, in December, 1906, for the purchase of some brick, and a dispute arose between the two companies out of the negotiation. Irwin claimed plaintiff sold brick to the National Pressed Brick Company at that time, but Davidson denied there was a positive agreement to sell, and said the bricks were not to be shipped unless a reduction in freight rates could be procured. This affair between the parties has only an incidental bearing on the case at bar. Davidson swore the bill for the purchase of the bricks in controversy was not mailed to defendant until February 15, 1907, although the car loads of brick were delivered at different times in January, and it was the custom of plaintiff to mail bills with the cars, because, in the December talk with Irwin, the latter had said defendant paid for all brick it bought about the middle of the month after delivery. About the time of said negotiation between Irwin and Davidson, Henry Scherf, of St. Louis, who is designated as a "brick broker," took an option to expire February 15, 1907, to purchase the entire factory or plant of the Greenville Company, but never closed the deal. Davidson testified it was part of the arrangement with Scherf that the price of whatever brick plaintiff sold during the life of the option should be credited on the contract price Scherf was to pay for the whole property. After Scherf had acquired the option, he made a contract with defendant to sell it 500,000 brick at $6.25 per 1,000. The written order for these bricks was given by defendant under date of January 14, 1907, in this letter addressed to Scherf: "January

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

14, 1907. Mr. Henry Scherf, 602 Roe Building, City—Dear Sir: You may enter our order for 500,000 Strictly Hard and Red Brick, to be $\frac{1}{4}$ Face and $\frac{3}{4}$ Backing up, price to be \$6.25 per M. less 25 c. o. b. cars, East St. Louis, with freight prepaid to East St. Louis. It is understood that 200,000 will be shipped immediately as we direct, and the additional 300,000 to be shipped on our order in three (3) or four (4) weeks. It is agreed and understood that any shipping instructions that we may give you on this business will not be interfered with in any way by you or your company. Payment is to be made upon receipt of bill of lading and your count to be verified by us. Yours very truly, National Pressed Brick Co. by C. W. Irwin, Secy. Accepted by Henry Scherf." Irwin swore the arrangement for the purchase of the brick from Scherf was made verbally a few days before the letter was written; thus explaining how it happened the first car load of brick was delivered January 12th, or two days before the date of the letter. Scherf arranged with plaintiff to furnish the brick, as stated, and they were shipped in eight car loads. Plaintiff contends it sold them to defendant; whereas, defendant contends it bought them from Scherf, paid him in full, and had nothing to do with plaintiff in the transaction. The bills of lading for two of the cars were issued in the name of H. Scherf—that is to say, the railroad company receipted him for the cars—but the other six bills of lading named plaintiff as the consignor. All the cars were consigned to the National Pressed Brick Company at East St. Louis. The eight bills of lading were turned over to Scherf as issued, and were in his possession when the brick reached destination. He collected the price of every car from defendant, as the evidence conclusively shows. In explanation of Scherf's possession of the bills of lading, Davidson swore he (Scherf) induced plaintiff to turn them over to him by representing that the movements of cars at East St. Louis often were delayed by the railroad companies, and he needed the bills of lading in order to expedite the carriage of the cars in question from there across the river. The court refused to direct a verdict in favor of defendant on the testimony of plaintiff; but gave the direction when all the evidence was in. Whereupon plaintiff took a nonsuit with leave to move to have it set aside; and, this having been done and the motion overruled, an appeal was allowed.

We can think of no theory on which defendant would be liable for the price of the bricks, unless Scherf was its agent in the purchase and plaintiff sold to him as agent, or he and defendant colluded to defraud plaintiff. The testimony of Davidson goes to show he dealt with Scherf as agent for defendant; but no proof of such an agency was introduced, and all the evidence disproves it. The only trace of testimony of any kind to show the transaction was a sale by plaintiff to defendant was Davidson's statement that it was agreed between plaintiff and Scherf that, while Scherf's option was in force, all sales were to be made to customers by plaintiff, and Scherf given credit for the amount of them on what he was to pay. There is no proof defendant knew of this understanding, and Davidson admitted on the stand Scherf might have deceived defendant regarding the arrangement between him and plaintiff. Of course, if there was collusion between Scherf and defendant, the latter would be liable; but collusion and fraud were neither pleaded nor proved. The action is in assumpsit, and the gravamen of the petition is the averment that plaintiff sold the brick to defendant at the latter's special instance and request—an averment wholly unsupported by testimony or circumstance. Plaintiff points to the receipt of one car load of brick by defendant prior to the date of its written order to Scherf. It is argued this fact shows defendant's contract with Scherf was subsequent to the sale by plaintiff to Scherf, and tends to prove Scherf acted for defendant. Such reasoning is forced. It would not be fair to conclude Scherf and defendant were in collusion, and the letter was written as part of a fraudulent scheme, even if the circumstance had not been explained, and it was. There was a total failure to prove the promise laid in the petition, and the court did right to sustain the demurrer to the evidence. Huston v. Tyler, 140 Mo. 252, 36 S. W. 654, 41 S. W. 795; Carson v. Cummings, 69 Mo. 325. Scherf probably committed a fraud in not paying plaintiff for the bricks he bought and may have intended to defraud all the time. Be that as it may, defendant had the right to pay him for the bricks it had ordered from him, especially as he had obtained possession of the bills of lading by the act of plaintiff company. Scharff v. Meyer, 133 Mo. 429, 34 S. W. 858, 54 Am. St. Rep. 672.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; O'Neill Ryan, Judge.

Action by George W. Stinebaker and others against the National Restaurant Company and another. From an order overruling a motion for an execution against one of the defendants as a shareholder in defendant company, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

This appeal was taken from an order overruling a motion for an execution against respondent Reinhardt as a shareholder in the National Restaurant Company. The motion was filed after judgment had been given in favor of appellants for $4,250 in an action by them against the company and after return nulla bona of an execution on the judgment. Reinhardt held shares in the company of the par value of $100 each, and it is contended he was liable on these shares because he had not paid their face value to the company. The entire capital stock was $30,000 par value, divided into 300 shares, of which J. C. Hopkins, president of the company, held 165 shares, Reinhardt, the secretary and treasurer, 100, and Charles Blanchard, 10. It thus appears that 275 shares of the stock were held by these three men; but it was not shown who held the remaining 25 shares. The company was organized to take over a leasehold on certain premises near the site of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition or World's Fair in 1904, and conduct a restaurant on them. The lease was made by appellants Stinebaker and Early to J. C. Hopkins for a term running from April 15, 1904, to December 31, 1904, and for a rental of $20,000, of which Reinhardt guaranteed the payment of $15,000. Hopkins took possession of the premises and retained it until August, 1904, when, with the consent of the lessors, he transferred possession to the National Restaurant Company, assigned to it all his interest in the leasehold, and said company the evidence shows, assumed Hopkins' liability for the whole rent and also Reinhardt's liability on his guaranty for a portion of it. It is not definitely shown when the company was organized, or that its incorporation and occupation of the leasehold were contemplated at the time the lease was given to Hopkins; but there are circumstances going to show the company conducted business on the leased premises from the first. A resolution of the board of directors was adopted which treated the capital stock as fully paid by the leasehold; that is to say, the lease on the premises was treated as of the value of $30,000 and the stock issued as fully paid. What the actual value of the lease was, and whether it was greater or less than this sum, there is no evidence to prove; an important circumstance we think. Notwithstanding said resolution of the directors, Blanchard paid in cash $1,200 on accounts owed by the company for goods furnished to it in payment for his 10 shares of stock, and there was from the first an understanding among the principal shareholders named, supra, that Reinhardt should advance $5,000 in cash to pay for supplies to the company and its running expenses in part payment for his 100 shares. He advanced money from time to time as the exigencies of business required, and to keep the company from being sued, until he had paid liabilities and bills of the company to the amount not of $5,000, but of $10,430.39. For some $4,000 or $5,000 of these payments notes were given him in the name of the company, but he never realized anything on those obligations. Besides the above amount, Reinhardt paid the lessors on account of his guaranty for rent $12,093; and, as the company had assumed his guaranty, it follows his payments on account of the company's obligations amounted to $22,523.39. At the instance of the plaintiff, the court declared the law to be that, though Reinhardt guaranteed the payment of $15,000 on the rent and paid on said guaranty the sum of $12,093, he could not set off said sum against any indebtedness he owed as the holder of unpaid stock, unless it appeared the restaurant company had recognized or assented to his payment as stockholder of said rental, or the payment was made in such circumstances as to constitute him a creditor of the company for the amount, and that, though Reinhardt may have paid debts of the company to the amount of $5,000 or more, unless it was shown the company recognized and assented to such payments, Reinhardt could not set off the amount of them against any balance he owed for his stock. At the request of defendant, the court declared that, if Reinhardt paid $5,000 or more on account of the company under an understanding and arrangement with its president and general manager, these payments were to constitute payment on account of defendant's shares of stock, and, if the court found the money was used as aforesaid (i. e., to settle the debts of the company), though no formal action was taken by the board of directors authorizing this arrangement, such payment or payments were made on his stock; that, if Reinhardt became the guarantor of Hopkins, the original lessor, for $15,000 of the rent, and the restaurant company afterwards accepted an assignment of the rights and assumed the liabilities of Hopkins under said lease, and entered into possession and control of the premises, and thereafter Reinhardt paid any sum on account of his guaranty before execution had issued in favor of plaintiffs in this case and been returned nulla bona, and Reinhardt was not reimbursed for such payments, the same constituted a valid claim against the company which Reinhardt was entitled to offset against the judgment of plaintiffs against the company.

W. H. Ludwig and R. F. Walker, for appellants. Lee A. Hall, for respondents.

GOODE, J. (after stating the facts as above). We might dispose of this appeal by affirming the judgment for lack of evidence to prove the leasehold was worth less than the value placed on it by the company. We cannot take judicial notice on this question one way or the other. But, as the record is meager and the court below did not proceed on the theory the stock was unpaid, there may have been some testimony of the fact, or it may have been conceded. Therefore it will be more satisfactory if we consider the appeal on the merits.

We can see nothing favorable to the plaintiffs in any aspect of the case. Although the board of directors passed a resolution which treated the leasehold as payment in full of the capital stock, it appears to have been understood from the first respondent should advance $5,000 as a payment on his stock. There is an inconsistency between what the board resolved and this arrangement, but business men frequently act irregularly in these matters. It is certain respondent agreed to pay and paid $5,000 in cash on his stock, thereby leaving only $5,000 unpaid. But to pay rent and other expenses and buy supplies, he advanced for the company $17,000 in addition to the $5,000. These payments were made to keep the company alive and prevent suits against it, and while the company was still a going concern; and it is not disputed respondent may use them as a bar to plaintiffs' recovery in this proceeding if they occurred under circumstances which made him a creditor of the company. The question of the right of a holder of unpaid shares against whom a judgment creditor of the company proceeds by motion under the statute to avail himself by way of offset of a debt the company owes him which had accrued prior to the return nulla bona of an execution against the company has been determined in favor of the shareholder in several cases in this state. Webber v. Leighton, 8 Mo. App. 502; Manville v. Roever, 11 Mo. App. 317; Merchants' Ins. Co. v. Hill, 12 Mo. App. 148; Jerman's Adm'r v. Benton, 79 Mo. 148. The reasoning on which the offset is allowed is expounded in the opinion in Jerman's Adm'r v. Benton, which may be read with benefit, as also may the opinions in Briggs v. Penni- man, 8 Cow. (N. Y.) 397, 18 Am. Dec. 454, and Garrison v. Howe, 17 N. Y. 458. In the present case appellants insist the money paid by respondent for the benefit of the company was advanced voluntarily; wherefore he did not become a creditor of the company, and hence had no demand to set off against plaintiffs' judgment. It is true the board of directors did not, by motion or resolution, formally request respondent to make the payments, but the testimony shows they were essential to the continuance of the company's business, and, indeed, the capital on which it subsisted, and that they were made with the knowledge and approval of the president, were in each instance entered as a credit in favor of respondent on the books of the company, and the company so far assented to them and recognized them as creating obligations against it in his favor that it executed notes to him on account of them for more than $4,000; that is to say, for about all the money he advanced except the $5,000 paid on his shares and the $12,000 paid on his guaranty for rent. We consider the evidence was ample to justify the court below in finding the cash furnished by respondent above what was to be credited on his stock was advanced with the knowledge and consent of the managing officers of the company, and was treated by them as creating an indebtedness of the company to respondent.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Jesse A. McDonald, Judge.

Action by Martha Louise Williamson against the St. Louis & Meramec River Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jefferson Chandler, T. M. Pierce, and S. P. McChesney, for appellant. Taylor B. Young and Frank H. Haskins, for respondent.

NORTONI, J. This is an action for damages resulting from personal injuries alleged to have been received by the plaintiff while she was a passenger on one of defendant's street cars. The occasion of the injury was a collision with a hose wagon connected with the fire department of the city of St. Louis. Plaintiff recovered, and the defendant appeals.

The testimony on the part of the plaintiff tended to prove that the plaintiff was a passenger on defendant's west-bound car on Franklin avenue. A hose wagon of the city fire department, traveling south at a high rate of speed on Compton avenue, ran against the side of the car on which plaintiff was a passenger. The tongue or pole of the wagon crushed its way through the side of the car, striking plaintiff between the knee and the hip, causing her painful and serious injury. The defendant insists the court should have peremptorily directed a verdict for it in accordance with a request to that effect, for the reason the evidence was insufficient to establish a reasonable inference of negligence against its servants in operating the car. The case is properly one in which the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur inheres. It appears the plaintiff was entirely free from negligence, and that the injury was received while she was a passenger on a street car, the management of which was exclusively in the control of defendant's servants. Under such circumstances, the fact that street cars, when managed with prudence, do not ordinarily collide with other vehicles, without more, introduces into the case a presumption of negligence on the part of defendant's servants sufficient at least to remove the question within the province of the jury, and devolves upon the defendant the duty to overcome the presumption of negligence with evidence of due care on its part. Olsen v. Railway, 152 Mo. 426, 432, 54 S. W. 470; Mitchell v. C. & A. Ry. Co. (Mo. App.) 112 S. W. 291; St. Clair v. St. L. & S. F. Ry. Co., 122 Mo. App. 519, 99 S. W. 775. However, the plaintiff did not invoke the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, but assumed to prove negligent conduct on the part of defendant's servants, and we will, therefore, notice the facts tending to this end.

It appears Franklin avenue runs east and west. The street car on which plaintiff was a passenger was proceeding westward at a rate of speed between four and six miles an hour. At the point in question the west-bound car track runs on a downgrade. Compton avenue runs northward from Franklin avenue obliquely, tending to the northwest. The hose wagon, en route to a fire, was traveling under high pressure southward or toward Franklin, on Compton avenue. The driver of the hose wagon gave testimony to the effect that the gong attached thereto was constantly being sounded from the fire department's headquarters until the collision occurred. Other witnesses testified the sounding of the gong could be heard two or three blocks. When the defendant's car was about 125 or 150 feet east of the east line of Compton avenue, a bystander, being attracted by the noise of the approach of the hose wagon and realizing the impending danger of a collision, ran into the middle of the street, stood in the center of the west-bound car track, and waved numerous signals with his hand for the motorman to stop. The car continued to approach, however, finally stopping about the center of the crossing of Compton avenue, at which point the hose wagon simultaneously collided therewith, and inflicted the injury complained of. There was evidence that the track rails were wet, and the car slipped after the brake was set. There was evidence, too, by an expert motorman to the effect that a car running at the rate of speed mentioned could have been stopped on a wet rail at that point in about 90 feet, or three car lengths, if sand was applied to prevent slipping. An ordinance of the city of St. Louis providing that all fire apparatus shall have right of way on all streets and avenues of the city when attending a fire alarm was also introduced. The facts above detailed were amply sufficient to raise an inference of negligent conduct against defendant's motorman in charge of the car, for, had he been giving slight attention, he might have heard the gong attached to the hose wagon at least two blocks away, and, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, averted the collision. The fact that a bystander stood in the center of the track and waved signals when the car was 125 or 150 feet east of the east line of Compton avenue would contribute to invite the attention of one exercising due care for the safety of passengers to an impending danger. An ordinarily alert motorman should thereupon have discovered the approaching hose wagon by the sound of the gong, if his attention had not been attracted before. Aside from the signals waved by the man on the track, it appears a man exercising ordinary care for the safety of others should have heard the sounding gong on the hose wagon for two or three blocks. It is entirely clear the case was one for the jury, as appears by reference to Olsen v. Citizens' Railway Co., 152 Mo. 426, 54 S. W. 470, which is almost identical in material facts.

On behalf of plaintiff, the court instructed as follows: "The court instructs the jury that, if they find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, they will assess her damages in such sum as will be a just and fair compensation for the injuries received by her, as shown by the evidence, and, in fixing the amount of such damages, you will take into consideration, first, all expenses, if any, incurred by her for medical and surgical attendance directly caused by said injuries; secondly, bodily pain and mental anguish, permanent injuries, if any, suffered by plaintiff, directly caused by said injuries." This instruction is complained of, first, for the reason it permits a recovery for permanent injuries. It is said there is no evidence in the record tending to prove that the plaintiff had received permanent injuries. An examination of the record with the slightest care overthrows the objection mentioned. Besides the testimony of the plaintiff herself tending to prove permanent injuries, her physician testified: That shortly before the trial, upon his last examination of the injured parts, he found there was "a thickening of the bone at that point, and an atrophy or shrinking of the muscles. The bone appears to be thickened and inflamed, and the soft tissues are somewhat adhered at the point of injury." That this condition resulted from the injury mentioned, and that the injury was in his opinion permanent. A second objection to this instruction is to the effect that the instruction does not limit the amount of plaintiff's recovery to the amount specified in her petition. The amount specified and sued for in the petition is $4,500. The jury gave her a verdict for $3,000. Although, where instructions have failed to limit the amount of recovery and the jury returned a verdict in excess of the amount claimed in the petition, error has been affirmed on the ground of failure to limit the recovery by instruction (Wright v. Jacobs, 61 Mo. 19), the rule is certainly without force in a case where the recovery is for a less amount than that against which the defendant is called upon in the petition to defend. By command of our statute judgments should not be reversed except for error materially affecting the merits of the action. Aside from this statute, it would, indeed, be highly technical to predicate reversible error on a matter of such slight consequence in a case where the recovery is within the amount claimed in the petition. Crews v. Lackland, 67 Mo. 619, 622. The instruction was not improper, and the assignment of error is overruled.

Another one of plaintiff's instructions permitted the jury to affirm negligence on the part of defendant if the jury believed from the evidence that after they knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have known, of the impending danger of collision, the defendant's servants in charge of said car could, by the exercise of care, with the appliances at hand for that purpose and with safety to the passengers in the car, have avoided the collision, but negligently failed to do so by reason of which negligence the collision occurred. The instruction is complained of because it authorizes a verdict against the defendant company for the negligence of its servants, and thereby included the negligence of the conductor, as well as that of the motorman, as one in charge of the management of the car. The case of Gebhardt v. St. Louis Transit Company, 97 Mo. App. 373, 71 S. W. 448, is relied upon. The ruling in that case was given upon the vigilant watch ordinance to the effect that it was the duty of the motorman, and not of the conductor, to keep a vigilant watch for dangers. It is said no such duty is required of the conductor. The case cited is not an authority for the proposition advanced on the record now before us; for here it was certainly the duty of the conductor, as well as the motorman, if he either heard the sound of the gong on the hose wagon, or, by the exercise of ordinary care, might have discovered the danger in time to have averted it, to use all means at hand to that end, and the defendant company is responsible alike for the negligence of either the conductor or the motorman in such circumstances. The Supreme Court has expressly determined the identical question in a case almost on all fours with the one in judgment. Olsen v. Citizens' Railway Company, 152 Mo. 426-431, 54 S. W. 470. The instruction was proper, and the assignment of error is overruled.

The defendant requested and the court refused the following instruction: "The court instructs the jury that the mere possibility that the servants of the defendant in charge of its car could have stopped it in time after the danger to plaintiff, if any, was discovered, to have avoided a collision with said hose cart, is not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to a recovery." This action by the court is complained of as error. As an abstract proposition of law, the instruction may be well enough. However that may be, the court properly refused it, for the reason it wholly failed to incorporate the proper principles applicable to the facts in proof. It is conceded the plaintiff was in the exercise of due care on her part at the time of the injury. Before the defendant could be acquitted of her hurt, it was incumbent upon the jury to find that its servants had exercised due care to avert the injury. The standard of care applicable to the facts in proof is not even mentioned or referred to in the instruction mentioned. It is devoid of the essential elements of liability or nonliability arising on the facts, and was properly refused. See the following authorities in point: Cytron v. St. Louis Transit Company, 205 Mo. 692, 104 S. W. 109; Zels v. St. Louis Brewing Ass'n, 205 Mo. 638, 104 S. W. 99. The verdict was not excessive.

The remaining assignments of error are without merit, and are therefore overruled.

The judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 353*)—ACTIONS FOR BREACH—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for the breach of an oral contract for construction of a railroad, where defendant contended that there was no contract, but merely conversations with respect to the work, which were to be followed by a written agreement, which was afterwards drawn up subject to the approval of defendant's superintendent, but was not consummated because of his disapproval, and plaintiffs contended that the conversations constituted a valid oral contract which was neither merged in nor superseded by the writing, it was error to refuse to charge that if plaintiffs commenced work under the written memorandum, and not under an oral agreement, and continued to work thereunder until notified to quit on account of the disapproval of the memorandum, defendant should recover, since it submitted the issue whether plaintiffs relied upon an oral contract or on the writing which was subject to the superintendent's approval.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pemiscot County; H. C. Riley, Judge.

Action by William Tucker and another against the Deering Southwestern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and cause remanded.

Faris & Oliver, Oliver & Oliver, and J. M. Blazer, for appellant. Gossom & McKay, for respondents.

NORTONI, J. This is an action for damages alleged to have accrued to the plaintiffs because of the defendant's breach of an oral contract providing for the construction of an embankment for a railroad. The plaintiffs recovered, and the defendant appeals. The defendant is a railroad corporation existing under the laws of this state, and owns and operates a short line of railroad in Pemiscot county in connection with its sawmills for the purpose of conveying timber thereto. Henry Pingle was one of the directors of defendant railroad and its general superintendent. The defendant desired to extend its road a short distance, and Mr. Pingle was clothed with authority to negotiate a contract therefor in its behalf. There are two plaintiffs to the action, Tucker and King. The original contract declared upon in the petition, however, is alleged to have been entered into by the plaintiff Tucker and the defendant's superintendent, Mr. Pingle. King subsequently came into the case as a partner of Tucker by the consent of the defendant's civil engineer, Mr. Randolph. As stated, the petition declares upon an oral contract and its breach. It is alleged in the petition substantially that the plaintiffs and defendant entered into an oral contract on December 27, 1903, wherein the plaintiffs agreed to clear the right of way and construct a roadbed for the defendant's railroad from the town of Deering, in Pemiscot county, to a point of intersection with the Paragould Southeastern Railroad, in Dunklin county, Mo., according to the specifications and plans furnished by the engineer of the defendant railroad company, in consideration whereof the plaintiffs were to receive the sum and price of 25 cents per cubic yard for construction, subject to 10 per cent. shrinkage for all team work and 20 per cent. shrinkage for wheelbarrow and shovel work. All stations on said road were to be completed consecutively, and paid for as completed. It is further alleged that all merchantable timber standing on the right of way was to be cut into saw stock by the plaintiffs, for which they were to receive a compensation of 50 cents per 1,000; that the plaintiffs entered upon the work and performed every condition of the contract on their part until about January 21, 1904, when they were notified by defendant railroad company to desist from further prosecution thereof; that the defendant refused to permit them to further comply with the contract and earn large profits which would otherwise have accrued to them, etc.; and that they were damaged by reason of the defendant's breach of the contract mentioned in the sum of $9,774, for which they ask judgment.

The testimony on the part of the plaintiffs tended to prove that the plaintiff Tucker, a railroad contractor, had a conversation with defendant's superintendent, Pingle, on December 27, 1903, at the depot at Pascola while Mr. Pingle was awaiting a train. The entire conversation consumed about 20 minutes' time. Tucker insists that he proposed to Pingle to clear the right of way, construct a roadbed, etc., at the price of 25 cents per cubic yard, subject to 10 per cent. shrinkage for team work and 20 per cent. shrinkage for wheelbarrow and shovel work, and otherwise as declared in the petition; and, further, that he would cut all merchantable timber on the right of way into saw stock at 50 cents per 1,000. He testified that Mr. Pingle accepted his proposition in every respect other than the price to be paid for cutting the merchantable timber into saw stock. This matter was left open temporarily, with the understanding that Mr. Randolph, the defendant's civil engineer, would make some agreement on the part of the railroad with respect to the matter; that he should see Mr. Randolph, and Randolph could reduce the contract to writing provided Tucker so desired. Tucker says he met Mr. Pingle a second time three or four days thereafter, upon which occasion Pingle accepted his proposition of 50 cents per 1,000 for cutting the merchantable timber into saw stock, thus completing the contract, and instructed him to move upon and commence the work. About this time Tucker moved his teams and equipment to the work, and Superintendent Pingle introduced Tucker to those in charge of the company's store and commissary, giving instructions to the effect that Tucker was going to build the railroad, and that they should let him have goods, supplies, etc. Thereupon Mr. Pingle departed for Chicago, where he was detained by business for a number of days. In the interim, plaintiff Tucker, with the consent of the defendant's civil engineer, Randolph, took the plaintiff King into the contract with him as partner. Tucker insists the oral contract as heretofore detailed was entirely completed between himself and Mr. Pingle prior to his associating King therewith, which was consented to by the defendant's civil engineer, and not objected to thereafter by Pingle. About January 4, 1904, when King became associated with plaintiff Tucker as partner, he insisted upon having a written memorandum, at least, with respect to the matter, and declined to proceed until such was had. Thereupon the two plaintiffs met the defendant's civil engineer, Mr. Randolph, during the period while Superintendent Pingle was detained in Chicago, and entered into the following written memorandum, subject to the approval of Superintendent Pingle. "Deering, Mo., Jan. 7, 1904. Agreement between the Deering Southwestern Railway and Wm. Tucker and D. King, to be known as Tucker & King. Whereas, it is agreed that in consideration of the sum of twenty-five (25) cents per cubic yard, to be paid by the said Deering Southwestern Ry., the said Tucker & King shall clear the right-of-way and build the roadbed for said road, according to grade and specifications furnished by the engineer. All stations to be completed consecutively, also shall receive the sum of fifty (50) cents per M. for all timber cut as saw stock and shall be merchantable timber, according to the orders of the timber foreman. This work shall be subject to a shrinkage discount of 10 per cent. for team work and 20 per cent. for barrow or shovel work, and shall be inspected and paid for as each station is completed as near as practicable. This agreement subject to the approval of the superintendent. Deering Southwestern Ry., by E. C. Randolph, Eng. It is further understood and agreed that the men now engaged in station work shall continue at same as they may desire at the price of twenty (20) cents per cubic yard, and shall work under the supervision and contract of said Tucker & King, who shall furnish their station work on reasonable grounds. [Signed] E. C. Randolph. Wm. Tucker. D. King." Immediately thereafter plaintiffs commenced operations on the roadbed. They continued to prosecute the work for some days. Mr. Pingle returned from Chicago January 18th, declined to approve the memorandum of the contract as drafted, and had one or two conversations with the plaintiffs concerning certain details about the distance they were to build the embankment, insisting that he had not agreed that it should be constructed by them to the Paragould Southeastern Railroad, and, further, that certain stipulations should be contained therein concerning the payment of labor, etc., looking to the protection of the defendant against labor liens. Plaintiffs declined to accede to Mr. Pingle's wishes in this behalf, and thereupon, on January 21st, he notified them to desist from further operations on the road.

The theory of the case, as presented by the defendant, is that no contract whatever was made with the plaintiff Tucker nor with Tucker & King. Mr. Pingle, the superintendent, insists that the two conversations between him and Tucker had prior to his going to Chicago were preliminary only, and did not amount to a contract between them. Mr. Pingle says there was no contract to build the road to connect with the Paragould Southeastern Railroad, which is a distance of about 9½ miles, that they contemplated a much shorter extension; and that the conversations were general only, with respect to how the work was to be done and the price to be paid. On the defendant's theory of the case it appears the contract was to be afterwards reduced to writing by the civil engineer, Randolph, and the plaintiffs, subject to the approval of Superintendent Pingle. And therefore the contract was never consummated for the reason Pingle declined to approve it because the plaintiffs would not stipulate as to the distance the road should be constructed and concerning the time and manner of payment, labor liens, etc. It therefore appears that defendant insists no contract whatever, either oral or written, was entered into between it and the plaintiffs touching the matters mentioned. The plaintiffs insist that, while no written contract was entered into for the reason Pingle declined to approve it, there was a valid oral contract between the parties in the first instance, which was neither merged in nor superseded by the writing. There is no instruction contained in the record which pointedly refers this issue to the jury. It is true in some of the instructions for plaintiffs the contract "mentioned in the petition" is referred to the jury. In none of them, however, is the issue referred in pointed terms for the jury to find whether the contract declared upon was or was not entered into between the parties, and in none of the instructions are the jury required to find its breach. We may regard the matter concerning the breach as immaterial, however, inasmuch as the entire case shows the contract to have been breached, if it was, in fact, entered into. Upon another trial the issues should be defined with more particularity.

The defendant sought to have referred to the jury its theory of the case, to the effect that the two conversations had with Superintendent Pingle by Tucker amounted to no more than preliminary negotiations, to be subsequently incorporated in writing by Randolph and the plaintiffs, subject to Pingle's approval. To that end, it requested, and the court refused, to instruct in effect that if plaintiffs commenced the work for defendant under a written memorandum dated January 7, 1904, and not under an oral agreement, and continued to work under the written memorandum until notified to quit on account of the disapproval of its terms by defendant's superintendent, then plaintiffs have failed to make out a case, and the verdict should be for the defendant. This instruction should have been given, for, indeed, if plaintiffs refused to enter upon the work at all, as testified by plaintiff King, until they had a writing, then it is obvious that whatever oral agreement the parties may have had was abandoned by the plaintiffs, and at their instance merged in the writing which, by its terms, could only become a completed contract upon the approval of the superintendent, Pingle. Of course, we do not mean to say that the rule operating a merger of all prior negotiations in the written contract applies in its full force here for the reason no written contract was finally consummated because Pingle, who retained a veto power, refused to approve it; but what we do say is that the defendant was entitled to have its instruction for the reason it placed before the jury the question as to whether the plaintiffs relied upon an oral contract, as they claim, or whether what had been said between Pingle and Tucker were merely negotiations looking to a contract, to be thereafter reduced to writing by Randolph, subject to Pingle's approval.

In proving damages plaintiffs' counsel asked plaintiff King the following question: "State whether or not you went to great expense in preparing and getting down and beginning this work." Over competent objection and exception, plaintiff answered: "I think the books will show between $600 and $700 expenses getting in there and beginning; supplies, tools, stuff, camp outfit, taken in there." The plaintiffs were professional railroad contractors. Their "tools, stuff, camp outfit," etc., were, of course, valuable to them in the prosecution of the work for the defendant or any other railroad on which they might be employed and remained of value to them, notwithstanding the breach of the contract declared upon. Any element of damage predicated upon these items, "tools, stuff, camp outfit," etc., was certainly remote, and not allowable as a natural and necessary result of the breach of the contract complained of. Applegate v. Franklin, 109 Mo. App. 293-304, 84 S. W. 347. The damages accruing to the plaintiffs on this score, if any, are the result of an unusual combination of circumstances which could not be reasonably anticipated, and over which the defendant railroad company had no control. Such damages are remote. 8 Amer. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 542.

The verdict was for $2,000, in which nine of the jurors only concurred. The admission of the evidence complained of no doubt materially contributed to the result. The judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded. It is so ordered.

Goode, J., dissenting in part.

Appeal from St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction; Hiram N. Moore, Judge.

Henry Jacobs was convicted of petit larceny, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Thomas B. Harvey, for appellant. J. D. Dalton, for the State.

NORTONI, J. The defendant, a keeper of a secondhand store and junkshop, was convicted on a charge of petit larceny, and prosecutes this appeal. The subject of the alleged larceny was a small quantity of molten lead, the property of the Laclede Gaslight Company. The material fact relied upon for conviction was an unexplained possession of the recently stolen property. The defense interposed is to the effect that defendant purchased the lead from a negro; that he took the name and address of the negro, and entered the same in a book kept for the purpose, in accordance with an ordinance of the city of St. Louis requiring as much from keepers of secondhand stores and junkshops. The error complained of on appeal is that the court excluded declarations of defendant as of the res gestæ made in his interest to the police officer at the time of his arrest. The defendant himself sought to testify, and his counsel also sought to elicit from the police officer who made the arrest, that the defendant then stated to the officer the fact with respect to his coming into possession of the lead by purchase from the negro, whose name and address he had entered in a book. The court excluded this evidence both upon cross-examination of the police officer and upon direct examination of the defendant as being self-serving declarations of the accused, and therefore inadmissible. There is certainly no doubt of the rule of evidence to the effect that what the defendant may have said to the police officer in explanation of his possession of the alleged stolen property immediately upon his being arrested, or given to understand that he was accused of the theft on the discovery of the property in his possession, would be admissible as part of the res gestæ. 18 Amer. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 492, 493; State v. Castor, 93 Mo. 242-251, 5 S. W. 906; State v. Ware, 62 Mo. 597-601; 2 Bishop, New Crim. Proceed. (4th Ed.) § 746. It is always important, however, in the admission of such evidence, to prevent the defendant's self-serving declarations from coming before the jury. 2 Bishop, New Crim. Proceed. (4th Ed.) § 746; Foster v. State, 4 Tex. App. 246.

The theory of the law in receiving in evidence as of the res gestæ declarations of the accused made contemporaneously with and illustrative of the fact about which they are spoken, or upon being first charged with the offense, and before he has had an opportunity to contrive or concoct a story, is that because of their spontaneity they are at least likely to be true. If such declarations are reasonable and consistent with his innocence, they are entitled to very considerable weight in the scale or balance along with the presumption of innocence attending the defendant in a criminal cause. On the other hand, if some considerable time has elapsed after the property is discovered in possession of the accused, and he is informed of the suspicion attached to his possession, such declarations in his own interest are excluded as self-serving, and not of the res gestæ, on the theory that he has had ample time to concoct or contrive a story in his own interest tending to mislead or conceal the true fact. 2 Bishop, New Crim. Proceed. (4th Ed.) § 746; 18 Amer. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 492, 493; State v. Castor, 93 Mo. 242-252, 5 S. W. 906. It therefore appears that the defendant was entitled to the benefit of whatever statements he may have made in his own interest touching the possession of the property when first arrested or informed that he was under suspicion. It appears from the bill of exceptions that Hollis, the agent of the gas company, was absent from the place on its premises from whence the lead was stolen only about 15 minutes. Upon returning, the molten lead had disappeared. After searching a short time only therefor, he discovered it in defendant's place of business, wrapped in an old sack, lying near some scales. It does not appear that he said anything to the defendant about the matter one way or another. It seems Hollis sent out for a police officer, who answered his call a few moments thereafter, and made the arrest. From all that appears in the bill of exceptions the defendant was not taxed with the theft, nor for that matter in any manner given to understand that he was under suspicion until the police officer appeared and arrested him. There is indeed no word in the record to the effect that the defendant was even present in his store when Hollis entered, and discovered the lead there-

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes in. A majority of the court are therefore persuaded that to allow an inference from what appears in the record to the effect that defendant was present when Hollis entered, and, on this inference, base another inference that Hollis accused him, or otherwise intimated that he was under suspicion of the theft, would be unreasonable indeed. To base inference upon inference or presumption upon presumption is not permissible. To predicate on mere inference the ruling insisted upon here certainly does not comport with the ends of justice sought to be attained by the principles of the common law in those proceedings wherein the liberty of a citizen is involved. Every word which appears in the bill of exceptions touching this matter is contained in the following excerpt therefrom: "John Hollis, being duly sworn, upon his oath stated that he resided at 1411 Spruce street, in the city of St. Louis, and is now, and for quite a while has been, employed as a private watchman for the Laclede Gaslight Company, which is a corporation doing business in the city of St. Louis, and state of Missouri; that on March 17, 1906, a lot of scrap lead was melted on the premises of said company for the purpose of cooling out, and that during the very short absence of the said Hollis from the yard where said lead was placed it was stolen and taken away by some person unknown to witness, and in 10 or 15 minutes after having seen the lead in the said yard aforesaid the witness missed it and undertook to find it; that 10 or 15 minutes thereafter the witness went to the premises of the defendant, Harry Jacobs, where the said Jacobs keeps a secondhand store and junkshop, and found the lead back of some scales still hot and wrapped, or partially wrapped in a piece of cloth or sack; that witness examined the lead, and recognized and identified it as the same lead which had been taken, stolen, and carried away as aforesaid from the premises of the Laclede Gaslight Company, of which said company it was then and there the property, by certain indentations he made therein as the lead was cooling, and that it weighed about seventy-five (75) pounds and was of the value of three ($3.00) dollars or four ($4.00) dollars; and thereupon the witness sent for a policeman and within a few minutes Officer Kinsey came into the junkshop and arrested Jacobs, and the lead aforesaid was taken by the witness." From a careful perusal of this excerpt it is obvious that nothing appears therein to the effect that the defendant was informed in any manner by Hollis that he was under suspicion of having stolen the lead. It does appear affirmatively therefrom, however, that upon his arrival the police officer arrested Jacobs and the declarations of Jacobs sought to be introduced in evidence were the declarations made then and there upon the occasion of his arrest, and, so far as the record shows, immediately upon his being first taxed with the theft.

Entertaining this view, the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded. It is so ordered.

BLAND, P. J., concurs.

GOODE, J., concurs in remanding the case, but thinks it is a question for the jury whether defendant knew he was suspected of the crime when he made the declaration explanatory of his possession of the stolen property.

CURRY v. LA FON.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Oct. 20, 1908.)

1. JOINT ADVENTURES (§ 4*)—MUTUAL DUTIES OF PARTIES—TAKING OF SECRET PROFIT BY ONE PARTY.

Where co-adventurers bargain for the purchase of land, to part of which the vendor's title is found to be faulty, the consummation of a deal by one of them with the vendor, without the knowledge of the other, whereby such one receives a profit in consideration of carrying out the purchase of the portion to which a good title was furnished, is contrary to the policy of the law.

2. MORTGAGES (§ 282*)—TRANSFER OF PROPERTY—ASSUMPTION OF MORTGAGE DEBT BY GRANTEE.

A covenant in a deed, by which the grantee assumes the payment of a mortgage on the land, creates an obligation, on which the mortgagee may sue the grantee covenantor for the indebtedness assumed.

3. MORTGAGES (§ 275*)—TRANSFER OF PROPERTY—ASSUMPTION OF MORTGAGE DEBT BY GRANTEE—ESTOPPEL.

Where a grantee for a valuable consideration assumes a mortgage indebtedness on the land, he is estopped from disputing the validity of the indebtedness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 780; Dec. Dig. § 275.*]

4. ESTATES (§ 10*)—MERGER.

A merger, which takes place when a greater and lesser estate coincide in the same person, in the same right, without the intervention of any other right or title, by the lesser estate merging in the greater can be effected only when the same person possesses both the equitable and legal title; and hence, where one is a tenant in common in an equity of redemption, and the legal title to the property is in a trustee under a trust deed, the mere fact that the tenant of the equity reacquires the notes and mortgage given by him and his co-tenant does not effect a merger in him of the equitable and legal estates so as to extinguish the indebtedness under the notes.

5. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 440*)—PAYMENT—REISSUE BY MAKER.

The maker of a note may reissue it before maturity, for a valid consideration, so as to bind himself as effectually as in the first instance; and hence, though mortgage notes are paid by a joint maker, so as to extinguish their original obligation against the other maker, the latter can reissue them before maturity for a new consideration, as by assuming their payment by covenant in a deed as part consideration for his co-maker's interest in the equity of redemption in the mortgaged land.

6. CONTRACTS (§ 140*)—VALIDITY—SUBSEQUENT CONTRACT BASED ON ORIGINAL CONSIDERATION.

The rule that, if the original consideration for a note is illegal or immoral, subsequent contracts based on that consideration are unenforceable does not apply where the original consideration for notes was land purchased by two joint adventurers, and free from immorality or illegality, though the notes might be void as against the policy of the law because of a connivance between the vendor and one of the adventurers whereby such adventurer received a secret profit.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Audrain County; J. D. Barnett, Judge.

Action by W. B. Curry against A. M. La Fon. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

P. H. Cullen and S. D. Stocks, for appellant. A. E. Rieger and Geo. Robertson, for respondent.

NORTONI, J. This is a suit by the holder of a note against the grantee in a deed, on a stipulation in the deed by which the defendant covenanted to assume and pay the note mentioned, which was secured by a mortgage on the land conveyed by the deed. The plaintiff recovered, and defendant appeals.

The facts out of which the controversy arose are somewhat complicated, and will be stated in extenso. The plaintiff, Curry, and the defendant, La Fon, had formerly been partners in the real estate business. This partnership was dissolved, however, recently before their association in the present instance. Having decided to purchase some lands jointly in the state of Arkansas, they visited one Louis Sachs, who was engaged in the real estate business, and together examined and agreed to purchase 2,080 acres of land in Arkansas owned by Sachs. This was in July. They entered into a written contract with Sachs, whereby they agreed to purchase the 2,080 acres of Arkansas land at the stipulated price of $17,000, to be paid as follows: Curry and La Fon were to assume the payment of a $2,500 mortgage on the land. They were to pay Sachs $3,000 in cash, deed him certain property in Missouri owned by them jointly, at the agreed price of $4,000, and to execute their joint promissory notes, payable to Sachs, for the sum of $7,500, which notes were to be secured by a second mortgage on the lands acquired from Sachs. Sachs agreed to furnish good and sufficient title to the Arkansas lands, and execute a warranty deed therefor, subject only to the $2,500 mortgage thereon, heretofore mentioned. The deal was to be finally consummated on the 1st of the following January. During the interim between the time this contract was entered into and the date at which it was finally consummated, it was discovered that Mr. Sachs was unable to furnish satisfactory title to 240 acres of the land mentioned. It seems the present plaintiff, Curry, took advantage of this fact, and, without the knowledge of his associate, the present defendant, La Fon, interviewed Mr. Sachs, and informed him that, inasmuch as their contract for the purchase of the Arkansas land was an entire obligation, he considered himself no longer obligated to complete the deal, as Sachs would be unable to furnish sufficient title to all the lands mentioned. He suggested, however, that if, upon a final consummation of the deal, Sachs would agree to take from him an equity which he owned in several brick buildings in Green City, Mo., at an agreed price of $3,500, and exchange therefor notes to that amount, which were to be executed by the defendant, La Fon, and himself to Sachs, he might waive his objection and consummate the trade, provided Sachs agreed to drop out of the deal the 240 acres of land to which the title had proved insufficient, at an agreed valuation of $2,000. Mr. Sachs investigated the Green City equity owned by Curry, and entered into a collateral agreement with him to the effect suggested. The purport of this agreement was that, upon Curry and La Fon consummating the deal for the Arkansas lands, Sachs would assign to Curry certain of the notes, to be jointly executed by Curry and La Fon, and purchase the Green City equity at $3,500. This collateral agreement, however, was not revealed to the defendant La Fon, and in fact it was the purpose of both Curry and Sachs to keep La Fon in ignorance thereof. For some reason the deal for the Arkansas property was not finally consummated until the 14th of the following February, on which date the several parties met at Kirksville, Mo., and exchanged deeds. The 240 acres of Arkansas land, to which Sachs had found himself unable to perfect title, was dropped from consideration at an agreed valuation of $2,000. As thus modified Curry and La Fon purchased from Sachs 1,840 acres of land at a valuation of $15,000, to be paid for as above indicated except, instead of giving to Sachs a second mortgage for $7,500, they were to execute notes and a mortgage to him for $5,500. On that date, February 14, 1904, Sachs executed and delivered to Curry and La Fon a warranty deed conveying the 1,840 acres of Arkansas land, subject to the $2,500 mortgage, then outstanding against the same, which mortgage Curry and La Fon assumed. Curry and La Fon at the same time each paid to Sachs $1,500 in cash, a total of $3,000, and conveyed to him equities in certain real properties, at an agreed valuation of $4,000, and executed to him their two series of joint and several promissory notes, aggregating $5,500. These notes were all antedated, in accordance with the original agreement as of January 1, 1904. As stated, instead of this $5,500 indebtedness being included in one note, it was divided into six notes, all of which were dated January 1, 1904, signed by both Curry and La Fon, and payable to Louis Sachs or order, in the following manner: Two notes for $1,000 each, due January 1, 1906; two notes for $1,000 each, due January 1, 1907; two notes for $750 each, due January 1, 1908—all of the notes to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. etc. While Curry and La Fon both signed each of the notes mentioned, it appears they were divided in the manner indicated, and ran concurrently in two series, in order to enable Sachs and Curry to carry out and consummate their collateral bargain concerning the Green City equity. Although this is true, La Fon insists that, at and before the execution of the notes, he was not informed as to this purpose, nor as to the details of the collateral trade between Sachs and Curry respecting the Green City property. Immediately upon the execution and delivery of the several notes to Sachs, or during the same day at least, Sachs indorsed in blank and delivered to Curry one-half of the notes mentioned, amounting to $2,750—that is, one of the entire series of notes—and returned to Curry $750 in money, making a total of $3,500 notes and cash, and in consideration thereof accepted from Curry a deed to his equity in the Green City property at an agreed valuation of $3,500. Mr. La Fon admits in his testimony that he learned these facts during that day, and immediately upon the execution and delivery of the notes.

Although Curry and his wife, before the delivery of the notes to Sachs, executed a mortgage deed of trust to Sachs securing the same, Mr. La Fon failed to sign the same at that time, for the reason his wife was not in Kirksville. But with full knowledge of the fact that Curry had received an assignment of the notes for the Green City property, La Fon conveyed the mortgage to his home at Mexico, Mo., where he and his wife executed the same before a proper officer two days thereafter, and delivered it to Mr. Sachs. In April thereafter Sachs informed Mr. La Fon fully as to the details of his collateral bargain with Curry, whereby he had acquired the Green City property, and Curry had become possessed of $2,500 of the joint notes of Curry and La Fon; or, in other words, that he had assigned to Curry, for the consideration mentioned, one-half of the joint indebtedness of Curry and La Fon to him, and that Curry then held the notes. In the month of June thereafter the defendant, La Fon submitted a proposition to Curry to purchase from him Curry's one-half interest in the equity of redemption in the Arkansas lands on which the mortgage securing the notes lay. Curry agreed to accept, and La Fon agreed to pay to him $1,500 for his equity therein. La Fon caused to be drafted a warranty deed from Curry and wife, purporting to convey Curry's one-half interest in the lands mentioned to La Fon. This deed recited a consideration of $9,000, subject, however, to the $2,500 mortgage, which was outstanding against the land at the time Curry and La Fon bought it, and subject also to the following mortgages: Two for $1,000, each given January 1, 1904, due January 1, 1906; two for $1,000 each, given January 1, 1904, due January 1, 1907; two for $750 each, given January 1, 1904, and due January 1, 1908—all of which mortgages it is stipulated therein "the said A. M. La Fon assumes." All of the evidence in the case tends to establish that the indebtedness assumed in this deed is the identical indebtedness existing against the lands by virtue of the joint notes of Curry and La Fon, of which notes Curry, at the time, as La Fon well knew, was possessed of three, representing a principal of $2,750 under assignment from Sachs, the payee. A few days after having received this deed from La Fon, as prepared by him, Curry and his wife executed and delivered the same to La Fon. La Fon accepted the deed containing the covenant of assumption inserted therein by himself, or the scrivener at his instance, and paid Curry $1,500 in addition to the covenant of assumption, as a consideration for his equity of redemption in the Arkansas land. At this time, June 25, 1904, none of the notes mentioned had fallen due. Upon maturity of the first note Curry asserted his claim against La Fon on the covenant of assumption in the deed, and La Fon refused to pay, declaring that he was not indebted to Curry for several reasons, to be hereinafter noticed. Thereupon Curry instituted the present action on the covenant in the deed to recover the amount of the first installment of indebtedness, originally evidenced by one of the joint notes of Curry and La Fon to Sachs, dated January 1, 1904, for the sum of $1,000, and due January 1, 1906, with interest thereon, which note had been assigned to Curry by Sachs, as above stated, and was secured by a mortgage assumed by La Fon. The circuit court peremptorily directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

As stated above, the evidence tended to prove that Curry made a collateral deal with Sachs, whereby he exchanged the Green City equity for the note in suit and others, that this collateral arrangement was carefully concealed from La Fon until the purchase of the Arkansas land was actually consummated and the notes executed, and, further, that Curry made a secret profit by the exchange. That is to say, Curry seized upon the opportunity to be relieved from the en-ture contract for the purchase of the Arkansas lands because of the failure of title to a portion thereof, and thereby procured an agreement from Sachs to accept his Green City equity at an inflated value for the notes mentioned, and thus realize a secret profit to himself of probably $2,000. An argument is predicated on this evidence, to the effect that, Curry and La Fon having associated themselves together in a joint undertaking for the purchase of the Arkansas land, the highest degree of good faith was due from each to the other, and that therefore the contract which Curry made with Sachs violative of this confidence, and whereby a secret profit accrued to Curry, even though indirectly, as by the exchange of the equity for the notes, rendered the notes absolutely void as against public policy, and therefore acquits La Fon of the duty to respond to Curry in this action. The peremptory direction of a verdict for the plaintiff by the trial court of course eliminated this element of the defense. The defendant complains of this action and insists the matter should have been referred to the jury for an ascertainment of fact as to whether or not Curry and Sachs had, in fact, conspired to conceal this collateral arrangement from him, and that it resulted in a secret profit to Curry. It is no doubt true that the taking of a secret profit by one of two co-adventurers, in the manner and under the circumstances suggested, is contrary to the policy of the law. Seehorn v. Hall, 130 Mo. 257, 32 S. W. 643, 51 Am. St. Rep. 562. And were this suit on the notes alone for contribution, possibly an accounting of the profits mentioned could be had. However this may be, the present action predicates, not on the note mentioned and its original consideration, but rather upon the covenant of assumption of payment contained in the deed resting upon an entirely new consideration; that is, the conveyance of Curry's equity of redemption in the Arkansas land to La Fon. We are of the opinion that the entire matter is precluded by this covenant; that is to say, that the defendant is estopped from asserting the invalidity of the obligation of the note which he has assumed by the covenant contained in the deed.

As stated before, the suit proceeds upon the covenant in the deed by which the defendant assumed the payment of the note to Curry. It is well settled that a covenant contained in a deed of the nature mentioned creates an obligation on which a mortgagee may sue the grantee covenantor for the indebtedness assumed. Fitzgerald v. Barker, 4 Mo. App. 105; Id., 70 Mo. 685; Id., 85 Mo. 13; Id., 13 Mo. App. 192; Kelfer v. Shacklett, 85 Mo. App. 449; Jones on Mortgages (6th Ed.) § 740 et seq. And it is the universal rule that the purchaser in such circumstances is not allowed to defend against a mortgage debt he has assumed to pay on the ground that it is without consideration. Terry v. Durand Land Co., 112 Mich. 665, 71 N.

W. 625; Crawford v. Edwards, 33 Mich. 354. Nor will he be heard to set up the invalidity of the mortgage. Parkinson v. Sherman, 74 N. Y. 88, 30 Am. Rep. 268. The purchaser is not permitted to show the mortgage deed was invalid as against the mortgagor. Crawford v. Edwards, 33 Mich. 354; Comstock v. Smith, 26 Mich. 306; Gowans v. Pierce, 57 Kan. 180, 45 Pac. 586; Alt v. Banholzer, 36 Minn. 57, 29 N. W. 674. Nor will he be permitted to say the mortgage debt assumed was void under the pre-emption laws (Green v. Houston, 22 Kan. 35), for the grantee is liable on his covenant of assumption, even though his grantor were not (Dean v. Walker, 107 Ill. 540, 47 Am. Rep. 467). And this doctrine is equally true where the mortgage and deed were originally void on account of usury. Jones on Mortgages (6th Ed.) § 736. The acceptance of the deed containing such a covenant is sufficient to and does operate an estoppel against, and concludes the grantee from subsequently denying the validity of that to which he has theretofore, for a valuable consideration, admitted to be a valid obligation. It is certain that he cannot hold under the deed and dispute the validity of his covenant therein, which enters into and forms the very consideration which moved the grantor to vest title in him. Fitzgerald v. Barker, 85 Mo. 13, 21; Jones on Mortgages (6th Ed.) 744; 13 Amer. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 818, 820. Defendant insists, however, that if the note was void as against public policy, then there was no debt to be assumed by the grantee. It is unnecessary to consider this proposition further than to say that, under all of the authorities, he is estopped from disputing the covenant in his deed recognizing the debt as valid and assuming its payment. Although the notes in the first instance were invalid on the grounds of public policy referred to—and this question it is unnecessary to decide—the defense is precluded by estoppel. There was certainly a valid consideration for the covenant contained in the deed, by which the defendant received title to Curry's interest in the equity of redemption; and, although the note was void in the first instance, it would operate as a sufficient memorandum to show the amount and character of indebtedness which was assumed by a valid obligation contained in the deed. Be this as it may, the defendant is estopped, at all hazards, from asserting that the note was originally invalid.

The parties were joint owners of the equity of redemption, and likewise joint and several makers of the notes assumed in the deed. It is therefore insisted that, as Curry received an assignment and became possessed of the three several notes mentioned while he yet retained his title to the equity as tenant in common with the defendant, the doctrine of merger then intervened, and entirely extinguished the indebtedness mentioned in the notes, and in this view there was no indebtedness upon which the covenant of assumption in the deed could attach. The rule is absolute at law that a merger takes place when a greater estate and a lesser coincide and meet in one and the same person, in one and the same right, without the intervention of any other or outstanding right or title. Under such circumstances the lesser estate is annihilated or merged into the greater. It is said: "The doctrine of merger springs from the fact that, when the entire equitable and legal estates are united in the same person, there can be no occasion to keep them distinct, for ordinarily it would be of no use to the owner to keep up a charge upon the estate of which he was seised in fee simple; but, if there is an outstanding, intervening title, the foundation for the merger does not exist, and, as a matter of law, it is so declared." Stantons v. Thompson, 49 N. H. 272; Jones on Mortgages (6th Ed.) § 848; 20 Amer. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 1064. It therefore appears that, in order to effect a merger so as to extinguish the lesser estate, there must be a union, in the same person, of both the equitable and legal titles, without an intervening right operating to prevent a merger. Therefore, when one holds an equity of redemption, and the legal title to the property is outstanding in a trustee, the mere fact that he acquires and holds the notes and mortgage is insufficient to operate a merger of the equitable and legal estates in him, and this, for the reason that the legal estate is still outstanding in the trustee, and thus intervenes to prevent the merger. This doctrine is sound in the principle underlying the rule of merger, as we understand it. It has been so declared by the courts, and asserted by the standard text-writers. Hospes v. Almstedt, 13 Mo. App. 270; State ex rel. Peters v. Koch, 47 Mo. 582; Jones on Mortgages (6th Ed.) § 488. Now in the case at bar, while Curry and La Fon held the equity of redemption, the lands were incumbered by what is commonly known as a "mortgage deed of trust." By the provisions of this instrument the legal title was vested in Louis Sachs, with power of sale upon default in the payment of the notes mentioned. Sachs, therefore, occupied the position of trustee in whom the legal title to the lands at all times resided, and thus intervened to prevent a merger of estates in Curry by virtue of his holding the notes while he was co-tenant in the equity of redemption. Aside from all of this La Fon's acceptance of the covenant, assuming to pay the indebtedness mentioned as parcel of the consideration for the lands, operates to estop him from making the defense of merger. Fitzgerald v. Barker, 85 Mo. 13, and cases supra.

It is argued that, as Curry and La Fon were joint and several makers of the notes, the fact that Curry purchased the same from Sachs and received an assignment thereof operates at law as payment, and entirely extinguishes the indebtedness therein evidenced, and that therefore there is no indebtedness evidenced by the note upon which the covenant in the deed could attach and operate. Although the purchase of the note by Curry, one of the original makers, operated the extinguishment of its original obligation, so as to prevent him from maintaining an action thereon against La Fon other than for contribution or for money paid to the use of his co-obligor (Williams v. Gerber, 75 Mo. App. 18; Dillenbeck v. Dygert, 97 N. Y. 308, 49 Am. Rep. 525; Stevens v. Hannan, 86 Mich. 305, 48 N. W. 951, 24 Am. St. Rep. 125; Reynolds v. Schade [Mo. App.] 100 S. W. 629-632) and although such a purchase by and assignment to Curry operated to prevent his reissuing the note, if a valid one as an obligation on its original promise against his co-maker, La Fon, at least for an amount greater than his right of contribution against his co-maker (Stevens v. Hannan, 86 Mich. 305, 48 N. W. 951, 24 Am. St. Rep. 125), there is certainly no reason why La Fon could not, for a new and valid consideration, reissue the note against himself. Upon this theory of the case it is to be remembered La Fon knew the notes were held by Curry, and that they were paid. If they were not yet due, and he saw fit to reissue the identical notes to Curry, or to any other person for a new and valuable consideration, we are familiar with no principle to forbid it in so far as he was concerned; that is, to forbid him reissuing them as obligations against himself only. The general rule that the maker of a note who is sui juris may reissue the paper before maturity for a valid consideration, so as to bind him as effectually as in the first instance, is firmly imbedded in the law, and is beyond question. Sater v. Hunt, 66 Mo. App. 528; 2 Edwards, Bills and Notes (3d Ed.) § 723; 4 Amer. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 500. And so it is we conclude that, even though the notes were void in the first instance as against public policy, because of the misconduct of Curry and Sachs, and for that reason unenforceable against La Fon, or even though they were extinguished or paid by the act of Curry, the joint maker, purchasing the same, it was competent for La Fon to revive, rehabilitate, and reissue the same for a new, distinct, and valid consideration, as he did by assuming their payment by the covenant in the deed as part of the consideration for the lands.

As to the proposition that, even though the note was void in the first instance, it was competent for La Fon to reissue the same as a valid obligation against himself for a new consideration, it may be said that, if it was infected with illegality at all, the taint was not in the original consideration for which the note was given, but resulted rather from the misconduct of Curry and Sachs when considered from the standpoint of La Fon and his rights. The consideration for the note in the first instance was the Arkansas lands which were purchased by Curry and La Fon, and this consideration was a valuable one, and entirely free from immorality or illegality. The original consideration was neither immoral nor illegal in itself, however much the promise of the note, when considered from the standpoint of La Fon, may have become tainted by the misconduct of Curry and Sachs. It is very true if the original consideration were illegal or immoral, then no subsequent contract bearing an obligation to execute the original, and into which the original immoral or illegal consideration mingled, could be enforced. "The policy of the law forbids the enforcement of a subsequent contract based upon such illegal or immoral consideration. Bick v. Seal, 45 Mo. App. 475. This proposition is not true, however, when the consideration of the original contract was neither immoral nor illegal, and the subsequent contract based thereon is founded upon a new and valid consideration, as in this case, as will fully appear by reference to Gwinn v. Simes, 61 Mo. 335, Hutchinson v. Dornin, 23 Mo. App. 575, and 15 Amer. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 992. In Gwinn v. Simes, supra, the original contract involved was a note executed on Sunday, and therefore void because of the Sunday statute. The suit was to enforce a mortgage executed on a secular day thereafter, securing the note which contained the original invalid promise. It was adjudged that, even though the original promise was void as against the policy of the law, the consideration itself for which the note was given (the loan of money) was neither illegal nor immoral, and that therefore the subsequent contract contained in the mortgage executed on a secular day was valid and enforceable. The case in principle is precisely in point here, and conclusive on the question under consideration. However this may be, La Fon is estopped from making this defense by accepting the covenant in the deed assuming to pay the debt. Fitzgerald v. Barker, 85 Mo. 13, and authorities cited.

The judgment will be affirmed.

GERMAN-AMERICAN BANK v. MANNING et al.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Nov. 5, 1908.)

1. TRIAL (§ 51*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE.

Where a tax bill was received in evidence subject to objection and not afterwards excluded, it must be treated as properly before the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 125; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 386*)—TRIAL BY COURT—DECLARATIONS OF LAW—MATERIALITY OF ALTERATION.

Where a tax bill was altered in one of the calls of the description and its materiality depended on extrinsic facts, a requested declaration of law that the alteration was not material, and did not affect the validity of the bill, called for a declaration on an issue of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 901, 902; Dec. Dig. § 386.*]

3. ALTERATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 16*)—TAX BILLS—TIME—EFFECT.

An alteration of the description in a tax bill made after delivery would prima facie nullify the bill, though it may have described the same lot described by the original words.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Alteration of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 114-121; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

4. ALTERATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 27*)—TIME—PRESUMPTION.

Unless the alteration of an instrument is suspicious, it will be presumed to have been made before the instrument was issued or delivered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Alteration of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 234; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

5. ALTERATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 24*)—TIME—SUSPICION—EVIDENCE.

Where an interlineation in a description in a tax bill was in different writing from words erased, such fact was sufficient to excite suspicion and justify the court in requiring evidence that the alteration was bona fide before admitting the tax bill in evidence, and, the bill having been admitted, it was still a question for the court as to whether the erasure and interlineation were made before the issuance and delivery of the bill, and whether, in the absence of evidence of the consent of all parties to the change, it invalidated the bill.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Alteration of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 208; Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 567*)—IMPROVEMENTS—TAX BILLS—ACTION—DESCRIPTION—VARIANCE.

A tax bill against defendant M. originally described the land as "lot No. Pt. 28 in City Block No. 5149, said ground having an aggregate front of 30.00 feet by a depth of 137.50 bounded north by Page Bl. east by Birkbeck R. E. & I. Co., south by alley and west by Aetna Loan Company." The bill as introduced in evidence showed the words, "Birkbeck, R. E. & I. Co.," crossed out, and after them the words, "now Dennis," interlined in different handwriting. The petition to foreclose the bill alleged that defendant M., against whom it was issued, owned the west 29 feet and 2 inches of lot 28 and the east 10 inches of lot 28 of Raymond Place on the date of the bill. Held, that there was a fatal variance between the description in the tax bill, both as originally drawn and as altered, and the description in the petition.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Geo. H. Shields, Judge.

Action by the German-American Bank against Ella E. Manning and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kehr & Tittman, for appellant. Abbott & Edwards, for respondents.

GOODE, J. This is an action on a special tax bill for street improvements against a lot in the city of St. Louis. The petition alleges defendant Ella E. Manning was the owner of the lot at the date of the bill, and

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes describes the property as the west 29 feet 2 inches of lot 28, and the east 10 inches of lot 27 of Raymond Place, in the city of St. Louis, fronting 30 feet on the south line of Page boulevard by a depth southwardly of 137 feet 6 inches, bounded north by Page boulevard, east by Dennis, south by an alley, and west by the Aetna Loan Company. It is alleged the property was subject to a deed of trust to defendant Abbott to secure a debt to defendant Buerman. The other essential allegations of a petition on a special tax bill are made, but need not be recited. When the tax bill was offered in evidence, defendant objected because the lot described in it and the one described in the petition were not the same; and because the tax bill bore on its face an unexplained alteration in the handwriting of another person than the one who made it out. The court admitted the bill, subject to the objection, and it was read in evidence. In its material parts it is as follows:

"No. 1456. Special Tax Bill.

"Office of the President of the Board of Public Improvements.

"St. Louis, June 22, 1903.

"Ella E. Manning, Owner, to Gilsonite Construction Company, Contractor, Dr.

"For work done on Page Blvd. from Kingshighway Blvd. to Union Blvd. Chargeable against lot No. Pt. 28 in City Block No. 5149, said ground having an aggregate front of 30.00 feet by a depth of 137.50 feet, bounded north by Page Bl., east by ~~Birkbeck R. E. & I. Co.~~ now Dennis, south by alley, and west by Aetna Loan Co.

"Under authority of the charter and of Ordinance No. 20,722 and of Contract No. 6249.

"With coupons from 2 to 7, inclusive, of $29.12 each, attached.

"I hereby certify that the above-mentioned work, as shown by the certificate of the street commissioner on file in this office, was done by the above-mentioned contractor according to contract prices, and that I have caused the computation herein set forth to be made, and that I have assessed against the above-mentioned lot the amount, viz.: Two hundred three and 85.100 dollars, as being the special tax levied against said lot and to be paid by the person herein named as the owner of the land.

"Registered and countersigned by

"Hiram Philips,

"President of the Board of Public Improvements.

"James Y. Player,

"Comptroller."

The assignment of the bill was proved and other formal matters and the plaintiff rested, whereupon certain declarations of law were asked by plaintiff and refused, the court, sitting as a jury, declaring that it could not give judgment for plaintiff under the evidence. Judgment having been entered for defendant, the plaintiff appealed.

It will be perceived the description of the property in the tax bill is "Lot No. Pt. 28 in City Block No. 5149, said ground having an aggregate front of 30.00 feet by a depth of 137.50 feet, bounded north by Page Bl., east by ~~Birkbeck R. E. & I. Co.~~ now Dennis, south by alley and west by Aetna Loan Company." Instead of the property "against which the bill was issued being described as part of lot 28 and part of lot 27, the description in the petition, it is described as part of lot 28 only. It seems to be agreed Raymond Place named in the petition and city block 5149 called for in the tax bill are consistent, and we suppose block 5149 is in Raymond Place. A line had been drawn through the words and letters "Birkbeck R. E. & I. Co." in the tax bill, and to the left and immediately above them had been written in a different writing the words "now Dennis." Counsel for defendant say this alteration, which plaintiff left unexplained by testimony, justified the court to deny plaintiff redress, as did also the discrepancy in the descriptions of the property in the bill and in the petition.

The tax bill was received in evidence subject to objection, was not afterwards excluded, and hence must be treated as before the court. Plaintiff asked the court to declare the alteration shown in the tax bill was not an alteration in the meaning of the law or material, and that it had no effect on the validity of the bill. This declaration, which was refused, called in one part for a declaration on an issue of fact; for whether or not the alteration was material depended on extraneous facts. The altered part was one of the calls descriptive of the lot chargeable with the assessment. The call for the east boundary of the lot to be charged was changed from the "Birkbeck R. E. & I. Co." to Dennis by drawing a line through the first description and writing above it the words "now Dennis." It is true the lot is also described as having a frontage of thirty feet on the north side of Page boulevard; but a call for a boundary or monument usually takes precedence over one for distance, if there is a discrepancy between the two. If the Birkbeck R. E. & I. Co. at one time owned the lot immediately east of the lot to be charged and some one by the name of Dennis owned it when the tax bill was issued, the alteration in question did not change the description of the property, and in that sense was immaterial. But suppose no one by the name of Dennis owned it then, but the Birkbeck R. E. & I. Co. was still the owner, and it is apparent the change in the call completely altered the description of the property.

The alteration might be immaterial as regards a change of description, and yet highly material in respect of whether it was made prior to or at the time the tax bill was issued and delivered or subsequently. If it was made after delivery of the tax bill, then, though it may have described the same lot described by the original words, it would prima facie have a nullifying effect on the tax bill. Kelly v. Thuey, 143 Mo. 422, 45 S. W. 300; Powell v. Banks, 146 Mo. 620, 48 S. W. 664. Unless the alteration was of a suspicious character, presumably it was made before the issuance of the tax bill. Matthews v. Coalter, 9 Mo. 705; Grimes v. Whitesides, 65 Mo. App. 1. But the interlined words "now Dennis" are in a different writing from the erased words, and this fact was sufficient to excite suspicion and justify the court in requiring evidence that the alteration was bona fide before admitting the tax bill itself in evidence. Paramore v. Lindsey, 63 Mo. 63; Stillwell v. Patton, 108 Mo. 352, 360, 18 S. W. 1075. As said, the court did not exclude the tax bill because of the unexplained alteration, but admitted it. This put it before the court sitting as a jury for what it was worth, but without the presumption that it had been altered prior to delivery; and the question of when it was altered became a question of fact for the court. Paramore v. Lindsey, supra; Switzer v. Banking Co., 76 Mo. App. 1, 6. Hence the court as a jury might find the erasure and interlineation were made after the issuance and delivery of the tax bill, and, in the absence of proof of consent by all parties in interest to the change, that it invalidated the bill. This point, as presented on the appeal, is unlike the one determined in Heman v. Gilliam, 171 Mo. 262, 71 S. W. 163, in this: In the case just cited the trial court found the alteration was immaterial and a presumption in favor of the ruling was proper; whereas, here the court appears to have ruled the alteration was material, and the like presumption must be indulged.

There was a variance between the description of the property in the tax bill, both as originally drawn and as altered, and the description in the petition. The petition expressly alleges Ella E. Manning owned the western 20 feet and 2 inches of lot 28 and the eastern 10 inches of lot 27 of Raymond Place on the date of the bill. But said instrument purports to create a charge against 30 feet of lot 28 fronting north on Page boulevard and bounded on the west by the Aetna Loan Company. According to the petition, the 30 feet of lot 28 to be charged must be the west part and bounded by Ella E. Manning's 10 inches of lot 27, which is immediately west of lot 28; that is to say, according to the petition, the lot described in the tax bill would be bounded by Ella Manning's property on the west instead of the Aetna Loan Company's. On this petition the tax bill in suit was nonenforceable, though we do not say plaintiff would not be entitled to recover on an amended petition against so much of the frontage (29 feet, 2 inches) as is in lot 28. Relief of this kind was not asked.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

E. H. POWERS SHOE CO. et al. v. ODD FELLOWS HALL CO.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Nov. 5, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 17, 1908.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 76*)—LEASE—ASSIGNMENT—PROHIBITION.

The assignment of a lease may be absolutely prohibited, the owner being entitled to select his tenant and stipulate against a transfer of the term without his approval.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 225; Dec. Dig. § 76.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 111*)—FORFEITURE OF LEASE—FRAUD, ACCIDENT, OR MISTAKE.

While equity would not relieve against a forfeiture of a lease because of a prohibited assignment of the term under equity jurisdiction to set aside forfeitures, yet, if the forfeiture resulted from the fraud, mistake, or accident of the party seeking to avail himself of it, it would be set aside under the jurisdiction of equity to relieve against fraud, accident, or mistake.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 342; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 111*)—LEASE—CHANGE OF LESSEE—FORFEITURE—FRAUD—INJUNCTION.

The K. Company held a favorable lease on a store building which did not expire until December 31, 1910. There was a change of stockholders on July 14, 1906, after which a new corporation was organized to take over the assets and business of the K. Company. Before any application for defendant's consent to the assignment of the lease, defendant had resolved to declare a forfeiture in order to obtain a new lease at a higher rent, but permitted the new corporation to make valuable improvements on the premises, and incur expense in changing the names on signs, labels, and cartons, continuously declining to decide whether the consent would be granted, but endeavoring to obtain a new lease, until finally, being unable to do so, the lease was formally forfeited and suit brought to recover possession. The signs and labels in the name of the new company were thereupon removed, and those of the K. Company substituted, and it claimed the right to hold the property. Held, that the forfeiture was fraudulent, and that the K. Company was entitled to an injunction restraining the prosecution of the suit to recover possession and to a judgment reinstating the term.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 342; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 112*)—LEASE—FORFEITURE—PROMPT ACTION.

A lessor must act with promptness after discovering breaches of the lease by the tenant, if he desires to forfeit the lease therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 343; Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

5. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 111*)—FORFEITURE—RELIEF—COMPLAINT.

Where, in a suit to restrain a lessor from enforcing a forfeiture of the lease, the complaining lessee stated acts committed by him which, without more, would justify a forfeiture, but assailed the validity of a declaration of forfeiture based on such acts, on the theory that he was led into doing them by the lessor's fraud, the complaint was not defective for failure to allege, not only that a forfeiture was declared, but that the term was forfeited in fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

6. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 111*)—FORFEITURE OF LEASE.

Where a lessee was not only entitled to restrain a forfeiture of the lease by the lessor because the lessor was estopped to rely on the lessee's breach of covenant as a ground for forfeiture, but was also entitled to have its term under the lease reinstated, the lessee's remedy at law, by pleading the defense of estoppel to the lessor's suit to recover possession, was inadequate.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Chas. Claffin Allen, Judge.

Action by the E. H. Powers Shoe Company and others against the Odd Fellows Hall Company to restrain defendant's prosecution of an action of forcible entry and detainer against complainants. Judgment for complainants, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. A. & C. B. Hamilton, for appellant. C. T. Case and J. E. King, for respondents.

GOODE, J. The E. H. Powers Shoe Company is successor to the D. P. Kinsella Shoe Company by change of name. The Front Shoes Company is a corporation which was organized about September 9, 1906, for the purpose of acquiring the assets and business of the D. P. Kinsella Shoe Company and assuming its obligations. It did not do those things because of the refusal of the appellant, the Odd Fellows Hall Company, to consent to the transfer of a lease to be mentioned presently, and, in consequence of this refusal, the name of the Kinsella Company was changed to the E. H. Powers Shoe Company. Kinsella, who owned 48 of the 50 shares of the stock of the company which bore his name, found himself without adequate capital, and wished to sell his interest. He drew the attention of George W. Brown of the Brown Shoe Company to the business, and, after a negotiation, sold his shares of stock on July 14, 1906, to said Brown and others for a price which it was agreed should be fixed by taking an inventory of the stock and adding the estimated value of the good will of the business, furniture, and fixtures, and the leasehold of the storeroom. The total price thus ascertained was above $23,000, of which sum Brown contributed the larger portion, and had most of the shares transferred to Harris H. Johnston for him. The other parties to the purchase were E. H. Powers and M. L. Powers, his wife, and W. F. Armstrong. Johnston and Powers took the management of the business, the former as secretary of the company and the latter as vice president. As Mr. Kinsella had no further interest in the concern, the new owners of the stock wished to conduct the business under a new corporate name, either by transferring it from the Kinsella Company to a distinct corporation, or by changing the name of the Kinsella Company in the statutory mode. The place of business was a storeroom No. 822 Olive street, owned by appellant, Odd Fellows Hall Company. It was part of a building known as the Odd Fellows Hall Building, in which there were other storerooms. The Kinsella Shoe Company held a lease on said storeroom from appellant, dated November 1, 1904, for a term to commence January 1, 1905, and ending December 31, 1910, at a rental of $500 a month. It was stipulated in this lease the premises should not be "assigned, let, or underlet, or permitted to be used for any purpose other than a retail store for the handling, keeping, and sale of shoes," without the written consent of the lessor, and that no consent would be given for tailoring or merchant tailors, furnishing goods, hats, caps, books, news, stationery, cigars, tobacco, beers, or liquors; further, that if the premises should be assigned, let, or underlet, or permitted to be used as above mentioned without the consent of the lessor, the latter might enter and relet the same, and for such unauthorized act the lease would become void if the lessor should so elect. There was also a stipulation that in case of a violation of the covenants and conditions of the lease, or the rules and regulations established for the control of the building, the lease should thenceforth, at the option of the lessor, become null and void, and the lessor might enter without notice or demand. In the same clause of the lease the lessee (Kinsella Shoe Company) waived all right to notice to quit possession, or of the intention of the lessor, Odd Fellows Hall Company, to re-enter. Appended to the lease were various rules regulating the use by tenants of the Odd Fellows Hall Building. One of those rules said no sign, advertisement, etc., should be inscribed, painted, or fixed on any part of the outside or inside of the building by a tenant, unless the color, size, style, and material of the sign or advertisement was specified by the lessor in writing. After the purchase of Kinsella's stock in the Kinsella Shoe Company, the new management desired to advertise a cut sale of shoes, but not to publish the advertisement in the name of the Kinsella Shoe Company. In view of the rule prohibiting tenants from putting out signs or advertisements until the Odd Fellows Hall Company had approved of them, the officers of said company were asked by the officers of the Kinsella Company for permission to advertise by signs in other names than the Kinsella Company. The request was granted, and the business advertised for several weeks under the names of Armstrong & Powers Shoe Company, White House Shoe Company, Front Shoes Company, and Front Shoe Store. This was done through July and August, and afterward, on September 9th, when the Front Shoes Company had been incorporated to take over the business, Johnston and Powers asked the Odd Fellows Company, through its president, Edward Wilkerson, to consent to an assignment of the lease of the storeroom by the Kinsella Company to the new corporation, Front Shoes Company.

According to the testimony for respondents, Wilkerson said some of appellant's directors thought the lease had been already forfeited but he was not in favor of a forfeiture, and thought there would be no trouble about the Odd Fellows Company consenting to an assignment; but the question would have to come before the board of directors. What he meant by saying some of the members thought the lease had been already forfeited was that on account of the purchase by Johnston, Powers, and Armstrong of the Kinsella stock, and the installation of a new management in charge of the company's business, some of the directors of the Odd Fellows Company deemed the lease had been de facto assigned by the Kinsella Company without the consent of the Odd Fellows Company, and therefore had been forfeited. The testimony of Johnston and E. H. Powers tends to prove they held two or three conversations with Wilkerson and one or more with Hiram Lloyd, a director of the Odd Fellows Company, in which conversations Johnston and Powers were led to believe the directors of the Odd Fellows Company would consent to the assignment whenever the matter was brought before the board; but were told the matter would be acted on formally when the board met. Meanwhile the Kinsella Company, with the knowledge of appellant's officers, made or continued to make improvements on the leasehold in the way of electric wiring, resurfacing the floor, building a balcony in the rear of the store, and putting new mirrors around the walls. These improvements cost about $1,700, and would become the property of appellant under a clause of the lease at the end of the term. Meanwhile, too, the business was advertised in the name of the Front Shoes Company, checks were drawn, contracts entered into with various persons, and license and insurance policies taken out in that name. Packages and cartons in the store were so labeled, and other things were done which indicated the Front Shoes Company was in possession of the stock and premises, and had taken over and was conducting the business. These incidents began about September 9th, when the Kinsella Company requested the Odd Fellows Company's consent to an assignment of the lease to the Front Shoes Company, and continued for several weeks pending an answer by the board of directors to the request. On October 18, 1906, the Kinsella Company was notified in writing the Odd Fellows Company had declared a forfeiture of the lease because of its assignment to the Front Shoes Company. As soon as this notice was received, the signs and labels of the Front Shoes Company were removed, those of the lessee, the Kinsella Company, substituted in their places, and, as far as could be done, indications of occupancy of the premises and management of the business by the Front Shoes Company were effaced and the Kinsella Company reinstalled. It acknowledged in writing receipt of the notice of forfeiture by appellant, declared the lease had not been assigned, or the premises let or underlet; that the Kinsella Company was in possession of the store, basement, and all parts of the building included in its lease and intended to protect its rights. On November 2, 1906, the Odd Fellows Hall Company instituted an action of unlawful detainer before a justice of the peace against both the Kinsella and the Front Shoes Company to recover possession of the storeroom. In the complaint filed in said cause the Odd Fellows Company recited the lease to the Kinsella Company for six years from January 1, 1905, and the covenant against an assignment or underletting, without its written consent, and the proviso that, if said covenant was violated, it might enter and relet the premises if it should so determine, and alleged the Kinsella Company prior to October 18, 1906, had assigned, let, and underlet the premises to the Front Shoes Company without the consent of the Odd Fellows Company, and by the determination and election of the latter company the lease had become forfeited and void, and the Odd Fellows Company had claimed the forfeiture, given notice of the same to the Kinsella Company on October 18, 1906, and demanded possession of the premises.

This suit is a bill in equity to enjoin the prosecution of the said unlawful detainer case, to have set aside as a nullity the declaration of forfeiture of the lease, to have E. H. Powers Shoe Company, respondent, as successor to the rights of the Kinsella Company, reinstated in its rights under said lease, and for other proper relief. Other facts need to be stated, particularly the doings of appellant with reference to a forfeiture of the lease. When Mr. and Mrs. Powers, Johnston, and Armstrong purchased the Kinsella stock in July, 1906, the board of directors of the Odd Fellows Company took into consideration the question of forfeiture of the lease in consequence of the change of management, and referred to their attorney the question of whether they could forfeit it. This was about July 21st. The resolution adopted reads as follows: "After a discussion as to the assignment of existing store leases and consent thereto by this company, it was the sense of the members present that our consent be refused, and, on motion of Mr. Hequenbourg, the lease of the D. P. Kinsella Shoe Company was referred to Mr. Henry A. Hamilton, attorney, for his legal opinion upon our right to withhold consent and declare lease forfeited." Mr. Taylor, secretary and agent of the Odd Fellows Company, testified the occasion of this resolution was that some of the members of the board deemed there had been a change of the tenancy of the store. This was because, he said, alterations in the interior of the room, in the fixtures, and the management had been made, but appellant had not inquired about the facts of the managers of the store; the impression being the Kinsella Company had sold out to the Brown Shoe Company. It will be observed from the quoted resolution it was the sense of the members of the board present that consent should not be given to an assignment of leases. On July 31st the board again met, and the minutes of the meeting show the attorney "had submitted an opinion upholding the terms of the lease to the D. P. Kinsella Shoe Company." No further action was taken then. The next minute in the records of the Odd Fellows Company regarding the subject is under date of September 11, 1906, and is as follows: "The matter of lease to D. P. Kinsella Shoe Company was left to the president; it being the sense of the board that no assignment or transfer of the lease be allowed or permitted." Taylor swore that, when the last resolution was passed, there had been as yet no request by the Kinsella Company for permission to assign the lease, but a request to assign to the Front Shoes Company must have been preferred in a few days. The minutes under date of September 21, 1906, read as follows: "Mr. Lloyd moved that the action of the board at its last meeting that no assignment or transfer of the lease of the D. P. Kinsella Shoe Company would be allowed or permitted, be reconsidered. The motion carried. The members present thereupon indulged in an informal discussion of the subject of the lease of the D. P. Kinsella Shoe Company. The president having announced that the lease had been recently presented to him by the Front Shoes Company's officers with the request that our consent be given to its assignment to them. On motion of Mr. McCargo the matter concerning the lease of the D. P. Kinsella Shoe Company was postponed until Tuesday, September 25th, at 4 o'clock p. m. Motion carried." The first of those resolutions shows permission to assign the lease had been requested, and that, in view of the request, appellant's directors resolved to refuse permission. At the meeting on Tuesday, September 25th, the following resolution was adopted: "An informal discussion was held concerning the lease of the D. P. Kinsella Shoe Company. On motion of Mr. McCargo the question of our differences with the D. P. Kinsella Shoe Company and the Front Shoes Company was referred to Mr.

Taylor with instructions to try to effect a compromise. The motion was carried. The matter of compromise was the subject of informal discussion and on motion of Mr. Hequenbourg the matter was postponed until Thursday, September 27, at 4 p. m. The motion carried." That resolution contained an instruction to the secretary, Mr. Taylor, to compromise the matter. Taylor swore the purpose appellant company had in view was to get a new lease, and get a higher rental on account of the change of tenants. On September 27th this resolution was adopted by appellant's board: "On motion of Mr. McCargo, Mr. Taylor was instructed to carry out the wishes of the board as to a compromise of the lease of the D. P. Kinsella Shoe Company relative to its assignment to the Front Shoes Company, but not to declare to the parties any forfeiture of the lease. The motion carried." It will be seen that though the signs and cartons had been changed from the Kinsella Company to the Front Shoes Company, and the business was apparently in charge of the latter, Taylor was instructed by appellant's directors not to declare the companies in interest (the Kinsella and Front Shoes Companies) had forfeited the lease. Taylor explained that he personally was in favor of a forfeiture, and this clause was inserted to instruct him not to declare a forfeiture as the board knew he was in favor of doing and might do if not restrained. Taylor said he entered the storeroom in question on September 28th, and told Powers the directors were considering the expediency of offering the room for rent, and, as the Front Shoes Company seemed to be in possession, deemed it right to make the offer to said company first. Powers declined to discuss the proposition then, but on the next day requested permission to appear before appellant's board of directors, and was refused. Meanwhile Taylor was pressing the proposition for a new lease to the Front Shoes Company, and he swore appellant's directors designed to compromise the matter in that way, as the board thought a strange tenant was in possession in violation of the lease. On October 1st Taylor told Johnston, as previously he had told Powers, appellant was thinking about offering the premises for rent and deemed it but just, as they (meaning Johnston and his associates) were in possession, to make a new lease to them, and let the tenancy continue under new terms if they were found, after investigation, to be satisfactory tenants. Johnston replied they were in possession, had the lease and meant to keep it, but hoped there would be no trouble and appellant would consent to an assignment. Taylor proposed to give a lease for the balance of the term and seven months longer at $7,800 a year; that is, an advance of $1,800 a year or $150 a month. At the same time Johnston tendered the rent in behalf of the Kinsella Company for October; it being payable that day. Taylor refused to accept it, saying he did not think appellant was entitled to any rent from that concern, evidently meaning, not the Kinsella Shoe Company, in whose name the rent was tendered, but the Front Shoes Company, whom he considered in occupancy, in proof of which he called attention to the name of the Front Shoes Company on the boxes. He swore the proposition for a new lease was declined on October 2d, Johnston again saying they had a lease and were going to hold it, but hoped the parties would continue to be friends. Appellant's board had met again on September 29th, and Taylor had reported no progress in the Kinsella matter. The board met again on October 5th, and Taylor reported he had not been able to effect a compromise with the Front Shoes Company, though he had submitted two propositions, which Johnston had declined, with the request that no further propositions be submitted to the Front Shoes Company. Appellant's board laid the matter over until October 16th. On the 16th the board met and requested its attorney to appear before it the next day, the 17th. On that day the board resolved the lease of the store to the Kinsella Company was void because the lessee had assigned, let, or underlet the premises or a portion thereof without the written consent of the lessor; and the attorney was instructed to draw up papers to get early possession. At the final hearing the court made the temporary injunction against the prosecution of the unlawful detainer suit permanent.

Both parties have treated the case as though transfer of the lease to the new corporation organized to take over the assets of the Kinsella Company and carry on a shoe business in the storeroom would be an assignment of the term within the sense of the clause against an assignment without appellant's consent. Hence we will assume, without deciding, that this proposition is sound.

1. Equity does not relieve against the forfeiture of a term because of an assignment without the lessor's consent, unless there are special grounds like mistake or fraud in connection with the assignment. 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 374; 1 Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. 454; 2 Taylor, L. & T. § 496; 1 McAdam, L. & T. 797, and citations; Wolfer v. Macato, 9 Mod. 112; Barrows v. Isaacs, 1 Q. B. (1891) 471; Eastern Tea Co. v. Dent, 1 Q. B. (1891) 835; Grigg v. Landis, 19 N. J. Eq. 350; 68 Am. Dec. 73, note, p. 86; Baxter v. Lansing, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 350. An assignment may be absolutely prohibited, because an owner of premises has the right to select his tenant and stipulate against the transfer of a term he grants except with his approval. A breach of this stipulation cannot be compensated in damages, as a failure to pay rent when due, or perform various other covenants, may be; nor does it fall within any of the rules according to which equity will relieve, as, of course, against a forfeiture. Northcote v. Dyke, Amb. 513; Davis

v. West, 12 Ves. Jr. 475; Sanders v. Pope, 12 Ves. Jr. 282; Hill v. Barclay, 18 Ves. Jr. 56; Griggs v. Landis, supra, note, p. 86; Lundin v. Schoeffel, 167 Mass. 463, 45 N. E. 933. It follows respondents do not present a case for relief on the ground that equity courts have jurisdiction to set aside forfeitures—a jurisdiction ranged under the head of Accident, on the ancient theory that defaults in the payment of money, or performance of other conditions, were due to accidental hindrances, which is, of course, commonly a fiction, yet nevertheless the classification is maintained. But a forfeiture of a leasehold term or other property brought about by fraud of the party seeking to avail himself of it or by mistake, or even accident in the genuine sense, will be set aside, though the forfeiture may be of a kind which, in general, courts of equity do not relieve against; that is, when there is no special fact to make the case one of fraud, accident, or mistake, which are in themselves sources of equity jurisdiction as well in cases of forfeiture as in other instances. South Penn Oil Co. v. Edgell, 48 W. Va. 348, 37 S. E. 596, 86 Am. St. Rep. 43; Baxter v. Lansing, 7 Paige (N. Y.) 350; Sheets v. Selden, 7 Wall. 416, 19 L. Ed. 166; Hill v. Barclay, supra; Bracebridge v. Buckley, 2 Pierce, R. 200. In New York Life Ins. Co. v. Rector, etc., St. George's Parish, 12 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 50, it was said all the authorities agree an honest mistake or ignorance of the facts is good ground for equitable interference against a forfeiture; and, of course, the case for relief must be stronger if fraud appears. Henry v. Tupper, 29 Vt. 358, and Ransome v. Bentley, 4 Brown, Ch. 415. The facts before us reveal disingenuous conduct on the part of appellant, which, if not inspired by a fraudulent motive, will work a fraud on the Kinsella Company if its consequences are not obviated. Appellant was watching for an opportunity to forfeit the Kinsella Company's term in order to get a larger rental; a fact that, if not admitted point blank, is hardly denied, and of which the testimony leaves no doubt. In July, when a change in the stockholders of the Kinsella Company took place, but its occupancy continued, appellant's directors took under advisement the expediency of declaring a forfeiture and referred the question to their attorney. At the same time they declared it was the sense of those members present at the meeting that consent would be refused to an assignment of the term. This is an important circumstance; for it proves the policy to be pursued in regard to permitting a transfer of the lease if it should be requested was settled. But, when a request was made in the early part of September, instead of notifying the officers of the Kinsella Company, who were likewise the officers of the Front Shoes Company, that consent would not be given, appellant's officers deferred an answer from time to time on the plea that the matter would have to be decided by the board of directors, though the board had decided it two months before. Meanwhile its president and one of its directors led the officers of the two shoe companies to believe consent would be granted, and stood by while the shoe companies continued to make valuable improvements and incur expense in changing the names on the signs, labels, and cartons. While these changes were going on, appellant's board of directors told its secretary to try to effect a compromise, but not to declare a forfeiture; that is, to give no notice to the Kinsella Company the lease would be forfeited because of a change of occupancy. The so-called compromise to be attempted was no compromise with the Kinsella Company as lessee at all, but an effort to induce the Front Shoes Company to pay $1,800 a year more rent. It thus appears that during the time appellant was postponing an answer to the shoe companies regarding permission to assign the lease it was negotiating for more rent, and, without protest or disapproval, was allowing said companies to do the very acts for which it asserted the lease had been forfeited. A forfeiture was not afterward formally declared until appellant realized it could get no higher rent from the Front Shoes Company; but Taylor's testimony shows appellant intended all along to do this as a last resort, and, according to the purpose resolved on in July, to refuse consent to an assignment. This being true, its officers who had in charge the duty of arranging with the Kinsella Company were guilty of double dealing in giving vague assurances that an assignment would be permitted and doing nothing while the tenant acted on the faith of these assurances. We attach little weight to appellant's consent in July to a display of signs bearing the names of various corporations, though this consent tended to encourage the belief that it cared nothing about the name in which the business was conducted. Without said circumstance, there is ample evidence to prove appellant's behavior would damage the Kinsella Company if the lease should be terminated because of what the latter company did toward putting another company in possession, though perhaps this amounted to an assignment of the lease. Dickinson Co. v. Fitterling, 69 Minn. 162, 71 N. W. 1030; Jones, L. & T. v. T. § 442, p. 503. If a lessor would forfeit the term for breaches of contract by the lessee, he must be prompt in his declaration of forfeiture after he learns of the breaches, and cannot hold his decision in reserve to speculate for some advantage to himself, while he suffers the tenant to incur expense in the belief that he will not be disturbed. 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) pp. 382, 383, and citations in notes; Garnhart v. Finney, 40 Mo. 449, 93 Am. Dec. 303; Hawes v. Favor, 161 Ill. 440, 43 N. E. 1076.

2. One of the propositions mainly relied on by appellant is lack of equity in the petition. The point of this contention is that it omits to allege a forfeiture occurred under the law in consequence of the acts of respondents which caused the forfeiture to be declared. It is said the petition ought to allege sufficient breaches, and also that the term was not only declared forfeited because of them, but actually was forfeited. In this connection we are cited to cases supposed to sustain appellant's proposition. Warne v. Wagenor (N. J.) 15 Atl. 307; Graham v. Carondelet, 33 Mo. 262. Appellant, of course, insists a valid forfeiture occurred and therefore relief should be denied, but insists, too, it should be denied because the petition does not say in so many words it occurred. The petition states the facts leading to the attempted forfeiture as we have recited them, and avers appellant's board of directors declared the lease forfeited by a unanimous vote on October 17, 1906, on the 18th served respondents with notice of the declaration, and later took steps to oust them from the premises. Where relief is sought from a court of equity against a forfeiture of the kind equity relieves against merely on proof that it has happened, such as one for failing to pay money when due, it may well be that a complainant should state in his petition for relief a forfeiture had occurred. And, if the petition shows the tenant had done nothing on his own motion, or by inducement of the lessor, in breach of a condition as in Warne v. Wagenor, supra, the complainant would present a case wherein the legal remedy is entirely adequate; or if an attempt to declare a forfeiture was abortive because of the omission of prescribed steps, and the whole matter is shown of record and is plainly void and casts no cloud on the complainant's title, there is no occasion for recourse to chancery. But these rules cannot be applied where the complaining lessee states acts committed by him which, without more, would justify a forfeiture; but assails the validity of a declaration of forfeiture based on said acts, on the ground that he was led into doing them by the artifice of the lessor. Fraud defeats what would otherwise be valid, and, though there may have been a de facto transfer of the lease which would have justified appellant in ending the term if it had done right itself, the attempt to end it was invalid if appellant's behavior induced the Kinsella Company to let another tenant into possession. In this event said company, in seeking relief against a possible loss of its term and ouster, and at least a cloud on its leasehold, as consequences of appellant's declaration, was not bound to aver a forfeiture had happened; in other words, that the declaration was warranted. This was the essential issue in dispute, and it was enough to confess the acts on which appellant proceeded, and, in avoidance of their effect, allege behavior of appellant which induced them and sufficed to deprive its declaration of validity.

8. It is further insisted respondents have a complete remedy at law by setting up appellant's conduct as an estoppel in the unlawful detainer action before the justice of the peace. It always has been parcel of the jurisdiction of equity to relieve against forfeitures and also against fraud, and likely this jurisdiction is not lost in such a case as we have before us because the defense of estoppel is available at law. But we prefer to put the decision of this point on the ground that the relief obtainable by respondents in the unlawful detainer case would be inadequate. The Kinsella Company is not only entitled to defeat said action, but to have its term reinstated. The evidence shows the leasehold is a valuable part of its assets. The declaration of forfeiture casts a cloud on its title which cannot be dispelled except by proof of facts in pais and thereby the value of its assets is reduced, and this is good ground of equity cognizance. Biddle v. Ramsey, 52 Mo. 153; Tschelder v. Biddle, 4 Dill. 55, Fed. Cas. No. 14,210. The decree might have done more than continue the injunction against the prosecution of the unlawful detainer case, might have set aside the declaration of forfeiture, and have restored to the Kinsella Company its full rights under the lease for the remainder of the term, subject, of course, to payment of the accrued rents, which were tendered in the petition. The Kinsella Company was entitled to that measure of relief which none but a court of equity can grant.

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

PARKER et al. v. BRITTON.

1. NEW TRIAL (§ 110*)—GROUNDS—JUDICIAL POWER.

A new trial may be allowed on a ground not assigned therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 91*)—GROUNDS—SCOPE—MISTAKE OF COUNSEL.

In passing on a motion for new trial, a court is not restricted to the statutory causes; but, if a new trial be allowed for one of them—e. g., a mistake of counsel—it should be such a mistake as the statute intends, and not forgetfulness or neglect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. § 184; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 977*)—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT—NEW TRIAL.

Trial judges have a very wide discretion to grant new trials to accomplish justice, and their orders will not be reversed, unless abuse of discretion plainly appears.

6. NEW TRIAL (§ 91*)—RIGHT TO—OVERSIGHT.

It was an abuse of discretion to allow plaintiffs a new trial on a nominal verdict in their favor, to enable them to offer evidence, forming a basis for material recovery, which was omitted through their counsel's mistake or oversight, where defendant was not responsible for the oversight, and would be put to expense and inconvenience by a new trial.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Jesse A. McDonald, Judge.

Action by D. H. Parker and others against D. H. Britton. From an order granting plaintiffs a new trial on a nominal verdict, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Henry B. Davis, for appellant. W. H. Douglas, for respondents.

GOODE, J. This appeal was taken from an order of the circuit court granting a new trial to respondents. The action was instituted by attachment, and the attachment was sustained on the ground of appellant's non-residence in this state, he being a citizen of the state of Louisiana. On August 10, 1906, he and respondents, who are also citizens of Louisiana, and real estate agents, entered into a contract, by which he intrusted to them the sale of the merchantable timber, cypress, cottonwood, and ash on about 5,000 acres of land in that state for the price of $40,000 net to appellant, respondents to have for their commission whatever excess of that price was obtained. It was further stipulated appellant himself might deal with any party to whom respondents had not previously submitted a proposition, and in case he sold to a party whom they had introduced, their commission should be as above stated, unless the price fell below $42,500, in which contingency the commission should be 5 per cent. of the price. The petition alleges respondents began a negotiation for the sale of the timber with C. F. Liebke, informed appellant of the fact, introduced him to the purchasing agents of Liebke, when appellant took up the negotiation in person, and sold to Liebke for $31,500, whereby respondents became entitled to a commission of $1,575. In his answer appellant admitted the execution of the contract, but denied the other averments of the petition. Respondents gave proof that they, through their agent in St.

Louis, drew the attention of Liebke, or rather the Liebke Hardwood Lumber Company, to the timber, and introduced Kirk, purchasing agent of said company in Louisiana, to appellant; and a letter written by appellant to respondents' attorney, under date of October 30, 1906, was put in evidence, from which it may be inferred appellant sold the land to the Liebke Company. At the conclusion of the testimony verdict and judgment for one cent damages were rendered in favor of respondents, who filed a motion for new trial on certain grounds we will not recite, because no point is made about them on the appeal. The motion passed over to the next term of court, and was then sustained, for the reason "that the cause should be more thoroughly presented to the court and a judgment rendered for plaintiffs in a substantial sum, or for defendant."

Both sides concede respondents omitted to prove the quantity of timber sold and the price received, thereby failing to afford any way to ascertain what amount of commission they were entitled to, that for said omission, and in order to permit proof of the amount of the price received by appellant, the court sustained the motion, and that the only question for decision is whether or not this order was an abuse of the trial court's judicial discretion. The ground on which the new trial was granted was not one of those assigned in the motion; but a court may, if it sees proper, go outside the reasons for new trial assigned by a defeated party and allow it on some other ground. Stannard Mill. Co. v. Transit Co., 122 Mo. 258, 26 S. W. 704; Lovell v. Davis, 52 Mo. App. 342. Our statutes provide several causes for which a court may allow a new trial: Mistake or surprise of a party or his attorney, misdirection or mistake of a jury, a finding contrary to the court's direction, fraud or deceit practised by one party on the other, and perjury of a witness. Rev. St. 1899, § 800 (Ann. St. 1906, p. 761). And in this state the court is not restricted to the causes enumerated in the statute. Leahy v. Dougdale, 41 Mo. 517. But if a new trial is allowed for one of those causes, say a mistake of counsel, as in the present case, it ought to be such a mistake as the statute intends, and not forgetfulness or neglect. Fretwell v. Laffoon, 77 Mo. 26, 30. In Bright v. Eynon, 1 Burr. 395, Lord Mansfield said the best general rule on the subject is the one laid down by Lord Parker in Regina v. Helston; i. e., that a new trial should be granted for attaining the justice of the case. See, too, U. S. v. Merchandise, 2 Spr. (U. S.) 85, Fed. Cas. No. 15,964; 14 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 718. Trial judges have a very wide discretion to grant new trials in order to accomplish justice, and their orders will not be reversed, unless an abuse of discretion plainly appears. Longdon v. Kelly, 51 Mo. App. 572; Ensor v. Smith, 57 Mo. App. 588; Whitsett v. Ransom, 79 Mo. 258. In view of the strong colors in which this discretion has been depicted by courts of review, our first thought was that the ruling of the court below in the present case must be approved, especially as it allowed a new trial; for appellate tribunals are less disposed to reverse orders granting new trials, and thereby leaving the controversy to be examined again judicially, than orders of refusal which foreclose redress if wrong has been done. The defect of proof in this cause must be charged against respondents themselves or their attorneys, and in either event the result is the same, because the neglect of their attorneys is, in law, their own. Biebinger v. Taylor, 64 Mo. 63, 66. Yet our impression was that a trial court's discretion included the right to allow another trial if justice had miscarried on account of the oversight of counsel, as indeed, has been decided in some states. Greene v. Farlow, 138 Mass. 146; Brock v. Railroad, 65 Ala. 79; and see on this point, also, 14 Ency. Pl. & Pr. p. 732 et seq. But an examination of the decisions of the appellate courts of this state has yielded the conclusion that the opposite rule prevails here, at least on facts like those before us.

The Missouri cases cited supra declare as strongly as those of other jurisdictions in favor of large power in the trial court to grant new trials, yet the opinions consistently condemn such an exercise of discretion on the exact facts presented by this appeal; that is, condemn the allowance of another trial because of a mistake or oversight of counsel for the defeated party. In most of the cases the relief asked had been refused by the lower court, and the question on appeal was whether the ruling should be upheld; but the tone of the opinions would deny power to a trial court to grant a new trial for the negligent mistake or inadvertence of a party or his counsel though the party thereby had been cast in heavy damages. Field v. Matson, 8 Mo. 636; Kerby v. Chadwell, 10 Mo. 392; Austin v. Nelson, 11 Mo. 192; Webster v. McMahan, 13 Mo. 582; Jacob v. McLean, 24 Mo. 40; Ridgley v. Steamboat, 27 Mo. 442; Gehrke v. Jod, 59 Mo. 522; Biebinger v. Taylor, 64 Mo. 63; Fretwell v. Laffoon, 77 Mo. 26; State v. Dreher, 137 Mo. 11, 38 S. W. 567; Tittman v. Thornton, 107 Mo. 500, 510, 17 S. W. 979, 16 L. R. A. 410; Meyer v. Construction Co., 2 Mo. App. 599; Bowman v. Field, 9 Mo. App. 578; Miller v. Miller, 13 Mo. App. 591; State v. Jones, 12 Mo. App. 93; Smith v. Wheeler, 27 Mo. App. 16; and see Hayne, New Trials, §§ 92, 351. In most of those opinions the broad denials of discretionary power to set aside a verdict for mistake due to carelessness were dicta, because uttered in cases where the question was whether discretion had been abused in refusing the relief; but, that being conceded, it remains that no support for a discretion in the trial court which would justify the ruling in the case at bar can be found in any decision of this jurisdiction. To show the spirit of our adjudications dealing with the subject, we will quote a few excerpts. In State v. Jones, it was said: "It would be difficult to state with too much emphasis how the stern severity of the courts has generally compelled parties to stand by the consequence of negligent omission, blundering or improper management, by their attorneys in legal proceedings. This severity is generally justified by the most important considerations of public policy, as well as by the plain demands of justice, as between the parties to the cause. In civil cases the rule is broadly laid down that 'neither the ignorance, blunders, nor misapprehension of counsel, not occasioned by the adverse party, is a ground for vacating a judgment or decree.'" 12 Mo. App., loc. cit. 94. In Gerhke v. Jod the Supreme Court thus stated the law: "It has been frequently decided in this court that the omission of the attorney, spoken to in the cause to plead, or make the proper defense, cannot place the application to set aside the judgment by default upon more favorable grounds than if the omission had been on the part of the defendant himself. The attorney is the agent of the party employing him, and in the court stands in his stead, and any act of the attorney must necessarily be considered as the act of the client. A different principle would lead to endless confusion and difficulty in the administration of justice." 59 Mo., loc. cit. 522. In a case of extreme hardship wherein a man's life was at stake, this court ventured to reverse the trial court for refusing a new trial, when from gross incompetence defendant's counsel had failed to present his defense to the jury. The point was raised in the Supreme Court in a similar case, and the ruling of this court was criticised as unwarranted by any precedent and as bad law, and, besides, the court said: "We are not to be understood as consenting that, even if there had been negligence or want of skill, it would have afforded any ground for reversal. The neglect of any attorney is the neglect of his client in respect to the court and his adversary. The decisions are too numerous to cite; but their uniform tenor is to the effect that neither ignorance, blunders nor misapprehension of counsel, not occasioned by his adversary, is ground for setting aside a judgment or awarding a new trial. The rule is founded upon the wisest public policy. To permit clients to seek relief against their adversaries upon the alleged negligence or blunders of their own attorneys would open the door to collusions, and would lead to endless confusion in the administration of justice. The business of the courts cannot be conducted on any other terms than that parties must be held by the acts of their attorneys in their behalf in causes in which they are authorized to appear, and in the absence of fraud, leaving the client to his remedy against the attorney for his negligence." 137 Mo., loc. cit. 23, 38 S. W. 570.

The question in hand has been determined in two instances at least, where the lower courts had granted new trials, and the rulings were reversed. In Fretwell v. Laffoon, supra, this was done, though the hardship of the verdict appealed strongly for relief. Laffoon was garnished as debtor of Daniel Hibler, against whom judgment had been given. In answering the interrogatories propounded to him as garnishee he or his counsel negligently stated he had executed certain notes to Daniel Hibler, and on this answer judgment went against him. In truth the notes had been executed, not to Daniel Hibler, but to Samuel Hibler. Hence Laffoon owed Daniel Hibler nothing, and on this ground a new trial was granted by the lower court. The Supreme Court held erroneously. The opinion says, inter alia, in defining what is meant in the statutes by mistake as ground for a new trial: "A party who by mistake of his attorney pleads a plea which does not cover his defense or correctly present his case cannot, after judgment against him on his own admissions, set the verdict aside, and obtain leave to amend his plea. McNeish v. Stewart, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 474. And there are no more favors to be shown in this regard to a garnishee than to any one else. He stands upon the same footing, and must pay the same penalty for his negligence, inadvertence, or forgetfulness as any other defendant whatsoever." 77 Mo., loc. cit. 32, 33. The Supreme Court considered the scope of a trial court's discretion to grant new trials, and the effect of the discretion, on the case under review. It approved and adopted the views expressed by the Supreme Court of New York in People v. Superior Court, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 114, wherein the extent of the discretion of courts of first instance to grant new trials was considered at length, and the result declared that the discretion did not exist when settled and well-defined principles stood in the way of allowing a second trial, and that those principles were "that a party is bound and presumed to know the general leading points which will be litigated in his case; that if he omits to procure evidence, which with ordinary diligence he might have procured, in relation to those points, upon the first trial, his motion for a new trial for the purpose of introducing such testimony shall be denied. If the newly discovered evidence consists merely of additional facts and circumstances going to establish the same points which were principally controverted before, or of additional witnesses to the same facts and circumstances, such evidence is cumulative, and a new trial shall not be granted." 5 Wend., loc. cit. 127. The point determined was that negligent failure to procure and introduce important evidence was no ground for a new trial, and so the courts of this state have always held. Maynor v. Burns, 114 Mo. 426, 19 S. W. 1107, 21 S. W. 728. If carelessly omitting to procure essential evidence in advance is no cause to set aside a judgment, omitting to introduce it when it is at hand is less cause. And Fretwell v. Laffoon, deciding a negligent oversight of a party or counsel at the trial, is no good ground to disturb the judgment. In Smith, etc., Co. v. Wheeler, a new trial had been allowed, the opinion says, because the plaintiff's attorney and agent was mistaken and surprised, and because one of the witnesses made a mistake in his testimony. The plaintiff's attorney in a replevin case had negligently relied on a statement of the opposing counsel, and had failed to procure essential testimony to prove the property replevied was the same as that described in the mortgage on which plaintiff relied for right of possession. It appeared no fraud had been practiced, and the order for a new trial was reversed. Those authorities are directly in point. In the present case respondents' commission depended on the price appellant received for the timber. This being true, proof of the price was obviously necessary to a substantial recovery, and must have been carelessly omitted. We wish to go no further than we must under controlling authorities toward circumscribing the right of trial courts to allow new trials, and therefore leave at large the question of whether instances of neglect or mistake of counsel might not occur to justify setting aside the verdict. Appellant lives in a distant state, and would be put to expense and trouble in attending another trial, and might be prejudiced in his rights if he did not attend. His defense goes to the merits, for he denies respondents induced the sale. He was in no wise to blame for respondents' failure to make out a case at the first trial, and we cannot say the hardship which will be visited on them is so onerous that the hardship of requiring appellant to come to court again or submit to a trial in his absence ought to be overlooked. In other words, the circumstances of the present case do not present an equity of peculiar strength in favor of respondents.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with a direction to the court to set aside the order for a new trial and enter judgment for respondents in accordance with the verdict. All costs.

INTERNATIONAL BANK v. ENDERLE

22 LANS COURT OF APPEALS, MISSOURI, OCT. 21, 1908.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 242*)—INDORSEMENT BEFORE DELIVERY—NATURE OF OBLIGATION—ESTOPPEL.

THE DEFENDANT, who was induced to sign a note for $500 as a maker and not as an indorser, he being neither payee nor indorsee, continues until overthrown by clear and convincing proof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. §§ 542, 550; Dec. Dig. § 242.*]

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 242*)—INDORSEMENT BEFORE DELIVERY—NATURE OF OBLIGATION—ESTOPPEL.

That in extending interest on a demand note payable to a bank a clerk computed interest from the date thereof, and that defendant's name was entered on the ledger under the heading "Indorsers," does not estop the bank to show that the note did not become an obligation in its hands until after its date, and that defendant signed as a maker and not an indorser, where the clerk probably overlooked the date of discount and looked only to the date for data in computing interest, and where it appears that all names written on the back of a note discounted were entered under the heading "Indorsers," whether makers or indorsers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Dec. Dig. § 242.*]

3. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 64*)—WHEN EFFECTIVE—DELIVERY.

Ordinarily a note is presumed to take effect from its delivery to the payee, but delivery of a note, like other matters in pais, is explainable, and if it is understood that something else is to be done before the note becomes binding, as that the maker shall give certain security, procure another signer, etc., the delivery does not bind until performance of the conditions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 104; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

4. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 242*)—ACCEPTANCE OF NOTE—EVIDENCE.

That a note though dated January 25th was not discounted until February 1st, and after defendant had signed his name thereon, is evidence that it was not accepted by the payee until February 1st.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Dec. Dig. § 242.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 235*)—INSTRUCTIONS—COMMENT ON EVIDENCE.

An instruction in an action on a note that, since plaintiff's cashier was dead, defendant could not testify to any agreements, etc., with him; that the fact that defendant's name appears on the back of the note created merely prima facie evidence that he signed as maker, which could be rebutted, etc.—was properly refused as commenting on the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 539-543; Dec. Dig. § 235.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 232*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SUPPORT BY EVIDENCE.

An instruction not supported by evidence is properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 536; Dec. Dig. § 232.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 233*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that, if defendant did not write his name on the note used on until after it had been delivered by the maker to the payee, the payee could not recover, was properly refused as assuming that the bank's possession before defendant's signature conclusively showed that the note took effect before defendant signed it, where as there was evidence that the note was delivered with an understanding that it should not take effect until defendant signed it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 618-623; Dec. Dig. § 233.*]

8. TRIAL (§ 236*)—ACTION ON NOTE—INSTRUCTIONS.

It was not reversible error to refuse to instruct that if the payee of the note used on treated a third person as the sole maker and defendant as an indorser, plaintiff could not recover, where the court instructed that, if defendant signed under an agreement that he should be liable only as an indorser, he was not liable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 706; Dec. Dig. § 296.*]

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Jesse A. McDonald, Judge.

Action by the International Bank against George J. Enderle, Oscar Prybil, and others. From a judgment of the circuit court for plaintiff, on appeal from justice court, defendant Prybil appeals. Affirmed.

Frank E. Richey, for appellant. Carter, Collins & Jones, for respondent.

BLAND, P. J. The action originated in a justice's court. In due course an appeal was taken to the St. Louis circuit court, where, on a trial de novo to a jury, verdict and judgment were for respondent. The action is founded on the following promissory note:

"140.00. St. Louis, Mo., Jan. 25, 1898.

"On demand after date I promise to pay to the order of International Bank of St. Louis, one hundred and forty dollars, for value received, at the International Bank of St. Louis, with interest from date at the rate of eight per cent. per annum.

"Geo. J. Enderle,

"Eighteenth and Pine St."

The back of said note is in words and figures as follows:

"Oscar Prybil.

"Feb. 11, 1898, 95¢ Int. added extending note to Feb. 25/98.

"Feb. 28, 1898, Paid 5.95 on a/c of Prin. Int. 87¢ added extending note to Mch. 25/98.

"Mar. 29, 1898, Paid 5.87 on a/c Prin. Int. 88¢ added extending note to Apr. 25/98.

"May 3, 1898, Paid 10.88 on a/c Prin. Int. 80¢ added extending note to May 25/98.

"June 28, 1898, Paid 10.80 on a/c Prin.

"June 28, 1898, Int. 1.50 added to do extending note to July 25/98."

On the trial respondent elected to proceed against appellant as a maker of the note. Appellant testified that he was not in the city of St. Louis on the date of the note, but some days afterward he returned, was called into the bank by the cashier, who produced the note, and he then wrote his name across the back of it; that he received nothing from the proceeds of the note. The note ledger of respondent was produced, and the note was entered thereon as discounted on February 1, 1898. On this ledger, under appropriate headings, was entered the number, date, amount, date of discount, etc., of all notes discounted by respondent. There was also a column headed "Indorsers," in which was written all the names appearing upon the backs of notes discounted. Appellant's name appeared in this column. The indorsement of February 11, 1898, "95¢ Int. added," shows that interest was calculated on the note from January 25th, the date of the note. On this evidence, and the evidence that the bank's ledger showed his name was entered in the column headed "Indorsers," appellant contends that his peremptory instruction (asked at the close of all the evidence) should have been given. For the reason the cashier who presented the note to appellant to be signed or indorsed by him was dead at the time of the trial, there was no direct evidence with respect to the capacity in which appellant wrote his name across the back of the note. He being neither a payee nor an indorsee of the note, it is conceded that presumptively, he indorsed the note as a maker. In these circumstances this presumption continued, unless overthrown by evidence that appellant signed as an indorser; therefore the peremptory instruction could not have been given, unless the evidence to overthrow the presumption was so clear and convincing that no reasonable mind could come to any other conclusion. The date of the note was entered on the ledger, and in extending the interest the clerk who made the calculation, perhaps, overlooked the date of its discount, and looked only to its date for data from which to calculate the interest on the note. It would therefore be unfair to hold the bank absolutely estopped to show, as a matter of fact, that the note did not become an obligation in its hands until a day subsequent to its date, to wit, on the day it was discounted, nor would the trial court have been justified in holding that, because appellant's name was entered on the discount ledger under the heading "Indorsers," the bank was thereby estopped to deny that appellant did not sign as an indorser, in the face of the evidence of the clerk who made the entries in the ledger that all names written on the back of a note discounted (whether makers or indorsers) were entered in this column and under this heading. It is further contended that, as the evidence conclusively shows the note was in the bank's possession for some days before appellant wrote his name on the back of it, the note took effect before he wrote his name on it, and for that reason he is not bound, as no new consideration passed for the purpose of obtaining his signature. Ordinarily, a note takes effect from the date of its delivery to the payee, and the presumption is that it takes effect the moment it is delivered. But delivery of a note, like other matters in pais, is subject to explanation, and if a note is delivered to the payee, with the understanding between the party making the delivery and the payee that something else is to be done before the note becomes a binding obligation, as that the maker shall give a certain security for the payment of the note, or that another party shall sign it as a maker or an indorser, the delivery, so as to bind the parties, is not completed until the conditions are complied with. And the fact that the note in suit was not discounted until February 1st is some evidence tending to show that it was not accepted by the bank until the day it was discounted, and after appellant had written his name on the back of it, and we conclude that the trial court did not err in refusing appellant's peremptory instruction.

Appellant asked, and the court refused, the following instructions:

"(2) The court instructs the jury that it is admitted by the parties to this case that the cashier of the plaintiff bank with whom the negotiations between the defendant Prybil and the bank were had is now dead, and the court instructs the jury that by reason of the said death the law will not permit the defendant Prybil to testify in this trial to any conversations, contracts, or agreements had with him, the said cashier; and the court further instructs the jury that the fact that Prybil's name appears on the back of the note sued on creates what is known in law as merely prima facie evidence that he signed the note as a maker thereof, but that this may be rebutted by the facts, circumstances, and evidence in the case; and if, from all the evidence, the jury believe that the defendant Prybil put his name on the back of the note in evidence, under an agreement or understanding with the cashier of the International Bank that he, Prybil, should be liable only as indorser or guarantor or surety and not as a joint maker thereof, then you will find for the defendant Prybil.

"(3) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, the International Bank, in the matter of the note sued on in this case, treated and regarded George J. Enderle as the sole maker of said note, and treated and regarded the defendant Prybil merely and solely as an indorser on said note and not as a joint maker thereof, the jury should find in favor of the defendant Prybil.

"(4) The court instructs the jury that if, from the evidence, the jury believe that the defendant Prybil did not write his name on the back of the note sued on in this case until after the said note had been made and delivered by George Enderle to the International Bank, and that at the time the defendant Prybil wrote his name on the back of the said note the said note was in the actual possession of the said bank, then the jury should find in favor of the defendant Prybil."

The second instruction is a comment on the evidence, and is also predicated on facts not in evidence, and for these reasons was properly refused. No. 4 assumes that the mere possession of the note by the bank, before appellant wrote his name on it, was conclusive evidence that the note took effect and became a binding obligation before appellant signed it, whereas there is evidence tending to show that it was delivered to the bank by Enderle to be held by it for appellant's signature, and was not to take effect until so signed. No. 3 is substantially supplied by No. 5, given by the court, which reads as follows: "(5) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant Prybil put his name on the back of the note sued on in this case, under an agreement or understanding with the International Bank that he, Prybil, should be liable thereon only as an indorser, then the defendant Prybil is not liable thereon in this action, and the jury should find for the defendant Prybil."

Discovering no reversible error in the record, the judgment is affirmed. All concur.

DUNN (TACKABERRY, Intervener) v. TAYLOR et al.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 114*) — EVIDENCE OF POSSESSION—SUFFICIENCY.

The fact of possession of real estate, relied on to establish adverse possession cannot be shown by the testimony of a witness that, during the intervals of the occupancy by tenants, there were care takers in possession of the premises, based wholly on the fact that persons had applied to him for permission to occupy the premises, and promised to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 684, 687; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 112*)—BURDEN OF PROOF.

A defendant, in trespass to try title, who relies on title by adverse possession, has the burden of proving every fact essential to his defense; and, where he relies on the occupancy of successive possessors, he must show that such occupancy was continuous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 667; Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 112*)—CONTINUITY OF POSSESSION.

Where one, relying on title by adverse possession, admitted that breaks occurred in the occupancy of successive possessors, he must show facts from which the conclusion of continuity might be deduced affirmatively, and he could not ask the court to assume that the breaks were of so short duration as not to defeat the continuity of possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 655, 667; Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 46*)—CONTINUITY OF POSSESSION.

Where one relied on title by adverse possession, and showed that the land had been fenced and used for a pasture, and had been in possession of tenants, but it appeared that breaks in the occupancy of tenants were four, five, or six months, or a year, in length, the breaks were too great to be disregarded, and they could not be regarded as the reasonable times allowed for changes of occupants so as to make the possession continuous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 243; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 252*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY.

Where, in trespass to try title, defendant relied on title by adverse possession, and showed that the land had been in possession of tenants, but did not show the length of the intervals between the occupancy of different tenants, the submission to the jury of the question as to the reasonableness of such intervals was not proper; an issue on which there is no evidence not being proper for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 596-612; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

6. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 19*)—ACTUAL POSSESSION.

Under the statute making cultivation, use, or enjoyment of land essential to actual and visible appropriation constituting adverse possession, the fact that land was inclosed was not sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

7. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 46*)—CONTINUITY OF POSSESSION.

The necessity of the continuous use of land to create title by adverse possession is not affected by difficulty in procuring tenants, but he who would acquire land by limitation must perform the conditions prescribed by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 243; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

8. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 46*)—CONTINUITY OF POSSESSION.

The uses to which land was put may be considered, in determining whether the interval between the occupancy of different tenants was only such as might be considered as the time reasonably required for a change of tenants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 243; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

9. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 114*)—ACQUISITION OF TITLE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held not to show continuous possession of land essential to create title by adverse possession, under the 10-year statute of limitation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 682-690; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

10. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 43*)—CONTINUOUS POSSESSION.

Where there was no possession under a recorded deed from the date of its execution until more than a year afterwards, when it was recorded, the possession after the recording of the deed could not be connected with prior possession so as to establish title under the five-year statute of limitation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 213-218; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1177*)—DISPOSITION OF CASE—REVERSAL—NECESSITY FOR NEW TRIAL.

Where the record indicates that additional evidence may be obtained, the Supreme Court will not render the judgment which should have been rendered in the court below, but will remand the cause for another trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1177.*]

12. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 19*)—INCLOSURES OF LAND—SUFFICIENCY.

Land inclosed on three sides by a fence and on the fourth side by a river, with the banks of which the fence connected, was sufficiently inclosed, when the land was in actual use, to show such an appropriation of it as would sustain the defense of limitation, where such use was continuous, subject to the operation of Rev. St. 1895, art. 3346, relating to the possession of land belonging to another.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

13. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 18*) — EXISTENCE OF RELATION—EVIDENCE.

The relation of landlord and tenant may be shown by the tenant's acknowledgment of the tenancy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

14. EVIDENCE (§ 317*)—HEARSAY—DECLARATIONS OF TENANT—POSSESSION—ADMISSIBILITY.

The fact of actual possession by a tenant to establish adverse possession cannot be shown by the declaration of the tenant acknowledging the tenancy; the testimony being hearsay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1178; Dec. Dig. § 317.*]

15. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 113*) — ACTUAL POSSESSION—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where one claiming land by adverse possession showed that the land used as a pasture was inclosed on three sides by a fence, and on the fourth side by a river, evidence that the river was generally used above and below the land as a barrier for pastures was admissible to show to the owners of the land that it had been appropriated and used by others.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

16. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 19*)—ACTUAL POSSESSION—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

The mere fact that a river, used as a barrier on one side of land fenced on the other sides, was not a perfect barrier against stock was not conclusive against the claim of possession of the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 101; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

17. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE (§ 39*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where, in trespass to try title, defendant relied on adverse possession, and connected himself with conveyances in a chain of title, it was not error to permit defendant to show that a deed in the chain of title, dated January 1, 1901, was in fact not executed until about the date of its acknowledgment and record, June 9, 1903.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass to Try Title, Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

18. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 19*)—ACTUAL POSSESSION—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

Rev. St. 1895, art. 3346, providing that possession of land belonging to another, by a person claiming 5,000 acres or more of lands inclosed by a fence, in connection therewith, shall not be peaceable and adverse possession contemplated by article 3343, unless the land so belonging to another shall be separated by a substantial fence from said lands connected therewith, etc., when considered in connection with Rev. St. 1895, arts. 3340, 3342-3345, 3348, 3349, prescribing different periods of limitation, article 3343 prescribing a 10-year limitation, and defining peaceable and adverse possession, does not apply where the 5-year statute is in question, but applies when the 10-year limitation is claimed by such an inclosure as is mentioned, and the legislation leaves unaffected the established rule as to the sufficiency of possession so far as it applies to claims under the 5-year statute, and abrogates the rule in its application to the 10-year statute, though the claim be asserted under recorded deeds.

Error from Court of Civil Appeals, Fourth Supreme Judicial District.

Trespass to try title by J. S. Taylor and another against Frank Dunn, in which J. V. Tackaberry intervened, and in which he and defendant Frank Dunn reconvened against plaintiffs, and brought in other parties. There was a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals (107 S. W. 952) affirming a judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Frank Dunn and intervenor bring error. Reversed and remanded.

N. A. Rector, for plaintiffs in error. C. L. Bass and A. C. Bullitt, for defendants in error.

WILLIAMS, J. This is an action of trespass to try title, brought by J. S. Taylor and his wife, Ella G. Taylor, against Dunn, in which Tackaberry intervened, claiming to have purchased the title of Dunn, and in which he and Dunn, for the purpose of recovering the land, reconvened against the plaintiffs, and also brought in other parties asserting claims to portions of it. All of the other parties claimed under Mrs. Taylor; and the controversy resolved itself into one between Tackaberry, who had title to the land, unless it has been lost by limitation, and the other parties, except Dunn, claiming under the 5 and 10 year statutes of limitation. It will therefore be convenient to refer to Tackaberry as plaintiff, and to those asserting limitations as defendants. The pleas of limitation were sustained by verdict and judgment in the district court, and from an affirmance by the Court of Civil Appeals this writ of error is prosecuted by Tackaberry and Dunn.

It will be proper to take up first the assignments which assert that there is no evidence to sustain the verdict and judgment. The land in controversy is 640 acres patented to John Cummings, its western boundary being the Nueces river. It appears that many years ago it, with other lands, was inclosed by one Robert Hall in a pasture used for grazing horses, on three sides by a fence and on the fourth side by the river, with the banks of which the fence connected at both ends. This inclosure is called the Bob Hall pasture. Hall made no claim to the land, and finally sold out his improvements to G. W. Cavender. On the 12th day of July, 1882, one F. M. McCaleb executed to Cavender a deed for the Cummings tract, which was recorded July 18, 1882. The defendants connect themselves with this conveyance by deeds as follows: (1) F. M. McCaleb to G. W. Cavender, July 12, 1882, recorded July 18, 1882. (2) G. W. Cavender to W. J. Thornton, July 31, 1886, recorded February 24, 1887. (3) W. J. Thornton and wife to San Antonio National Bank, January 28, 1891, recorded January 31, 1891. (4) San Antonio National Bank to M. T. Taylor, February 9, 1898, recorded February 21, 1898. (5) M. T. Taylor to J. C. Taylor, September 19, 1899, recorded October 26, 1900. (6) J. C. Taylor to Ella G. Taylor, September 20, 1900, recorded October 26, 1900. (7) M. T. Taylor to Ella G. Taylor, January 1, 1901, recorded June 9, 1903. (8) Taylor and wife to Nueces Valley Irrigation Company, July 1, 1903, recorded July 13, 1903. (9) Taylor and wife to J. L. Carr and Emma Carr, March 9, 1902, recorded March 17, 1902. (10) Emma Carr, surviving wife of J. L. Carr, to H. W. Earnest, August 13, 1903, recorded same day. (11) Taylor and wife to M. A. Haas, August 16, 1904, recorded November 2, 1904. (12) Irrigation Company to C. L. Bass, July 15, 1904, recorded July 16, 1904.

The evidence of the different possessions, as well as it can be gathered from the very indefinite and confusing testimony of the witnesses, may be condensed as follows: In the fall of 1882 Cavender occupied a house in a pasture adjoining that in which the Cummings tract was inclosed, as stated, and not long thereafter began the use of the latter as a pasture for his stock, which use he continued until he conveyed to Thornton at the date of the deed above given. Before that date Thornton lived in and had in use another pasture further up the river than the Bob Hall pasture, but adjoining it, and at some time not shown he thereafter used the latter, also, for grazing purposes, and had it so in use when he conveyed to the San Antonio National Bank. Whether or not he commenced so to use it so soon after Cavender's occupancy ceased as that the possession of the two may be regarded as continuous and unbroken the evidence fails to show, unless an inference may be indulged, from the situations of the different pastures and the character of Thornton's pursuits that he put the Bob Hall pasture in use within a reasonable time after acquiring it. When he executed the conveyance to the San Antonio National Bank, Thornton ceased to hold possession of any character. The evidence as to possession held between the dates of the conveyances from Thornton to the bank, and from the latter to M. T. Taylor, comes from the witness Vandervoort, who in 1893 was employed by the bank as its agent. Upon his testimony the defendants rely to show possession by the bank during the interval mentioned. Important parts of it are claimed by the plaintiffs to have been hearsay, but for the present purpose we shall assume that no proper objection was made upon that ground, and that the statement of Presnall to which he testified is to be considered as evidence upon the question as to the continuity of the possession. Vandervoort's testimony relates to the possession of the bank through tenants who occupied in the following order: Presnall & Blocker, Cavender, English, Howell, and Eardley. As to the occupancy of Presnall & Blocker, his earliest knowledge was acquired in 1892, when Presnall told him in Carrizo Springs that they had rented the land from the bank and were in possession. He does not account for the interval between that time and the date of the deed from Thornton to the bank. He says he thinks the bank bought Thornton's cattle with the pasture, and sold them to Presnall & Blocker, from which the inference might possibly arise that the bank in the meantime kept them in the pasture; but, when interrogated further, he states that he does not know these facts. The only conveyance from Thornton to the bank stated in the record says nothing about the pasture or the cattle, but is for the Cummings land only. His memory is uncertain as to the duration of Presnall & Blocker's occupancy. His best recollection is that it was for two years, lasting from 1892 to 1894, but he says it may have been for three years. After Presnall & Blocker left, the Cummings and another tract were rented by the witness to Cavender. This was in 1895, the time of the year not stated. Shortly after this renting to Cavender he rented the remainder of the pasture to English. He says there were intervals between the going out of Thornton and the coming in of Presnall & Blocker and between the tenancy of the latter and those of Cavender and English, the length of which he cannot state, admitting that they may have been as great as four, five, or six months, or even a year. The witness, it is true, states that he had care takers in the pasture during some of the intervals, which ones he does not know; but further examination elicited the statement that his only knowledge was that persons applied to him for permission to occupy the premises, and promised to do so and to take care of them. Whether or not they were ever in possession he did not pretend to know. It is too plain that the fact of possession cannot be shown in this way. On account of the differences in the dates at which the defendants became parties to this litigation limitation is to be counted in favor of some until November 4, 1903, and of others until May 20, 1905.

It seems plain that no continuous and unbroken possession for 10 years was shown affirmatively. The possession of Cavender and Thornton, even if unbroken, did not last for 10 years before the latter conveyed to the bank, and thereafter no continuous possession of 10 years was shown. The burden was on the defendants to prove every fact essential to their defense. Relying on the occupancy of successive possessors, they were bound to show that such occupancy was continuous and unbroken. Overand v. Menczer, 83 Tex. 122, 18 S. W. 301; Phillipson v. Flynn, 83 Tex. 584, 19 S. W. 136. Admitting that breaks occurred, they are not in a position to ask the courts to assume that such breaks were of so short duration as not to defeat the continuity of the possession. It was incumbent on them to show the facts from which the conclusion of continuity may be deduced affirmatively. But we think the evidence affirmatively indicates, at least, that there were intervals between the possessions of Thornton and of Presnall & Blocker, and between those of the latter and of Cavender, which were too great to be disregarded as the reasonable times allowed by the law for changes of occupants. No decision of this court has ever held to be immaterial such lapses of possession as this evidence indicates. It was improper for the court to submit, as it did, to the jury the question as to reasonableness of the time. There was no evidence from which the jury could properly determine that only reasonable intervals occurred, when they could not possibly know how long those intervals were. Whether it is proper in any case, where the length of the intervals is shown, to submit such an inquiry to a jury is not the question. It certainly is improper to submit a question which cannot be decided upon evidence adduced. We cannot admit the right of the courts to require only 9 or 9½ years of continuous possession when the law requires 10, and this would be the effect of overlooking gaps of 6 months or a year between tenancies. Of course, we are not speaking of cases in which, during such intervals, other acts of dominion over the land are done upon it by the claimant. Here there was nothing of the kind so far as the evidence shows. The land, it is true, was inclosed, but inclosure without use is not sufficient. The statute requires the cultivation, use, or enjoyment of the land, and this is essential to the "actual and visible appropriation" which constitutes adverse possession. The necessity for this continuous use of the land is not affected by difficulty in getting tenants. He who would acquire the land of another by limitation must perform the conditions under which the law permits him to do so. Excuses for nonoccupancy cannot be accepted as the equivalent of possession. It is doubtless true that the uses to which land is put may be considered, in determining whether or not intervals between the occupancy of tenants were only such as may be considered as the time reasonably required for the change. When yearly crops are raised, it may be that actual occupancy of a tenant for the time between the harvesting of one crop and the preparation for another should not be held to be essential. In such cases the appearances on the land itself would probably show the purposes for which it is being used. But the possession here in question, when held, was not itself of the clearest character. We think it would have been sufficient had it been shown to have been continuous, but it was nevertheless of a nature to be easily abandoned, and, at times when the land was not grazed, there were not, so far as the evidence shows, any indications of a continued dominion over it. We must therefore hold that 10-year limitation was not shown.

We think it equally clear that the facts do not sustain the claim under the five-year statute. No continuous payment of taxes was shown for a period of five years prior to 1893. There was no continuous possession of five years, as we have shown, from that time until Eardley took possession, which was in December, 1897. The five years must be counted from that time, for the reason already shown that Eardley's possession is not shown to have succeeded those which preceded it within proper time. The statement given of the deeds under which defendants claim shows that at no time after Cavender last entered did any one hold under a deed duly registered for as much as five years. The conveyance from M. T. Taylor to J. C. Taylor vested the title in the latter September 19, 1899, less than five years after Cavender's last entry, and thereafter the holding must have been under it. There was therefore no possession under a recorded deed from that date until October 26, 1900, when that deed was recorded, more than a year after it was executed, so far as the record shows. Because of this interval in the registration of deeds the possession after October 26, 1900, cannot, for the purposes of five-year limitation, be connected with prior possessions, and five years did not elapse between that date and the interruption of limitation by suit.

It is urged by plaintiffs in error that we should render judgment in their favor, for the reason that the facts have been fully developed, but we cannot say that this is true. The record indicates that other evidence on the questions we have discussed may be obtained, and we think the cause should be remanded for another trial, which makes it proper that we determine some other questions. As we have already stated we agree with the Court of Civil Appeals that the inclosure by the fence and the river was sufficient, when the land was in actual use, to show such an appropriation of it as would sustain the defense of limitation if such use was continuous. This, however, is subject to the operation of article 3346, Rev. St., on the claim of 10-year limitation, which is discussed further on. The relation of landlord and tenant between the bank and Presnall & Blocker may be shown by an acknowledgment of tenancy, but the fact of actual possession by the tenants, for the purposes of limitation, cannot be thus established. Their declarations as to that fact would be hearsay. Evidence that the Nueces river was generally used above and below the Bob Hall pasture as a barrier for pastures was admissible, for the reason that such general use of it would indicate to the owners of land that it was thus appropriated and used by others. The mere fact that the river was not a perfect barrier against stock would not be conclusive against the claim of the possessor. Gunter v. Meade, 78 Tex. 638, 14 S. W. 562. The trial court did not err in permitting the defendants to show that the deed of M. T. Taylor to E. G. Taylor, dated January 1, 1901, was in fact not executed until about the date of its acknowledgment and record June 9, 1903. Had there been no previous conveyance by M. T. Taylor, this evidence would have shown that there had been continuous possession for her under her recorded deed from the bank until she executed the conveyance to Ella G. Taylor. As the case now appears from the record, the evidence is unimportant, but it may become important on another trial. The evidence upon another trial may differ materially from that in the record. From what we have said it follows that the court should direct a verdict for the plaintiffs for the land, unless there is fuller evidence on the question of limitation than that in the record. A discussion of the instructions given at the trial under review would serve no useful purpose, as we cannot know what other evidence may be adduced.

There is, however, a question raised upon the following instruction, which should be decided: "Prior to July 13, 1891, it was not important under the 10-year statute how many acres of land were contained in the inclosure embracing any land sought to be held by limitation, but on that date a law took effect restricting any inclosure sufficient to satisfy the 10-year statute to less than 5,000 acres. It was also provided by said law that possession of land belonging to another, by a person owning or claiming 5,000 acres of land or more inclosed by a fence, in connection therewith or adjoining thereto, shall not be the peaceable and adverse possession required by the 10-year statute of limitation, unless said land so belonging to another shall be segregated and separated by a substantial fence from said lands connected therewith or thereto adjoining, or unless there be actual possession thereof. However, where a party so in possession holds the land under a deed, or deeds, fixing the boundaries of the possessor's claim, and is duly recorded, such peaceable possession shall be construed to be coextensive with the boundaries specified in such instrument, and the restriction of the inclosure to less than 5,000 acres does not apply under said 10-year statute of limitation." The proposition in the instruction which is controverted is "that if the parties claiming such limitation had a deed on record, it was immaterial whether or not the inclosure in which the land in controversy was located exceeded 5,000 acres of land." The question arises upon the construction of the act of 1891 (Laws 1891, p. 76, now article 3346, Rev. St. 1895) in connection with articles 3340, 3342-3345, 3348, 3349. Article 3346 is as follows: "Possession of land belonging to another by a person owning or claiming five thousand acres or more of lands inclosed by a fence in connection therewith or adjoining thereto shall not be the peaceable and adverse possession contemplated by article 3343, unless said land so belonging to another shall be segregated and separated by a substantial fence from said lands connected therewith or thereto adjoining, or unless at least one-tenth thereof shall be cultivated and used for agricultural purposes, or used for manufacturing purposes, or unless there be actual possession thereof."

The phrase "peaceable and adverse possession" is common to articles 3340, 3342, 3343, which prescribe the different periods of limitation. None of these provisions prescribe what shall constitute the possession referred to. That is done by articles 3348 and 3349. The definitions there given of "peaceable" and of "adverse possession" originally applied to those terms as used in all the articles fixing the different periods of limitation, the same tests determining the sufficiency of the possession under all the provisions. This was true until the act of 1891 (article 3346) was adopted. It is still largely true, but the act referred to prescribes a special rule to be observed in applying the 10-year period in the cases of which it treats. That rule is not made applicable to cases depending on the 3 and 5 year periods, as appears from the fact that it is expressly confined to possessions referred to in article 3343, which is the 10-year statute. Had it been intended to apply indiscriminately to possessions asserted under all three of the articles, the reference naturally would have been either to all of them or to articles 3348 and 3349, in which the possession contemplated in all had been defined. Hence it follows, as held by the Court of Civil Appeals in Cunningham v. Matthews, 57 S. W. 1115, in which a writ of error was refused by this court, that article 3346 by its terms does not apply where the 5-year statute is in question. But it is equally true that by its terms it does apply when 10-year limitation is claimed by such an inclosure as is mentioned. There is nothing in it which makes an exception of cases in which the land inclosed is held under deed or other muniment of title defining boundaries. It declares, in effect, that possession by inclosure of the specified size shall not be deemed the possession essential to 10-year limitation, unless the other prescribed things exist. The courts have not the right to make sufficient an inclosure without any of those other things, but with something else not mentioned in the statute. Article 3344, which prescribes rules for determining the extent of the required possession, when it exists, does not attempt to fix the essentials of the possession itself. It operates when the fact of possession required by other provisions is established, and enables the courts to ascertain the lawful extent of the possession, but it does not, as other provisions do, establish any rule by which to determine the sufficiency of the possession. Hence there is no conflict to be reconciled between it and article 3346. The effect of this legislation seems to be to leave unaffected the rule, established by the decisions in this state, as to the sufficiency of possessions held by means of such inclosures and use of land, so far as that rule applies to claims under the 5-year statute, and to abrogate the rule in its application to the 10-year statute, although the claim be asserted under recorded deeds. The same possession and claim, held sufficient for 5 years, is made ineffectual for 10 years. Speculation as to the reasons for this would be useless. We must take the statute as it is written, and hold that it does not admit such a construction as the instruction in question put upon it.

We discover nothing else needing further discussion than is found in the opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals. Reversed and remanded.

MEDDERS v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 14, 1908. On Rehearing, Nov. 11, 1908.)

1. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 36*)—INDICTMENT—SUFFICIENCY.

An indictment for swindling, which alleges that defendants represented to a certain bank that they were solvent and the owners of certain property described, and procured said bank, in reliance on said representations, to discount their note for a certain amount, and that such statements were false, is not insufficient because not alleging that the note discounted by the bank was not paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. § 48; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

2. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 38*) — OBTAINING MONEY—CREDITS.

Where an indictment for swindling charged that accused and B. received money from a bank by false representations, it was not material that the money was not actually paid over, but was placed to the credit of the defendant and by accused checked out in his co-defendant's name.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Pretenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 50-53; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

3. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 23*)—PARTIES LIABLE.

Where accused and B. went together to a bank and obtained credit by a loan to B. on their joint note by false representations as to their solvency and property, they were both guilty of swindling as principals, though the account was carried in B.'s name, and though defendant did not represent that he had any interest in the loan, and did not have in fact.

Appeal from District Court, Mason County; Clarence Martin, Judge.

L. Medders was convicted of swindling, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Walker, Adkins & Walker, for appellant.
F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This is a companion case to Baxter v. State, reported in 51 Tex. Cr. R. 576, 105 S. W. 195.

The indictment charges appellant with swindling, in that he made false representations to certain officers of the German-American National Bank at Mason; the officers' names being Lemburg, Durst, and White, White being vice president, and one of the other named parties being cashier and one assistant cashier. Appellant and Baxter were seeking a loan of $1,000, and represented to the officers of the bank that he (appellant) was the owner of four sections of land located near the town of Voca in McCulloch county, that said land was unincumbered, that he had a contract with one Martin to "put up" for him a bunch of cattle, and that he desired to use the money for the purpose of filling his contract. He further represented that R. L. Baxter was jointly interested with him in said Martin contract, that Baxter was the owner of four sections of land located near the town of Voca, and that this land was also unincumbered. He further represented that he desired to borrow the money for a period of 10 days, and that he and Baxter would execute a note due in 30 days, payable to the bank. On these representations, and the further representation as to the solvency of himself and Baxter above their homestead exemptions to satisfy the debt or refund the $1,000, the bank let them have the money. Then followed the allegation of the falsity of the statements, etc. White testified in substance as charged in the indictment, and in addition that the parties stated they would secure the signature of one Stiles as surety, also a resident of McCulloch county. They took the note away with them. Stiles signed it, and it was returned to the bank, whereupon the bank placed to Baxter's credit $1,000 less one month's interest, which was a part of the contract. This money was to be checked out over Baxter's name. Several checks were introduced in evidence, signed by Baxter, per appellant. The proof shows that the parties had no land at the time, except Baxter owned 160 acres which he occupied as a homestead, for which he had not paid. This, perhaps, is a sufficient statement of the case. A similar indictment was held good in Baxter's Case, and we are of opinion that this indictment is sufficient.

Appellant contends that neither he nor Baxter received any money of any sort, and that, while the money was placed to the credit of Baxter, it created only the relation of creditor and debtor as between Baxter and the bank, and therefore no money was in fact obtained. We have held in prior cases this proposition is not sound. Therefore we deem it unnecessary to review that question.

Nor is the contention of appellant that the court should not have charged in regard to principals correct. Under the facts the parties were acting together and both present. Medders knew the condition of things, and represented himself to be a party to the contract for the delivery of the cattle, and this money was sought to relieve a debt on the cattle, in order that they might consummate the trade with Martin. They were both present, and appellant did some of the talking, made some of the representations, and was acting with Baxter. White is corroborated by testimony of other bank officers. This made appellant as much a party to the transaction as it did Baxter. Other facts in the record show that appellant had no such land as he represented to have, and he knew that Baxter did not own such land. The charge in regard to principals was not error.

Appellant depended largely upon the theory that, as the indictment charged him with obtaining current money of the United States, the case was not made out; in fact, that there was a variance between the allegation in the indictment and the evidence introduced, because of the fact that no money really passed between the parties, and the passing to Baxter's credit the $1,000 less the one month's interest, was not sufficient to show a reception of money. As stated, we do not think there is any merit in this contention. It was as much a money transaction by passing the money to the credit of Baxter as if he in fact had received the money and placed it back in the bank, or had received the money and carried it away. It changed the possession and title to the money from the bank to Baxter. The court, therefore, did not err in refusing appellant's requested instruction covering this contention.

After a careful review of the entire record, we are of opinion that it presents no such error as requires a reversal of the judgment, which is therefore affirmed.

On Rehearing.

On a previous day of the present term the judgment in this case was affirmed. Appellant files his motion for rehearing, setting up several grounds.

The first ground alleges that the court in the opinion erred "in finding as a fact that appellant represented to the bank that he had a contract with one Martin to 'put up' some cattle, when the record discloses the fact that it was one R. L. Baxter who represented that he (not Medders) had this contract to 'put up' some cattle." Another ground alleges that the court is in error "when it makes the following deductions from the record: 'Under the facts the parties were acting together and both present. Medders knew the condition of things, and represented himself to be a party to the contract for the delivery of the cattle, and this money was sought to relieve a debt on the cattle, in order that they might consummate the trade with Martin. They were both present, and appellant did some of the talking, made some of the representations, and was acting with Baxter.'" This is a quotation from the original opinion. Appellant says in his motion: "Appellant fails to find anywhere in the record that he represented to the bank that he had a contract with Martin or any one else to put up cattle for him or them." He further states in this ground of the motion as follows: "Neither can appellant find from the record sufficient evidence to support the court in concluding that appellant knew all about the contract and intentions of Baxter with the bank." We have, in the light of the contention of appellant in his motion for rehearing, reviewed the facts; and, as appellant and the court do not understand this record alike, we have concluded to make quotations from the testimony.

The witness White testified that he was acquainted with the parties and had business transactions with them on the 6th of May, 1905, "in which they were both present. We loaned them $1,000. I think that is the date. Prior to that time we loaned them the $500. On the 6th of May we made this $1,000 loan. The negotiations were carried on in the office of the German-American National Bank. F. W. Lemburg, H. C. Durst, and myself were present for the bank, and R. L. Baxter and L. Medders were present, when the loan was made. As to the representations that were made by Medders and Baxter: I had just come down from dinner. Mr. Lemburg and Durst and Mr. Baxter and Mr. Medders were inside of the railing of the bank at the desk talking. I walked in, and Mr. Lemburg says to me: 'Mr. Baxter and Mr. Medders want to borrow $1,000 for 10 days.' I says: 'Have we got the money to spare?' He says: 'Yes.' I says to them: 'What security have you got?' or 'How are you fellows fixed?' They both spoke up. Mr. Baxter first says: 'I own four sections of land out near the town of Voca, in McCulloch county, and unincumbered.' Mr. Medders says: 'I own four sections of land out there in McCulloch county, near the town of Voca.' They said they would put Jim Stiles on the note. They said the land was unincumbered. They said it was in their own names, they didn't owe anything on it, and it was unincumbered. I said: 'In that case we can let you have the money.' They said: 'We only want the money for 10 days.' I told them we would not make a note for less than 30 days. We made a note for 30 days and took the discount out. They carried the note off to get Stiles to sign it. In two or three, or three or four, days the note came back with Stiles' name on it. Both Baxter and Medders said they would give a note. They said: 'We will give our note.' I told them they must sign it, not as a firm, but to sign it as 'R. L. Baxter' and 'L. Medders.' We would not take a firm's name on a note. They said they had a contract with one Martin—I understood John Martin; I don't remember as far as that is concerned, but it was one Martin—for 500 two year old steers, and they had the steers all paid for with the exception of about $1,000. As soon as they got this $1,000 they were to deliver the steers; and as soon as they got the money they would straighten up all their notes. Mr. Baxter and Mr. Medders said they were both interested in the Martin contract and in paying for the cattle. Both parties were present. The note was signed by Baxter and Medders in the bank. At that time they owed the bank a note for $500—I can't remember the date of it—and their account stood a little overdrawn. I think the note was returned about the 10th of May—about the 10th; the 9th or 10th. It probably came in on the night of the 9th or the night of the 10th. R. L. Baxter was given credit for it. The account was kept with Baxter by their own consent, and Baxter was to sign the checks. It was agreed there at that time that the money was to be deposited there in the name of R. L. Baxter, and he was to give the checks to check it out." This is the testimony of J. W. White.

After a careful review of this testimony and the statements contained in the original opinion which have been criticised by appellant in his motion for rehearing, we are still of the opinion that the criticised statements are correct. White's testimony was credited by the jury, and this court was justified in finding that appellant represented himself as being a party to the Martin contract with Baxter and was borrowing the money to relieve the indebtedness hanging over the 500 head of cattle. If Baxter was guilty of a fraud upon the bank under the circumstances above detailed, the conclusion cannot be escaped that appellant was equally guilty. White says he made the representation—held himself out as interested in getting the money, in the cattle contract, and in paying off the indebtedness hanging over the cattle. Whatever fraud may have been perpetrated upon the bank by Baxter was done with appellant's knowledge, consent, and active participation. He was present, aiding and assisting Baxter in getting the money, making the representations stated by White; and under these representations he was equally interested in obtaining the money to be used for the purpose stated by him at the time. But, even if he was not interested to a dollar's extent, he knew the false representations that Baxter was making, and by joining and assisting him, as he did in getting the money, he became a principal, and was equally responsible with Baxter. He was present, aiding and encouraging Baxter in perpetrating fraud, knowing it was a fraud, knowing the representations were false, and this made him a principal with Baxter in the swindle, whether he had a dollar's interest in it or not, or whether he represented to the bank that he had any interest in it.

Nor is there any merit in appellant's further contention in his motion that the account was carried on in the name of Baxter on the bank's books. White testified that it was the understanding and agreement at the time that the money should be placed to the credit of Baxter. We are still of the opinion that the testimony we have quoted justifies the conclusion and statements made in the original opinion.

We are therefore of opinion that the motion should be overruled, and it is accordingly so ordered.

OLDS v. STATE

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 28, 1908.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 310*)—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO MURDER—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, on a trial for assault with intent to murder, there was evidence that, while accused was quarreling with prosecutrix, a third person struck him with a fire poker, and that accused thereupon chased the third person, and thought he was striking her with an iron bar, when he by mistake struck prosecutrix, and the court submitted the issues of assault with intent to murder and aggravated assault, a charge that, if accused assaulted the third person with intent to murder and struck prosecutrix, he was not guilty, was properly refused, because it did not present the issue of aggravated assault, which the law of mistake did not reach.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 310.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 310*)—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO MURDER—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction, on a trial for assault with intent to murder, that if accused assaulted prosecutrix with an instrument likely to produce death or serious bodily injury with intent to kill prosecutrix, and if the assault was not an aggravated assault, the jury should find accused guilty of an assault with intent to murder, etc., was not prejudicial to accused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 310.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 84*)—"ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO MURDER."

An assault accompanied with the specific intent to kill is an "assault with intent to murder" if malice is present, and the infliction of injury on the person assaulted is not necessary to a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 110; Dec. Dig. § 84.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 541-542.]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 95*)—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO MURDER—PROVOCATION.

Where a third person committed such an assault and battery on accused as caused him pain and produced in his mind a degree of rage sufficient to render it for the time incapable of cool reflection, and accused in such state of mind committed an assault on prosecutrix by knocking her down with a dangerous weapon while he believed that he was assaulting the third person, he was guilty of aggravated assault, though the weapon used was a deadly weapon and the assault was made with intent to kill the third person.

Appeal from District Court, Marion County; P. A. Turner, Judge.

Mart Olds was convicted of assault with intent to murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This case is before us on a conviction of assault with intent to murder. The state's case is that appellant had been living in adultery for some time with Lulu Coleman, some children being the result of their living together, and that they sometimes had quarrels and trouble among themselves on account of what appellant thought was her misconduct, and on the occasion in question he came home and a quarrel resulted between them. He made an assault on her, and she fled. He picked up a bar of iron two or three feet long, an inch or an inch and a half in diameter, weighing 10 or 12 pounds, known by the witnesses as a window weight, and, overtaking, struck her with it on the head and knocked her down to insensibility, and again struck her a very severe blow on the shoulder, making the remark that he got her at last, or words to that effect. He then turned and pursued Mag Coleman, a sister of the alleged injured party, but failed to overtake her. The appellant's theory of the case, in substance, is that, while he was quarreling with Lulu, Mag came up and struck him with a fire poker two or three severe blows upon the head, and that he chased her and thought he was knocking her down at the time of and in place of Lulu. He also denies that he had used a window weight, but had used a much less dangerous instrument, which was a wagon spoke or buggy spoke, covered with sheet iron. It may be stated in this connection that Lulu Coleman was absent, in the city of Dallas, and did not testify in the case, and in fact she had been absent most of the time, after the assault, up to and including the time of the trial.

The charge of the court followed the usual line in submitting the law in cases of this character. The court left it optional, under the charge to the jury, to convict of assault with intent to murder or aggravated assault. Appellant requested the court to give two special charges, which were refused. The first was that if the jury should believe that defendant struck Lulu Coleman by mistake, taking her for Mag Coleman at the time, they would find him not guilty, because under that state of the case there would not be a specific intent on the part of appellant to kill and murder Lulu Coleman. The second was that where one commits an assault to murder on one person, and accidentally wounds another or third party, he would not be guilty of an offense by reason of the assault on the said third party, and therefore, if the jury should find that appellant committed an assault on Mag Coleman with intent to murder her, and accidentally assaulted Lulu Coleman, they would find defendant not guilty. We think the court was correct in refusing these charges. If appellant, intending to kill Mag Coleman, struck Lulu Coleman, the offense might be the same, in case of death, as if he had killed Mag Coleman. If he had the specific intent to kill one, and inadvertently killed the other, he would not be justified. There might, perhaps, be some question as to whether he would be guilty of assault to murder Lulu Coleman, under the circumstances; but there could be no question of the fact that it was an aggravated assault. But the charges which appellant requested did not present this issue. They presented a matter that under this theory of the case there must be an acquittal. The law of mistake does not reach that character of case, under facts as here developed, or, rather, claimed by appellant. Appellant excepts to that portion of the court's charge which is as follows: "If from the evidence you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, Mart Olds, on or about the time charged in the indictment, etc., with a deadly weapon or instrument reasonably calculated and likely to produce death or serious bodily injury from the manner in which it was used, and with malice aforethought, did assault the said Lulu Coleman, knowing it to be her, with intent then and there to kill and murder her, by the means charged in the indictment, and if you are further satisfied by the evidence and beyond a reasonable doubt that said assault, if any, was not an aggravated assault, as the law of an aggravated assault is hereinafter defined in this charge to you, then you will find defendant guilty of an assault with intent to murder," etc. The criticism of this charge is that the expression "serious bodily injury," used in this connection, prejudiced the rights of defendant and made it more onerous on him to escape the felony charge than the law requires, and the use of those words in that connection is fundamental error. We do not believe that exception to be well taken. In fact, we are further of the opinion that the charge was more beneficial to the appellant than the law provides. If appellant made an assault on the woman with intent to kill her, actuated by malice, serious bodily injury was not a necessary element. The crime would have been as complete without any serious bodily injury as it would with it. Wherever the assault is made, as assaults are defined by law, accompanied with the specific intent to kill, the offense of assault with intent to murder is complete; malice being shown. Infliction of injury on the person is not absolutely necessary to a conviction of assault with intent to murder. Wherever there is an assault with malice aforethought, and the means used would have produced murder, and the parties in such relation that the assault could be consummated, the offense of assault with intent to murder is made out under the statute. It is therefore our opinion that there is no substantial merit in this contention.

Exception is taken to this portion of the charge: "A serious bodily injury is one which creates alarm or apprehension concerning the life of the injured party. I further charge you that if you believe, from the evidence, that Mag Coleman made an assault and battery on the defendant that caused him either pain or bloodshed, and that this produced in the mind of the defendant a degree of anger, rage, sudden resentment, or terror sufficient to render it for the time incapable of cool reflection, and in such state of mind the defendant committed an assault on Lulu Coleman, but he believed that he was making said assault on Mag Coleman, then you will find the defendant guilty of an aggravated assault, even if you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the weapon used was a deadly weapon and the assault was made with the intent to kill Mag Coleman." The criticism of this charge is that if his mind was incapable of cool reflection from the blows received on his head at the hands of Mag Coleman, and in that state of mind, if he had struck Mag Coleman, it would have been an aggravated assault; but it was no offense against the law if he struck a third party, Lulu Coleman, by mistake. The opposite idea to that expressly charged was embodied in appellant's special charges, which we have held properly refused, and we are of opinion that appellant has no just criticism of this portion of the court's charge. If appellant had killed Mag Coleman under the circumstances, the offense would not have been reduced below manslaughter, under the charge given. If he had killed Lulu Coleman under these circumstances, it would not have been reduced to manslaughter, because under that state of case Lulu Coleman would not have given the provocation; but in making the mistake, and supposing that it was Mag Coleman who struck him on the head, if he struck Lulu Coleman under the impression that it was Mag Coleman he was striking, the offense, in case death had resulted, could not have been less than manslaughter. The law does not permit this character of mistake. Appellant either intended to kill or he intended to inflict injury of some character upon the woman that he did strike, and the fact that he made a mistake, or may have made a mistake, under such circumstances, would not justify him; for the law does not authorize him to strike either woman, under the facts stated. Under no view of the law would a mistake of this sort relieve criminality. The purpose of the defendant was to inflict injury. It was intentional, although under his theory he may have made a mistake in the individual he intended to strike. If he had been justified in striking Mag Coleman, and by mistake hit Lulu Coleman, there might be some plausibility in this contention; but under no view of the law, under the facts of this case, was he justified in striking.

It may be that the final contention of appellant, that the evidence is not sufficient to justify a conviction of an assault with intent to murder, has some merit in it. The jury found that his testimony was not true, and that of the state was correct; that he made the assault on Lulu Coleman as charged. The state's evidence was not as cogent as in some cases, yet we are of opinion that the jury was justified in finding the verdict they did. At least the evidence is sufficiently strong to prevent, or not authorize, this court to interfere and set aside the verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Rains County Court; W. H. Clendenin, Judge.

Frank Martin was convicted of misdemeanor theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Berzett, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was charged with misdemeanor theft, and convicted. Motion for new trial was granted on account of defective pleadings. New pleadings being filed, appellant was immediately arrested and placed upon a second trial, and again convicted.

He filed a motion to postpone the case, or rather a motion for a continuance. The substance of the motion is that the case was called for trial the same day upon which the pleadings were filed and the same day appellant was arrested, that he had no time to procure process for witnesses, that he has a good defense to the prosecution if he has time to have it before the court, that the defendant ought not to be forced to announce in a cause the same day an affidavit and information is filed, that the law does not contemplate that he should be called upon to announce on that date, that his rights would be jeopardized if he should be forced to announce, and that there are a number of witnesses defendant desires that he may make his defense. It may be noted in the first place that a bill of exceptions was reserved to the ruling of the court refusing to continue the case. This, legally, would dispose of the question. Alleged error in overruling a motion for continuance will not be noticed or revised in the appellate court in the absence of a bill of exceptions reserved to the ruling of the court refusing such a tinuance. This rule has been adhered to in this state without intermission.

Appellant contends that the filing of the second affidavit and information constituted a new case. This position is unquestionably correct, under all the cases in Texas, so far as we are aware. The question is not a novel one. The law gives the defendant the opportunity of preparing himself for trial, if claimed in a legal manner. The application itself would not be sufficient, who the witnesses were, or what could be proved by them, is not stated. It will be observed that this appellant did not claim or undertake to claim the right to have two days allowed him in which to prepare and file written pleadings. Even if his motion would apply to that statute, his exception was not reserved. The record does not contain a statement of facts, and, as it presents the case, we are unable to review this supposed erroneous ruling of the trial court.

The judgment must therefore be affirmed, and it is accordingly ordered.

BIARD v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 23, 1908.)

PERJURY (§ 5*)—WHAT CONSTITUTES—FALSE STATEMENT UNDER OATH.

Under Code Cr. Proc. 1895, arts. 282, 283, authorizing accused before the examination of the witnesses to make a statement, which shall be reduced to writing and signed, but not sworn to, a sworn statement, made before the examining magistrate by one charged with an assault, after waiver of examining trial, is not a statement on which perjury may be predicated, though, if the statement was voluntarily made, it may be the basis for a prosecution for false swearing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-6; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

Appeal from District Court, Lamar County; Ben H. Denton, Judge.

Frank Biard was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Reversed, and prosecution ordered dismissed.

B. B. Sturgeon and W. F. Moore, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Appellant was convicted of perjury, and his punishment assessed at five years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The statement of facts show, in substance, that appellant, in conjunction with others, was arrested for assault with intent to murder, and, after they had waived their examining trial, appellant was requested to and did make a voluntary statement, which statement was sworn to by him, and upon this statement perjury is predicated. The indictment, among other things, contains the following: " * * * And wherein issue was duly joined between the said state of Texas and said Bub Crowley, Lee Blow, Frank Biard, Harrison Biard, and Sam Biard, defendants, came on to be heard in due form of law, and was then and there heard by and before the said W. F. Boyett, justice of the peace as aforesaid, and the defendant Frank Biard being then and there informed by the said W. F. Boyett that it was his right to make a statement relative to the accusation brought against him, but that he, the said Frank Biard, could not be compelled to make any statement whatever, and that if he did make such statement the same would be used as evidence against him. Whereupon the said Frank Biard then and there stated that he desired to make a statement and tell all about it, and the said Frank Biard then and there appeared as a witness in behalf of himself, the said Frank Biard, and Bub Crowley, Harrison Biard, Lee Blow, and Sam Biard, and was then and there duly and legally sworn, and did take his corporal oath before the said court as a witness to testify in said cause, which oath was then and there required by law and necessary for the ends of public justice, and which said oath was then and there administered to him, the said Frank Biard, by the said W. F. Boyett, justice of the peace, and judge of said court as aforesaid."

An oath is not necessary, under the statute of this state, where the defendant makes a voluntary statement in examining trial. Article 282 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1895 provides: "Before the examination of the witnesses the magistrate shall inform the defendant that it is his right to make a statement relative to the accusation brought against him, but shall at the same time also inform him that he cannot be compelled to make any statement whatever, and that if he does make such statement it may be used in evidence against him." Article 283 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1895 provides: "If the accused shall desire to make a voluntary statement, he may do so before the examination of any of the witnesses, but not afterward. His statement shall be reduced to writing by the magistrate, or by some one under his direction, or by the accused or his counsel, and shall be signed by the accused, but shall not be sworn to by him. If the accused be unable to write his name, he shall sign the statement by making his mark at the foot of the same, and the magistrate shall in every case attest by his own certificate and signature to the execution and signing of the statement." In passing on a similar question in the case of Walker v. State, 28 Tex. App. 112, 12 S. W. 503, Judge Willson, speaking for the court, used the following language: "We are of opinion that the written statement admitted in evidence against the defendant over his objection thereto is incompetent evidence and should have been rejected. Said statement cannot be considered a voluntary statement such as is provided for by statute. It was not made by the defendant as a voluntary statement. It was sworn to by him. It was not authenticated as a voluntary statement by the magistrate before whom it purports to have been made. It is clear to our minds that the statement was not admissible in evidence as a voluntary statement under article 790 of the Code of Criminal Procedure." Jackson v. State, 29 Tex. App. 463, 16 S. W. 247.

The evidence in this case, as suggested above, shows that there was no examining trial held. All the parties waived the examination, and the statement upon which perjury is predicated taken. This might form a basis for a prosecution for false swearing, if anything, but is not a voluntary statement such as is authorized to be introduced in the course of a judicial proceeding, and hence cannot be a basis for perjury. If the statement is a voluntary statement within the purview of the statute, it is not required that the defendant swear to same. By the very terms of the statute it is provided that said statement shall not be sworn to by him. The statute prohibiting the justice of the peace from swearing him to a voluntary statement, if he swears him to it, then he performs an illegal act, provided it is a voluntary statement. If it is not a voluntary statement, then certainly the utmost the state could insist upon would be a prosecution for false swearing.

We do not deem it necessary to review the other errors complained of by appellant.

The evidence failing to charge a state of facts upon which perjury could be predicated, the judgment is reversed, and the prosecution ordered dismissed.

MOSBEY v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 28, 1908.)

LARCENY (§ 7*)—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY.

Defendant, having been deputized by K. as Masonic grand master to organize a Masonic lodge, did so and elected R. treasurer. R. received the fees and dues, which he paid to defendant, who was authorized to receive them; he claiming that the money belonged to himself and K., and that he had paid K.'s part to him. Held, that defendant could not be convicted of theft of the money as the property of R., as it did not belong to him in any event.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Larceny, Cent. Dig. § 19; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

Appeal from District Court, Atascosa County; E. A. Stevens, Judge.

W. H. Mosbey was convicted of theft, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Jno. W. Preston and N. A. Rector, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Appellant was convicted of theft, and his punishment assessed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The facts in the case show that appellant organized a Masonic lodge at Pleasanton in Atascosa county, being duly authorized to so do by one McKinney, whose home was in Sherman; that the prosecuting witness, Henry Ross, was elected treasurer of the lodge. Certain fees and dues for initiation and otherwise were turned over by Henry Ross to appellant, who was duly authorized under the facts in this case to receive same. Appellant claims that the money belonged to himself and to said McKinney, and there is evidence showing, on his part, that he paid McKinney his part of the money. But, be this as it may, appellant did not steal or embezzle any money, or obtain same as bailee from the prosecuting witness, Ross. Under the facts as disclosed by this record, if the money belonged to anybody other than appellant, it belonged to the said McKinney, who lived in Sherman, Tex., since Mosbey was working under the authority of said McKinney, who was grand master of the lodge. Appellant's employment coming from the said McKinney, and not from the prosecuting witness, Ross, it is clearly erroneous to base a prosecution upon any idea of embezzlement of Ross' money, or theft of property belonging to Ross, since it did not belong to said Henry Ross.

There being a fatal variance between the allegation and proof, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 365*)—EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ.

The state could show that after shooting decedent accused shot his wife, with whom accused claims decedent was criminally intimate, as part of the res gestæ, showing accused's animus, purpose, and intent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 807; Dec. Dig. § 365.*]

2. WITNESSES (§ 388*)—IMPEACHMENT—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

On cross-examination of accused's wife, the state could ask her concerning a statement made to a justice in accused's absence, to lay a predicate for her impeachment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1240; Dec. Dig. § 388.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1091*)—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

A bill of exceptions to the state being permitted to read from a statement was defective

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes for failing to contain the statement or to refer to any statement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1091.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1110*)—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—REVIEW.

The Court of Criminal Appeals will not refer to a statement of facts to supply a defective bill of exceptions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1110.*]

5. HOMICIDE (§ 181*)—EVIDENCE—DECEDENT'S CONDUCT WITH ACCUSED'S WIFE.

One accused of murder could show that a certain house was reputed to be, and was kept as, a bawdy house, and that decedent and accused's wife were there together the night preceding the killing, as tending to show that accused had reasonable basis for believing undue intimacy existed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 384; Dec. Dig. § 181.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 530*)—CONFESSIONS—ADMISSIBILITY.

Under Code Cr. Proc. 1895, art. 790, as amended by Acts 30th Leg. p. 219, c. 118, § 1, a written confession must show on its face that accused was warned by the person to whom the same was made that it might be used against him, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1208; Dec. Dig. § 530.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 763*)—MURDER—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

An instruction that if the jury believed beyond reasonable doubt that accused, with implied malice and with a deadly weapon reasonably calculated to produce death, aroused without adequate cause, and not in self-defense, with intent to kill, killed decedent, he should be convicted, was not erroneous, as charging that defendant had implied malice and as being on the weight of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 763.*]

8. HOMICIDE (§ 295*)—MURDER—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that, in determining whether there was adequate cause for the killing, the jury could look to any and all provocations, was not erroneous, for failing to go further and enumerate the antecedent provocations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

9. HOMICIDE (§ 47*)—MANSLAUGHTER—ACT CONSTITUTING.

If, suspecting that decedent had been unduly intimate with accused's wife, accused sought him out to inquire as to the truth of the matter, and decedent's statement, "I have had her, and I can get her again if I want her," rendered accused's mind incapable of cool reflection, and he killed decedent, accused was guilty of no higher offense than manslaughter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 71; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

Appeal from District Court, Red River County; Ben H. Denton, Judge.

Sam Young was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Chambers & Black, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Appellant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and his punishment assessed at five years' confinement in the penitentiary.

Appellant and deceased were negroes living in the same neighborhood in Red River county. From appellant's standpoint, deceased became intimate with his (appellant's) wife. He protested to the deceased in person against his attentions to his wife, and accused him on various occasions of being too intimate with her. He declared to various other parties that he was going to kill deceased on account of intimacy with his wife. On the morning of the homicide defendant informed his wife that he was going to take her back to her mother's on account of the intimacy of herself and the deceased. They started on this mission, and appellant's wife insisted that they should go by and get the deceased. They went where deceased was cutting wood; both of them calling to him. He finally came to where they were. A statement was made to him that they wanted him (deceased) to accompany them to a certain place in order to straighten up some lies, as they expressed it, that had been told, alluding to remarks and statements about the illicit intercourse between appellant's wife and deceased. Deceased accompanied them for some little distance. Finally they sat down near a fence close to a farm belonging to appellant's father-in-law. It seems, while sitting there, they talked over the troubles above alluded to. Then appellant and his wife got over the fence, and the following conversation occurred between appellant and deceased; deceased remaining on the outside of the fence: "I says to John Aikin, deceased: 'Does you want Sylvia?' He says: 'No.' I says: 'Why it seems like you does.' He says: 'She is your wife, hain't she?' I says: 'Yes, she is my wife; but I am fixing to carry her home, so you and her can associate, if you want to. There hain't no living for me and her to live together and you always picking at her.' He says: 'No, I don't want her.' He says: 'Do you want to know the truth?' I says: 'Yes.' He says: 'No, I don't want her. You asked me for the truth.' He says: 'Yes, I have had her, and if I want her I can get her again.' That is just what he spoke. 'I don't want her. She is your wife, and I don't want to interfere.' I says: 'You have done interfered with her.' He says: 'Yes, I have interfered with her; but I don't want her.' He had his jumper on just like this, and a coat over his apron, and it seemed that he was making an attempt or commenced carrying his hand up with his jumper and all, and when he says 'No, I don't want her,' why then I shot him. When I shot him he was standing about 10 steps from the fence on the outside and I was standing on the inside of the fence in the field." After appellant shot deceased two or more times he fell, and appellant then pursued his wife; the state's testimony showing that he was trying to kill her. His testimony showed that he was merely shooting to scare her or to make her stop. Appellant's wife ran on up towards her mother's house. Her mother came out and met her, and over protest of the mother appellant shot his wife, he claiming, however, that the pistol was accidentally discharged and wounded his wife, from which wound she recovered, and, the record shows, went back to live with appellant. There is other testimony in the record going to show divers meetings of appellant and deceased, and threats on the part of appellant towards deceased on account of his improper relations with his wife, which we do not deem necessary to rehearse, but believe the above statement sufficient to discuss the assignments of error raised by appellant.

Bill of exceptions No. 2 complains of the court permitting the state to prove the fact of defendant shooting his wife after shooting deceased. Appellant objects to same on the ground that it is another transaction, and because it is prejudicial to the defendant, and has no connection with this case, and is irrelevant and immaterial. This testimony was clearly part of the res gestae, and was admissible to show animus, purpose, and intent, to illustrate the condition of defendant's mind and motive that was prompting him throughout the entire homicide.

Bill of exceptions No. 3 relates to the same matter.

Bill of exceptions No. 4 complains that the state was permitted to read from a written statement theretofore made by Sylvia Young, wife of defendant, before Squire Story, in the absence of the defendant, about the transaction, to which counsel for defendant objected, because said statement, if made, was not made in the presence of the defendant, because said witness is the wife of the defendant, and because neither the defendant nor his attorneys were present at the time said purported statement was made, was not confronted with said witness, and had no opportunity to cross-examine her, and asks that said statement be excluded from the jury. This bill is given with the explanation that: "The defendant placed his wife, Sylvia Young, on the stand, and, while the district attorney was cross-examining her, he asked her certain questions, and at the time was looking on a paper and asking her if she did not make the statements. He was simply laying a predicate to impeach her upon the very questions about which she had testified for the defendant." Clearly, with this explanation, the testimony was admissible. However, the bill is defective, even without this explanation, for the reason it does not contain the statement and does not allude to any statement. We will not consult a statement of facts to make out a bill. In view, however, that this case will have to be tried again, we have examined the statement introduced, and find that same is a legitimate cross-examination of appellant's wife, since the same shows that it has relation to nothing but what she had testified to; many statements in this statement being adverse and contrary to her testimony on the trial of this case.

Bill of exceptions No. 5 shows that appellant offered to prove by Wash Martin and Dave Beaty that they and each of them lived in the neighborhood of Ida Little, that they knew the reputation of the house kept by said Ida Little, and that he expected to prove by each of said witnesses that they knew the reputation of said house, and that it was kept by the said Ida Little as a house of public prostitution, and by other witnesses that John Alkin, the deceased, and the wife of the defendant, were there the night before the killing together. State's counsel objected, and the court sustained the objection. This testimony was admissible, since it is corroborative of the suspicions of appellant, and goes to show that he was acting in good faith and had a reasonable basis for believing that deceased and his wife were unduly intimate. This is rendered doubly true, in view of the statement of facts, which shows that appellant went to Ida Little's house and found his wife in company with deceased.

Bill of exceptions No. 6 shows that the state offered to read in evidence a statement purporting to have been made by the defendant, to which counsel for the defendant objected for the following reasons: Because said statement does not show that the same was voluntarily made, and it does not show that it was stated to the defendant that this evidence would be used against him, and not for him, and the court overruled said objections. The court, in signing the bill, says: "The written statement was in accordance with the statute." Under the explanation of the court there was no error in admitting the statement; but we wish to call the court's attention, in view of another trial, to the peculiar phraseology of the statute authorizing the introduction of this character of testimony. Article 790, Code Cr. Proc. 1895, as amended by Acts 30th Leg. p. 219, c. 118, § 1, reads as follows, to wit: "The confession shall not be used if at the time it was made the defendant was in jail or other place of confinement, nor while he is in the custody of an officer, unless made in the voluntary statement of the accused taken before an examining court in accordance with law, or be made in writing and signed by him, which written statement shall show that he has been warned by the person to whom the same is made: First, that he does not have to make any statement at all. Second, that any statement made may be used in evidence against him on his trial for the offense concerning which the confession is therein made, or unless in connection with said confession, he makes statements of facts or circumstances that are found to be true, which conduce to establish his guilt, such as the finding of secreted or stolen property, or the instrument with which he states the offense was committed; provided that where the defendant is unable to write his name and sign the statement by making his mark, such statement shall not be admitted in evidence, unless it be witnessed by some person other than a peace officer, who shall sign the same as a witness."

The statement found in the record starts off as follows: "Sam Young, after having been informed that he cannot be compelled to make any statement whatever, and that, if he does make any statement, same will be used as evidence in the case against him for murdering John Alkin, and also in the case for shooting his wife, freely and voluntarily makes the following statement." Then follows appellant's statement, which is signed "Sam Young," as indicated in the record. It will be noticed that that portion of the statement copied does not contain one of the requisites of a written confession as prescribed by the acts of the last Legislature, in that same does not show that he had been warned by the person to whom the same is made. This statute is in derogation of the former statute, and in the opinion of the writer a statute that ought never to have been passed. Yet the same lays down a rule on the question of criminal evidence that becomes purely statutory, and in order to introduce the evidence it must comply strictly with the statute. The statement does not do so, since the same does not show upon its face that he was warned by the person to whom the same was made. The evidence dehors the statement, perhaps, may do so, and probably does; but the Legislature, in its wisdom, has seen fit to say that a voluntary statement that does not contain this clause is inadmissible. We are impotent to change the law, even if we were inclined to do so. The writer thinks the rule is too restrictive and ought to be repealed; but this is a matter left to the discretion of the Legislature.

Bill of exceptions No. 7 complains of the same matter discussed in bill of exceptions No. 4.

Appellant's amended motion for a new trial complains of the sixteenth paragraph of the court's charge, which is as follows: "If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, with his implied malice as that is hereinbefore explained, and with a deadly weapon or instrument reasonably calculated and likely to produce death by the mode and manner of its use, in a passion aroused without adequate cause, and not in defense of himself against an unlawful attack or demonstration reasonably producing a rational fear or expectation of death or serious bodily injury, with the intent to kill, did in Red River county, Texas, at any time prior to 28th day of November, 1907, unlawfully shoot and thereby kill John Alkin, as charged in the indictment, you will find him guilty of murder in the second degree, and assess his punishment at confinement in the state penitentiary for any period that the jury may determine and state in their verdict, provided it be for not less than five years." Appellant complains that the charge is on the weight of evidence, and virtually charges the jury that the defendant had implied malice against the deceased when he shot him. The charge is correct, and has been frequently approved by this court.

The second ground of the motion complains of the following charge: "In determining whether or not there was adequate cause, you have the right to look to any or all provocations, if there were any, arising at the time or before the killing." Appellant complains that said charge should have gone further and charged the jury that, in considering the question as to whether appellant was guilty of the offense of manslaughter, they would consider all the antecedent provocations, enumerating them, in passing upon the question as to whether his mind was capable of cool reflection. In other words, the charge should have applied the principles of law to the facts proven, and should have submitted to the jury the question as to whether or not the course of conduct of the deceased toward defendant's wife, coupled with what occurred at the time of the killing, was an adequate cause to reduce the homicide to manslaughter. It is never correct nor proper for a court to collate the facts. The charge was correct as far as it went.

The fourth ground of the motion complains because the court's charge on manslaughter did not pertinently and affirmatively charge on that phase of the case wherein the facts show that deceased, John Alkin, just before the shooting, asked defendant, Sam Young, if he wanted to know the truth, and defendant told him "Yes," when the deceased replied, "Well, then, I have had her, and I can get her again if I want her," upon which the defendant shot and killed deceased. That the court should have charged the jury that if they believed that the defendant prior to the killing had suspected adulterous relations between deceased and his (defendant's) wife, but was not possessed of sufficient information to make his mind sure of that fact, and in order to satisfy his mind as to the truth or falsity of said act, on the morning of the killing he sought out the deceased to inquire as to the truth or falsity of said matter, and that at said meeting with deceased the deceased used the language above referred to, and if such language produced in the mind of defendant sudden rage, anger, passion, or resentment, which rendered his mind incapable of cool reflection, and while in such state of mind he shot and killed deceased, he would be guilty of no higher grade of culpable homicide than manslaughter. In the case of Richardson v. State, 28 Tex. App. 222, 12 S. W. 872, in discussing a similar question to that raised by appellant, Chief Justice White of this court used the following language: "We are also of opinion that the charge of the court failed and omitted pertinently and affirmatively to instruct the jury upon that phase of the law of manslaughter which we have above indicated. Nowhere in the charge were the jury told what would be the law if defendant called deceased out, or went out on invitation of deceased, and then asked him concerning the insulting language, and deceased repeated the same in person to him, thereby offering a new insult." Then, on page 221 of 28 Tex. App., page 872 of 12 S. W., we find the following: "If defendant asked the deceased out of the house for the purpose of ascertaining from him whether or not he had used the insulting language about his mother, as he had been informed, and deceased, in reply to this question, stated that he had said and meant every word imputed to him, and the defendant, under the immediate influence of the sudden passion this insulting language aroused, slew him, he would only be guilty of manslaughter, provided the jury believed the passion was such as to inflame his mind, so as to render it incapable of cool reflection." The record in this case shows that defendant had been laboring for a year or more under the belief that deceased had been unduly intimate with his wife, but had not gone to the extent of wreaking his vengeance upon him for said act; but certainly he had many bases for his suspicions, as the record before us discloses, but when he had the same confirmed by the deceased's own declaration to him, he had absolute confirmation of his suspicions. Then, certainly, if the jury believed the statement of this fact to him rendered the appellant's mind incapable of cool reflection, he would not be guilty of any higher offense than manslaughter. This phase of the law was not given in the main charge of the court. For authorities on this question, see Tucker v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 50 S. W. 712; Bays v. State, 50 Tex. Cr. R. 548, 99 S. W. 562; Williams v. State, 24 Tex. App. 637, 7 S. W. 386; Paulin v. State, 21 Tex. App. 436, 1 S. W. 453; Maxwell v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 56 S. W. 62; Richardson v. State, 28 Tex. App. 216, 12 S. W. 872; and Eanes v. State, 10 Tex. App. 421.

For the error pointed out, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

HINMAN v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 28, 1908.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1084*)—ENTRY OF SENTENCE—TIME.

Code Cr. Proc. 1895, art. 837, provides that, on failure to enter judgment and pronounce sentence during the term, the judgment may be entered and sentence passed at any succeeding term, unless a new trial has been granted, or an appeal has been taken; and by article 884, an appeal suspends all further proceedings in the trial court until the judgment of the appellate court is received by it, but where, after notice of appeal, any part of the record has been lost, it may be substituted in the trial court, if it is then in session, but, if not, the court of appeals shall postpone the appeal until the next term, so that the record may be substituted. Accused was convicted of seduction, and a motion for a new trial was overruled, and notice of appeal given; but sentence was not passed until the following term of court. Held that, after notice of appeal, the trial court could not amend the record, except to substitute the record where a part of it had been lost, etc., so that the trial court could not pass sentence at the succeeding term.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2731; Dec. Dig. § 1084.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1023*)—APPEAL—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—NECESSITY OF SENTENCE.

A sentence is the final judgment, without which an appeal cannot be taken, except in capital cases.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2596; Dec. Dig. § 1023.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1017*)—APPEAL—APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

The Court of Criminal Appeals must decide the question of its own jurisdiction, and not the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1017.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1086*)—APPEAL—DISMISSAL.

An appeal in a criminal case will be dismissed, where the record contains no legal sentence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2769; Dec. Dig. § 1086.*]

Appeal from District Court, Eastland County; J. H. Calhoun, Judge.

Owen Hinman was convicted of seduction, and he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Scott & Brelsford and T. L. Hutchinson, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted at the August term, 1907, of the offense of seduction. Motion for a new trial was overruled, and notice of appeal given. On account of the sickness of the judge, or for some cause, sentence was not pronounced at that term of the court. Sentence was, however, at the following January term, passed upon appellant. Under this state of the case the question is: Had the court the legal authority to pass sentence when he did?

Under our statute and decisions this question must be answered in the negative. Article 837, Code Cr. Proc. 1895, reads as follows: "Where, from any cause whatever, there is a failure to enter judgment and pronounce sentence upon conviction during the term, the judgment may be entered and sentence pronounced at any succeeding term of the court, unless a new trial has been granted, or the judgment arrested, or an appeal has been taken." Article 884, Code Cr. Proc. 1895, provides: "The effect of an appeal is to suspend and arrest all further proceedings in the case in the court in which the conviction was had until the judgment of the appellate court is received by the court from which the appeal is taken; provided, that in cases where, after notice of appeal has been given, the record or any portion thereof is lost or destroyed, it may be substituted in the lower court, if said court be then in session, and when so substituted the transcript may be prepared and sent up as in other cases. In case the court from which the appeal was taken be not then in session, the court of appeals shall postpone the consideration of such appeal until the next term of said court from which said appeal was taken, and the said record shall be substituted at said term, as in other cases." This latter article has been construed in many decisions. These decisions hold that prior to the adoption of the above article, in cases where an appeal had been taken, the rule was that the appeal suspended all proceedings in the trial court, and it had no authority to amend or substitute the record. Since the enactment of the latter article, however, it has been held to mean that after notice of appeal has been given, and pending appeal to this court, the court in which the conviction occurred can take no further steps with reference to the case until this court has finally disposed of such appeal, except where some portion of the record has been lost or destroyed after the notice of appeal, in which case the lost or destroyed portion may be substituted.

Going back to article 837, supra, it has been held that where motion for new trial has been overruled, and notice of appeal given, but no entry of final judgment, a judgment subsequently entered nunc pro tunc is without authority and void. Estes v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 506, 43 S. W. 982. And such seems to be the holding and ruling in this state. A sentence under our procedure is the final judgment, and without that an appeal cannot be consummated, except in cases where the death penalty is inflicted. When the August term of the court adjourned, all power of the district judge over it ceased, except to substitute lost or destroyed records, as provided in article 884, supra. That court could in no manner amend the record or add to it, otherwise than stated. It was without power, pending the appeal to this court, to sentence, or to enter a judgment on the verdict even. The notice of appeal had attached the jurisdiction of this court, had ousted the jurisdiction of the trial court, and until this court has passed upon the appeal the trial court is without authority to enter a judgment or sentence.

It is true, legally speaking, that this court, without a sentence, would dismiss the appeal; but this court passes upon its jurisdiction, and not the trial court, and, as the statutes quoted have provided that the trial court is powerless under the circumstances to enter any judgments, or make any orders or decrees, any act of said court would be without authority. Finding the record in this condition, and no legal sentence in the record, it is the duty of this court to dismiss this appeal, with instructions to the trial court to enter a proper sentence at its next term of court.

The appeal is therefore dismissed.

NOBLE v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 28, 1908.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 291*)—CAUSE OF DEATH—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where decedent, injured by accused sticking a knife into his head, breaking the blade, and leaving a part thereof in the head, did not for several days consult physicians, and the physicians testified that the wound was not necessarily fatal, and that if they had reached decedent immediately after he received the wound, or within 24 hours thereafter, they could have saved his life, the court was required to charge the substance of Pen. Code 1895, arts. 651, 652, defining homicide, and that, unless decedent died from gross neglect or improper treatment, accused was guilty of some degree of homicide, while if gross neglect or improper treatment caused death the jury should find accused not guilty of homicide, but should consider whether he was guilty of assault with intent to murder or aggravated assault, defining such offenses.

2. HOMICIDE (§ 5*)—ACTS CONSTITUTING HOMICIDE—MISCONDUCT OF PERSON INJURED—IMPROPER TREATMENT OF PERSON INJURED.

Accused cannot be convicted of a homicide unless his act caused the same, and where decedent was negligent in caring for himself after receiving the injury, or where his physicians grossly mistreated him and caused death, accused is not responsible for the death.

Appeal from District Court, Mitchell County; James L. Shepherd, Judge.

Pat Noble was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Reversed, and cause remanded.

F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Appellant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and his punishment assessed at imprisonment for life.

The facts in substance show that appellant was sitting in a negro church, when the deceased entered same at the instance of the one having charge of the church, with instructions to turn the lights off at an ordinary electric switchboard. He did so. Appellant became enraged, turned the lights back on, and deceased returned and turned the lights off again. Thereupon appellant became enraged, and remarked to deceased, "It looks like you are trying to start something." Deceased said, "No, it looks like you are trying to start something." Thereupon appellant rushed at him and stuck a knife in his head an inch and three-sixteenths, and the blade was broken off, leaving that much of the knife in the side of deceased's head. This occurred on Friday night. Saturday deceased worked at the compress, and complained Saturday night and Sunday, and Monday became unconscious, and Tuesday morning physicians were sent for. They trepanned his head, cutting about an inch of the skull out and extracting the knife blade. The physicians testified that the wound was not necessarily fatal, and believed, if they could have reached deceased immediately after he received the wound, or within 24 hours thereafter, that he could have gotten well. They appeared in their testimony to somewhat contradict this statement, by stating that the wound caused deceased's death, since the same had begun to suppurate at the time they reached him on Tuesday. One of them testified that he did not know whether the wound was necessarily a fatal one or not; that wounds of that character do not usually prove fatal if they are looked after right in the beginning; and that he believed the deceased would have lived if the operation had been performed immediately before suppuration began. Then he used this language: "I think it was the wound that caused his death; but the fact that that blade was in there for so long, creating that pressure there, with no chance for drainage, caused the blood to flow to that part and produce suppuration." The doctors testify that the operation was done skillfully, and the utmost care used by them to preserve deceased's life. So, then, the matter relates back to the question as to whether or not the deceased himself was guilty of gross neglect.

On this question the court charged the jury as follows: "Although the injury which caused death might not, under other circumstances, have proved fatal, yet, if such injury be the cause of death, without it appearing that there has been any gross neglect, such as by some other person, such as deceased, it would be homicide. And if you believe from the evidence that Pat Noble stabbed the deceased with a knife, and inflicted upon him a wound which was not, in itself, necessarily mortal, and that the wound inflicted produced suppuration in the brain, or any other effect which resulted in the death of the deceased, the party inflicting the injury would be as guilty as if the wound was one which would of itself inevitably lead to death, unless it appears from the evidence that there was gross neglect by some other person, such as the deceased. You are instructed, also, that if the wound inflicted would not necessarily result in death, and it appears that there was gross neglect on the part of the deceased, it is not homicide in him who inflicts the first injury; but if the injury, though not necessarily fatal, or if said injury results in death, then it would amount to homicide, unless it appears that there has been gross neglect on the part of the deceased himself."

Appellant criticises this charge in his motion for new trial on the ground that the same is upon the weight of the evidence and is misleading, and is not the law applicable under the facts raising the issue as to whether or not deceased died of a wound inflicted by appellant or from his own neglect; that the jury, in this connection, should have had an affirmative instruction that if they believed from the evidence that the deceased was guilty of great neglect in not having and securing medical attention sooner, and that this neglect was the cause of his death, then they could find the defendant guilty of no higher offense than assault with intent to murder; further, that said charge is erroneous, in that it does not present this issue of the case in a manner so that a jury could intelligently pass upon the issue, and is more onerous than the law will allow, because the jury should have been told that, if they had a reasonable doubt as to whether or not death resulted from neglect or from the wound, the same should be resolved in favor of the defendant.

We do not think the charge is upon the weight of the evidence; but the same is not drawn as we understand the law to be, and clearly appellant's criticism is correct, wherein he says the court should have told the jury the defendant could not be guilty of any higher offense than assault to murder, if he was not the complete cause of the death of the deceased. The court should have charged articles 651 and 652 of the Penal Code of 1895. The court, after charging said articles, should have applied the law to the facts of the case, and told the jury that unless the deceased died from some gross neglect or manifest improper conduct of the person injured, or treatment of the deceased at the hands of the doctors, appellant would be guilty of some degree of homicide as defined in the charge; but if the gross neglect or manifest improper treatment of the physicians, or his own neglect, caused the death of deceased, or if the jury have a reasonable doubt of these facts, they should find the defendant not guilty of any degree of culpable homicide, but should then consider whether he is guilty of assault with intent to murder or aggravated assault. Then the charge should proceed, as it did, to define these offenses. But if the jury should believe that the acts of appellant were the direct cause of the death of deceased, and there was no improper treatment or neglect on his part or that of the doctor, then the jury would consider as to whether the defendant was guilty of some degree of culpable homicide. In other words, the defendant cannot be convicted of a homicide unless his act, agency, procurement, or culpable omission caused same. If the deceased is negligent in caring for himself after receiving injury, or if his physicians or others so grossly mistreat him as to cause his death, then the defendant is not responsible, under the law of this state, for the death of the deceased. The charge nowhere tells the jury what the defendant would be guilty of if deceased, through his own gross neglect, or his physicians', caused deceased's death; but the charge merely tells the jury that, if defendant's act did not kill deceased, he would not be guilty of homicide, and does not state what grade of offense he would be guilty of if he did not commit the homicide. See Morgan v. State, 16 Tex. App. 503. It follows, therefore, that the court's charge is erroneous, as is insisted upon by appellant.

Various criticisms are made of the court's charge and of the argument of the prosecuting attorney. Many of these arguments were not proper. In view of the reversal of the case on another matter, we do not deem it necessary to comment on same.

For the error discussed, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

HARVILLE v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 28, 1908.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 752½*)—DISMISSAL OF PROSECUTION.

Where, on motion of one of two persons jointly indicted, a severance had been granted, and he placed on trial first, and a motion to quash as against the other accused had been overruled, the district attorney could dismiss the case as against such other accused after the jury had been impeached to try the first.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 752½.*]

2. WITNESSES (§ 114*)—COMPETENCY—ACCOMPLICES.

The prosecution being dismissed as to one of two jointly indicted, the district attorney might properly tender her as a witness to the accused on trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 487; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 896*)—IMPEACHMENT—EVIDENCE IN REBUTTAL.

Where a prosecuting witness is shown by accused, on cross-examination of another witness, to have made statements out of court differing from his testimony at the trial, testimony of a witness for the state as to what the prosecuting witness had told him of the transaction is admissible, though accused was not present and the prosecuting witness was able to testify himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1261-1264; Dec. Dig. § 396.*]

4. WITNESSES (§ 54*)—EXAMINATION—QUESTIONS FORCING WIFE TO TESTIFY AGAINST HUSBAND.

In an incest case, a question asked a witness whether he had ever heard accused or any member of his family deny that the other party to the offense was accused's stepdaughter, the daughter of his wife, was improper, as indirectly forcing accused's wife to testify against him; she being a member of his family.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

5. INCEST (§ 14*)—EVIDENCE—RELATIONSHIP OF PARTIES—VALIDITY OF MARRIAGE—DEATH OF PREVIOUS HUSBAND.

In a prosecution for incest alleged to have been committed with the daughter of accused's wife by a former husband, divorce from or death of the first husband before the wife's second marriage being essential to conviction, affirmative proof is necessary, and the statement by a witness that he understood that the former husband was dead was inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Incest, Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 721½*)—TRIAL—CONDUCT OF PROSECUTOR—IMPROPER ARGUMENT.

Calling attention to the fact that accused had not called as a witness one jointly indicted with him, but against whom the prosecution had been dismissed, and asking the jury to consider the fact as a strong circumstance showing accused's guilt, is improper argument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1673; Dec. Dig. § 721½.*]

Appeal from District Court, Red River County; Ben H. Denton, Judge.

Frank Harville was convicted of incest, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

S. W. Harman and W. W. Johnson, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Appellant was convicted of incest, and his punishment assessed at imprisonment in the penitentiary for five years.

Appellant and Lela May Brotherton were jointly indicted for incest. Appellant asked for severance and was placed on trial. The case against Lela May Brotherton was dismissed. The facts in substance show that appellant and Lela May Brotherton were seen to leave the public road and go out into the river bottom by the prosecuting witness. His statement of the facts is as follows: "After they passed me there was some tree tops that had fallen, and the leaves were still green on the trees, and that put them out of my sight; and when I could see them again they were out of the buggy, and she walked up against a sapling, or pretty close to a sapling, and he pulled up her clothes, and it looked to me like, the best I could see, that he pulled out his male organ. I don't know that he had it out, only from the action that he made from that part of his body. After he went through those actions, as if taking out his organ, he went right up against her, the best I could tell about it, and placed the lower part of his body against the part of her body where the female organ would be,

and after he got in that position he was in motion like having intercourse with her. That is all I could say. Her clothes were still up at this time. I think I was some 50 or 60 yards from them; could have been closer or further. There was nothing between me and them to obstruct my view. Of course, it was heavy timber, but no undergrowth at that place. It was not very long that I saw him continue these motions. I think she saw me. It looked like she pushed him away from her, the best I could tell, and then she got in the buggy and just as quick as he could get himself in shape, from the way he was acting, he got in the buggy. His back was to me, and he was standing up, and he just bent himself over this way, and it seemed to me that he was working with his organ, and as quick as he could do that he got in the buggy and drove away, not very fast. Neither one of them took off their hats while I saw them. Frank Harville's back was to me at the time they were out of the buggy. It was not all the time. When they got out of the buggy, they were going from me, and of course his back was to me. I was something like 50 or 60 yards from them. I could not tell whether he had his privates out; only just from the actions led me to believe that he did. I never saw them. I never saw his pants unbuttoned, I just saw him acting like he was unbuttoning his pants. I could not say how much taller Frank is than the woman, because I have not measured them. The place that I saw them was supposed to be reasonably level ground. They were both standing up. The woman was some lower than the man, there may be a foot difference. I have not measured them. I don't know."

Bill No. 1 shows that after the jury was impaneled and the indictment read to them, but before introducing any testimony in the above case, the state, through her district attorney, asked the court to dismiss the case against Lela May Brotherton, who was indicted jointly with the defendant, and tendered the said Lela May Brotherton to the defendant as a witness in his behalf. Defendant objected to the dismissal of the case against Lela May Brotherton, because there was one case already pending before the court, and the jury impaneled in the trial of this case, and the court could not act upon another case at the same time; that there has been a motion to sever, and defendant's motion made before the court to quash the indictment against this party, and the court has seen fit to overrule both of those motions, and counsel for appellant asked a severance in the case, the court having forced them to ask for a severance by refusing to dismiss the case against her; because it is indirect allusion to a defendant's testimony before the jury in the case; because she is a defendant, and the counsel says that he tenders her to counsel for appellant as a witness, she being one of the defendants, who is charged in this case; and because it is an allusion to the defendant's right to testify or failure to testify. The bill is approved with this explanation: "That the defendant had filed a motion to sever, and it had been granted, and he was placed on trial first on his own motion." There was no error in the ruling of the court. Where two parties are jointly indicted, the district attorney, for proper cause and showing, can dismiss the case. There being no prosecution, it is not amiss to tender him or her to the appellant as a witness, if the appellant desires to use him.

Bill No. 2 shows that the district attorney asked O. M. Tubbs the following question, to wit: "When you first met Rosson in here on the day of the election, two years ago, I will ask you what he then told you as to who it was that he saw in this attitude down there on the creek?" Defendant objected to the question, because they have no right to prove what the witness said to other people in the absence of this defendant, when that witness is present to testify in the case. The objection was on the ground of hearsay. The district attorney then asked: "I will ask if it is not a fact that he told you about this when he first came into town, or soon after he got into town? A. Well, I do not know that it was soon after he got here. It was not very long. I never saw Mr. Criner until the next day. Mr. Rosson told me then that he thought that he knew this party by sight." The court appends this explanation: "The Court of Criminal Appeals will see, upon examination of the facts, that the defendant, upon cross-examination of Jno. Criner, proved that the witness had made different statements out of the court to what he did on the trial, and for this reason this testimony was admitted." Under the explanation of the court the ruling is correct.

Bill No. 3 shows that the state's attorney propounded to J. W. Westerman the following questions: "Now, did you ever hear Frank Harville or any member of his family deny this being the stepdaughter—daughter of his wife?" Defendant objected on the ground that same is hearsay, immaterial, and not pertinent to the issue in this case. This testimony should not have been admitted. It is indirectly forcing the wife to testify against the husband, since she certainly was a member of appellant's family. The state, under this statement, is permitted to prove that the wife never denied the fact that her daughter was appellant's stepdaughter.

Bill of exceptions No. 4 shows the state's counsel proved the following by J. W. Westerman: "Do you know the general understanding as to where Mrs. Brotherton's first husband died, and when he died?" Defendant objected to the question, because it would be hearsay. The court overruled the objection. The witness answered that "he was understood to be dead. I have heard Mrs. Harville state that he was dead." The defendant objected to any statement made by Mrs. Harville, because no statement made by the wife is admissible against the husband. All of which objections were overruled. The witness continued to answer as follows: "He died over at Mt. Vernon. Some fellow killed him. Mr. Harville has been living down in that country about ten years. I did not know Mrs. Brotherton before she married Mr. Harville." This bill is approved with this explanation: "No objection was made to the first answer in the bill; that is, 'I have heard Mrs. Harville state that he was dead.'" In the case of McGrew v. State, 13 Tex. App. 342, appears the following language: "Nowhere, however, is it made to appear that at the time of the second marriage the first had been annulled, either by divorce or by the death of the first husband. Upon this point the only evidence in the record is a statement in the testimony of Ann McGrew to the effect that 'my first husband died in Grimes county, as I understand.' From this statement it is extremely uncertain that the first husband is dead; and, if dead, did he die before or after her second marriage? If after, then the second marriage was a nullity, provided she had not been divorced from him, and she could not become the lawful wife of McGrew by virtue of such illegal marriage. If she was not his lawful wife, then the illicit connection of McGrew with her daughter by the previous marriage, however reprehensible in morals, would not constitute the crime of incest in law. Divorce from or the death of the first husband at the time of the second marriage should have been proven affirmatively, because absolutely essential to the establishment of the crime charged, and to the validity of a conviction under the circumstances stated." Clearly, under this authority, the ruling of the court was erroneous in permitting the witness to state that he understood that her former husband was dead.

Bill No. 5 complains that the district attorney commented upon the fact that appellant did not put Lela May Brotherton upon the stand, she having been indicted conjointly with her stepfather, the appellant, for the crime that appellant was being tried for, the district attorney having previously dismissed the case against her, and that the district attorney in his speech called on the jury to consider appellant's failure to put her on the stand, she being in attendance upon the trial, because it was a strong circumstance to show that he was guilty. The court appends to the bill the statement that no written charge was requested by appellant to be given to the jury to disregard such remarks. Upon another trial this argument should not be indulged.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

VANHOOSER v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 28, 1908.)

1. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 96*)—ASSAULT—INSTRUCTIONS.

The defense's testimony on a prosecution for assault on C., suggesting that there was no conspiracy between defendant and his son, but that all defendant did was in a peaceable manner after the son started the difficulty, defendant was entitled to an instruction that if he saw C. draw a knife and attempt to use it on the son, and did not go on the premises to raise a difficulty, and knew nothing of the son's intention to attack C., and all he did was to take the knife from C., he was not guilty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

2. WITNESSES (§ 303*)—IMPEACHMENT.

It being a circumstance indicating that there had been a previous understanding and agreement of an unlawful character between defendant and his son, if the son anticipated there would be trouble with C. at his house, and therefore followed his father there, it was permissible to impeach his testimony that he did not anticipate it by proving his contrary statements in justice court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1252-1257; Dec. Dig. § 303.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 304*)—RES GESTÆ.

It being the state's theory that defendant and his son were acting together, in which case he would be equally guilty with the son, it may be shown that the son, after his assault on C. in the house, ran him out of the house and chased him; this being part of the res gestæ, and it being a continuous fight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 810; Dec. Dig. § 364.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 364*)—RES GESTÆ.

Conspiracy between defendant and his son being asserted by the state on a prosecution for assault on C., testimony that just before the difficulty the son came and remarked to C., "C., I hear you are a bad man," and immediately assaulted him, and, on C. denying any claim to being a bad man, said, "It makes no difference; * * * they say you are a bad man," is admissible as part of the res gestæ.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 810, 813; Dec. Dig. § 364.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 364*)—RES GESTÆ.

Evidence that, after defendant's son and C. had gone away, defendant put his fist in the face of C.'s wife and otherwise used violence and insulting language to her, is not admissible as part of the res gestæ on a prosecution for assault on C., if the difficulty had then ended, though it was claimed defendant and his son were acting together.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 804, 816, 817; Dec. Dig. § 364.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 364*)—RES GESTÆ.

Evidence that, during the fight between C. and defendant's son, defendant hit C.'s wife, is admissible as part of the res gestæ on a prosecution for assault on C.; it being claimed defendant and his son were acting together, and the evidence showing they were all mixed up in a general row.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 810; Dec. Dig. § 364.*]

7. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 88*)—EVIDENCE—THREATS.

Testimony that C. sold his crop for less than it was worth, because advised that defendant would kill him if he remained on the place, is admissible on a prosecution for assault on C.; threats prior to a difficulty being always admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

8. ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 83*)—EVIDENCE—RELEVANCY.

Evidence that defendant and his son sometimes swear is irrelevant on a prosecution for assault, on which it is claimed defendant and his son acted together.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

Appeal from Jack County Court; Sil Stark, Judge.

John Vanhooser appeals from a conviction. Reversed and remanded.

Nicholson & Fitzgerald, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Appellant was convicted of an assault upon Jess Calihan, and his punishment assessed at a fine of $25.

Jess Calihan was renting land from appellant. Appellant became dissatisfied with his tenancy and intended to make an effort through the courts to dispossess Calihan of the place so rented. Prior to doing so, however, appellant, in company with his wife and one Jap Hill, went to Calihan's house with a wagon load of household effects, with a buggy trailing to the wagon. Appellant walked to the edge of the porch of the house occupied by Calihan, and asked Calihan if the door to the room which contained his things was locked, and he told him it was. Witness further testifies: "He then asked me to open it, as he wished to get some things out of the room. I got up and went into the house, got the key, went through the room, and opened the door. When I opened the door, defendant came into the house, and then I saw Vester Vanhooser come into the house, and as he reached the door he remarked to me, 'Calihan, they tell me you are a bad man.' I said, 'No, I don't fess to be a bad man.' Vester Vanhooser then grabbed my shirt collar and tore my shirt. I told him that I did not want any trouble, and begged him not to bother me; but he kept on fighting me, and said 'It makes no difference; they tell me you are a bad man, and I am a bad man, too.' About this time the defendant run in and took my knife out of my pocket. My wife had hold of defendant, and Vester Vanhooser had hold of my arms, holding me with his arms around my shoulders. I was standing by the side of the door facing that leads into the room in which me and my wife had our bed, and when defendant got my knife he turned me loose, and my wife grabbed hold of Vester Vanhooser, and we scuffled until we went into our room and fell across the bed. Vester Vanhooser was on top of me, and my wife had hold of him, trying to get him loose from me, and while we were on the bed in this shape Vester called for some one to take the woman away, saying that he would fix the bad man. I was begging all the time for them not to hurt me. Defendant started to pull off my wife; but Jap Hill stopped him, and told him to stand back. Finally we scuffled to the edge of the bed, and Jap Hill caught hold of me and pulled me up and away from Vester Vanhooser, and I told Jap Hill to let me go. He asked me if I would run if he would let me go, and I said I would, and he turned me loose, and I run out of the house, and Jap Hill and Vester Vanhooser went out after me; Vester Vanhooser trying to catch me. I ran out, and jumped over the fence, and went off to my father-in-law's house." The above is the state's case. The defense's evidence shows that appellant took the knife out of the prosecuting witness' hand. In addition to the above testimony for the state, the evidence clearly suggests that the father and son were acting together in the assault upon Calihan. Whether this be true or not is a question of fact for the jury. The defense denies this.

The record does not contain any general charge of the court. We therefore presume that, if any charge was given by the court, it was a verbal one. Appellant asked the court to instruct the jury as follows: "You are instructed that if you find and believe from the evidence in this case that John Vanhooser, upon or about the 25th day of March, 1906, at his place in Jack county, Texas, saw Jess Calihan draw a knife from his pocket and attempt to use the same on Vester Vanhooser, the son of defendant, and you further find that defendant did not go on said premises for the purpose of raising a difficulty, and knew nothing of any intention on the part of Vester Vanhooser to unlawfully attack Jess Calihan, and you further find and believe that all the defendant, John Vanhooser, did on said date was to take away from Jess Calihan said knife, you will find defendant not guilty." The defense's testimony suggests that there was no conspiracy or acting together on the part of father and son whatever, and that all appellant did was to go in a peaceable manner after some household effects, and the son started the difficulty. If this is true, and all appellant did was to take the knife away from the party who was attempting to cut his son, certainly he would not be guilty of any offense, and the court should have so charged.

Bill of exceptions No. 1 shows that the state propounded the question to Vester Vanhooser and he answered as follows: That he did not swear that he turned around and went back to the premises where the fight between himself and Jess Calihan occurred, and did not go on to feed his steers; that the reason he went back was because he anticipated some trouble. Bill No. 2 shows that the state proved by G. R. Moore that Vester Vanhooser did swear in the justice court that he met the prosecuting witness, Jess Calihan, and his wife, between the John Vanhooser place and Baker's; that he turned and went back because he was expecting some trouble. This testimony, as embodied in the two bills, was admissible. If Vester Vanhooser was anticipating trouble, it is a circumstance to indicate that there had been a previous understanding and agreement of unlawful character between himself and his father, and it is permissible to impeach his testimony, indicating that he did not so understand, by proving contrary statements made in the justice court.

Bill No. 5 shows the state was permitted to prove by Jess Calihan that on the occasion in question Vester Vanhooser assaulted him and ran him out of his house and chased him over the fence. This testimony was part of the res gestæ. It was one continued fight. Of course, appellant, if not participating in same, under a proper charge of the court, would not be convicted by the jury; but the state's theory was and is that he and his son were acting together. If they were, he would be equally guilty with his son.

Bill No. 6 shows that the state proved by Mrs. Vina Calihan that just prior to the difficulty Vester Vanhooser came in at the door and remarked to her husband, "Calihan I hear that you are a bad man," and immediately assaulted him by taking hold of his shirt collar, and further, "It makes no difference, by God; they say you are a bad man." This testimony was also part of the res gestæ.

Bill No. 7 shows the state proved by Vina Calihan that, after Jess Calihan and Vester Vanhooser had left the house and place, the defendant, John Vanhooser, popped his fist in her face and said, "What are you acting a God damn fool about this place for?" Appellant objected, for the reason that said testimony was not relevant and material to the state's charge in this case, and no part of the res gestæ. Certainly, if the difficulty had ended, and appellant used the insulting language to the prosecuting witness' wife as contained in this bill, it would not be a part of the res gestæ, and ought not to be admitted.

Bill No. 8 shows that Vina Calihan was permitted to testify that during the fight between her husband and Vester Vanhooser the defendant hit her in her side. Certainly, if defendant hit Calihan's wife in the side during the fight between Vester Vanhooser and the prosecuting witness, Jess Calihan, this testimony would be admissible as part of the res gestæ, since the evidence shows they were all mixed up in a general row.

Bill No. 10 shows that the state was permitted to prove by Jess Calihan that he sold his crop for less than it was worth, because he was advised that defendant would kill him if he remained on the place. This testimony was admissible. Threats prior to the time a difficulty occurs are always admissible.

Bill No. 11 shows that Vina Calihan, while on the stand, testified that, after Jess Calihan and Vester Vanhooser had run away from the place, John Vanhooser, appellant, caught hold of her and shook her until her dress fell off of her in the floor, and that she went away from the place without any dress on. As stated above, if the difficulty between appellant's son and Jess Calihan had ended, and appellant used any violence to the person of Calihan's wife, this testimony would not be admissible in the trial of the case for assault on Calihan prior to said time. Of course, if it occurred contemporaneous with the assault on Calihan, it would be admissible.

Bill No. 12 shows the state proved by Vester Vanhooser that he and his father sometimes swear. We see no relevancy of this testimony in the trial of the case for assaulting Calihan.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

ASKEW v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 28, 1908.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1115*)—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE.

A bill of exceptions, so framed as not to show whether the district attorney or counsel for accused first opened on the examination of jurors the question whether they had heard of the previous trials of the case, one of which resulted in a hung jury, fails to present for review the question whether the district attorney erred in making such inquiries from the jurors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2927; Dec. Dig. § 1115.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1171*)—TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

The misconduct of the district attorney, when his questions to accused on cross-examination as to whether absent witnesses had not on a previous trial testified that he shot decedent were excluded, in arguing to the jury that such absent witnesses had testified on a former trial that accused shot decedent, was reversible error, where the court refused to withdraw the remarks from the jury and instruct them not to consider them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1171.*]

Appeal from District Court, Hopkins County; R. L. Porter, Judge.

Frank Askew was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

C. E. Sheppard, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. This is the second appeal of this case; the former appeal being found in

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes

47 Tex. Cr. R. 362, 83 S. W. 706. It is there reported as Frank Asken v. State. The evidence on the trial which resulted in this conviction is different, to a very considerable extent, from that on the former appeal. Quite a number of criticisms are urged against the charge in regard to manslaughter and self-defense. A careful review of these charges we think, sufficiently present the law of the case, so that appellant was not injured.

Exception was reserved to the manner of examining the jurors on their voir dire by the district attorney. The particular point is that the district attorney asked them if they had heard the previous trials, one of which resulted in a hung jury. In his qualification the district judge says that the defendant's counsel asked many questions of the jurors in regard to their knowledge of the former trials. The bill is so framed that it is practically impossible for this court to understand exactly who brought about these questions. If the defendant's attorney first opened up the matter in his examination of the jurors, he cannot complain. If the district attorney did so, then, of course, defendant had the right to probe that matter. So we say, as the bill is presented, it leaves us in doubt as to who first interrogated the jurors. Examination of the qualification of jurors can be ascertained without allusion to former trials.

Appellant reserved two bills of exceptions in regard to the conduct of the district attorney. The first relates to his manner of examining the defendant while testifying in his own behalf. The bill recites that the district attorney questioned the defendant as follows: "Walter and Arthur Lewis, who testified upon the former trial of this case, were cousins of yours, were they not?" To which the defendant replied, "Yes. Q. You were here in court, and heard them testify against you at a former trial of this case? A. Yes, sir. Q. Is it not a fact that they, your cousins, each testified upon a former trial of this case in this court in your presence and hearing that you shot the deceased in the back while he was running from you, and did they not also testify that after the shooting that you cut your own clothes and hat and then took the knife and put it down by the deceased's hand? And is it not a fact that you heard Walter Lewis and Arthur Lewis both testify upon the former trial of this case to all of these facts?" Appellant urged various objections, which were sustained by the court in so far as answers were concerned. The further exception was reserved that it was material error to permit the district attorney to ask such questions. The other bill refers to the same subject-matter, and came out in the district attorney's argument as follows: "If the defendant's counsel are so honest and are always so fair in their cases, and if they wanted you to know the whole truth, and wanted to be fair in this case, why did they object to the defendant testifying as to what his cousins, Walter and Arthur Lewis, had testified to upon a former trial of this case, as to his having cut his own clothes and hat, and then putting the knife down by the hand of the deceased after so doing; and if they are so honest, why were they not willing for all the facts to be known to you, and why did they object to this defendant telling you as to what his own cousins had testified to as to how he shot and killed the deceased and what he did after he so shot and killed him?"

Various objections were urged to this argument, among other things, that it was improper, prejudicial, and calculated to inflame the minds of the jury against the defendant, and was a discussion of facts not admitted in evidence by the court and that had been by the rulings of the court rejected as evidence. The court explains this bill by stating that the defendant's counsel in their arguments to the jury had stated that the district attorney objected to certain evidence offered by defendant, but so far as they were concerned they were willing to turn on the light and let everything in; that they wanted to be fair and honest with the jury, and desired that they know everything in connection with the whole case, and the above remarks complained of by the defendant were provoked by the argument of defendant's counsel. What these remarks were of defendant's counsel is not shown; but by reference to another bill in regard to the absence of a witness named McLure, whose testimony they sought to have reproduced before the jury, we are led to believe that defendant's counsel referred to the action of the court in refusing to permit them to introduce McLure's testimony stenographically reported. Be this as it may, the two bills reserved by appellant to the examination of the defendant in regard to what the two absent witnesses, his cousins, had stated on a previous trial in connection with the statement by the district attorney as to what they would have sworn, constitutes such error and injury as should cause this judgment to be reversed. There was a direct reference and statement to the fact that there had been a former trial. There was an attempt to get before the jury the testimony of the two absent witnesses, relatives of appellant, showing that he had manufactured a defense, which was refused by the court, but placed before the jury by the statements of the district attorney over the rulings of the court. The court was requested to withdraw these remarks from the jury and instruct them not to consider same, but this was refused by the court. The statements of the district attorney to the jury as to what these witnesses would have sworn was clearly outside of the record, was not justified as evidence, and if it had been admitted through the mouth of the witness with objections reserved, it would have been clearly reversible error. Certainly it would not take any reasoning to show that it would be error for a district attorney to state as facts before a jury such matters as he could not and would not be permitted to introduce as evidence. This court has been a little cautious about reversing cases on arguments, but the court has not considered it right to affirm cases in the face of such arguments and statements as detailed in this bill of exceptions. If the prosecution will continue to transgress legal rules in trials of cases, it will force this court to reverse judgments of conviction. Accused parties are entitled to fair trial.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

SMITH v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. June 17, 1908. Rehearing Denied Oct. 21, 1908.)

1. STATUTES (§ 71*)—"GENERAL LAWS."

Under Const. art. 3, § 56, prohibiting local or special laws as to certain enumerated matters and in other cases where a general law can be made applicable, a general law need not be one general to the extent that it has a uniform operation throughout the state, but simply that in its nature and character it should apply equally to all persons within the territorial limits describing it, and is one whose operation is equal in its effect on all persons or things on which the law is designed to operate at all.

2. STATUTES (§ 77*)—"SPECIAL LAWS."

A statute which relates to particular persons or things of a class is special, and comes within the Const. art. 3, § 56, prohibiting special laws as to certain matters and in other cases where a general law can be made applicable.

3. STATUTES (§ 85*)—"LOCAL LAWS"—"GENERAL LAW."

Acts 30th Leg. (Laws 1907, p. 269, c. 139) providing for the drawing of jurors in counties having a city or cities containing a population aggregating 30,000 or more according to a census, is a general law within the Const. art. 3, § 56, prohibiting the passage of any local or special law regulating the summoning of jurors, though the act contains no clause authorizing other cities to come within its provisions, and though the act differs from the jury law applicable to the rest of the state.

Davidson, P. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Criminal District Court, Dallas County; W. W. Nelms, Judge.

Bob Smith was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. S. Baskett, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

BROOKS, J. Appellant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and his punishment assessed at death.

There is no statement of facts in the record. In the absence of statement of facts, none of the bills of exception can be considered save and except bill of exceptions No. 1. This bill presents the constitutionality of the law authorizing the organization of juries by drawing their names from a wheel, which law was passed by the Thirtieth Legislature (Laws 1907, p. 269, c. 139); appellant insisting that said law is a local or special law. However, in deference to the fact that this question is presented to this court for adjudication in various cases, we will state what we deem all of the objections to said law as urged in each of the cases in passing upon the validity thereof in this case.

The following are the objections to the constitutionality of said act:

"(1) Said act of the Thirtieth Legislature under which same was drawn is unconstitutional and void. The ground of said motion in support of the unconstitutionality of said law being, in substance, as follows:

"(2) That said act of the Legislature was a special law, and violative of section 56, art. 3, of the Constitution, which inhibits the enactment of any local or special law touching the summoning or impaneling of grand and petit jurors.

"(3) That said law is unconstitutional, in that the names of jurors for jury duty are listed for a period of two years, and excludes from jury duty all other qualified jurors who may become of age or acquire the right to serve upon the jury, and denies to the litigant the right to select his triors from the qualified jurors of the county, and further exempts from jury duty in capital cases all qualified jurors who have served as much as four days within said two years provided by said law.

"(4) That said law is further unconstitutional, in that it is discriminatory, and made applicable only to counties having cities aggregating 20,000 in population according to the census of 1900, and thereby limits and restricts the operation of said law to counties of a class, and excludes from the operation of said law counties as a class that may hereafter or now have cities aggregating twenty thousand in population. Said law limits its operation to said counties possessing said qualifications named, and the census of 1900 excludes all others and applies to them a different law. * * *

"(5) Said law is further unconstitutional, in that it repeals the existing jury law as to such counties having cities aggregating twenty thousand population under the census of 1900, and otherwise leaves that law operative in all other counties. That said partial repeal is unconstitutional and void, and, further, said law revives the repealed law under the contingencies provided in said act, and, further, under said act delegates to the judge within said counties where said law is operative the discriminatory power under the conditions in said law named, to suspend the act of the Thirtieth Legislature and revive the old law as to such judge or court, and said law is violative of section 56, art. 3, of the Constitution, and section 28 of the Bill of Rights.

"(6) That said act is not in accordance with due process of the law of the land, and is violative of section 19 of the Bill of Rights.

"(7) That said law is not equal and uniform, and is discriminatory, and is violative of the Constitution of the United States in section 1, art. 14, thereof."

To support appellant's contention under the above grounds to quash the venire, he cites us to section 56, art. 3, Const., which provides: "The Legislature shall not, except as otherwise provided in this Constitution, pass any local or special law authorizing 'the summoning or impaneling of grand or petit juries.'" Section 56 of article 3 of the Constitution of this state reads as follows: "The Legislature shall not, except as otherwise provided in this Constitution, pass any local or special law, authorizing—First, the creation, extension or impairing of liens; regulating the affairs of counties, cities, towns, wards or school districts," etc., and then, among other things, "summoning or impaneling grand or petit juries." Various other matters and things are enumerated, and the Legislature inhibited from passing any special or local law applicable to any of said things. Then immediately follows this clause: "And in all cases where a general law can be made applicable, no local or special law shall be enacted." Then section 56, art. 3, Const., reads as follows: "No local or special law shall be passed, unless notice of the intention to apply therefor, shall have been published in the locality where the matter or thing to be affected may be situated, which notice shall state the substance of the contemplated law, and shall be published at least thirty days prior to the introduction into the Legislature of such bill and in the manner to be provided by law. The evidence of such notice having been published shall be exhibited in the Legislature before such act shall be passed."

Under this last cited article of the Constitution, various special laws have been passed. It will be noticed from the terms of the last cited section that the same to a large extent defines what a local or special law is, in that it stipulates that notice of the intention to apply therefore shall have been published in the locality where the matter or thing to be affected may be situated. If one, therefore, proposes to legislate on a matter or particular thing, then it is under the terms of this section of the Constitution a local or special law; but, if the legislation applies equally to all persons within the territorial limits describing it, it becomes a general, as contradistinguished from a special, law. Cordova v. State, 6 Tex. App. 206; Davis v. State, 2 Tex. App. 430. In the case of Lastro v. State, 3 Tex. App. 363, this court held that the stock law of 1876 was not a local law because it exempted many counties. Nor is an act changing and fixing the term of the district courts a local law. See Cordova v. State, supra. In the case of Oox v. State, 8 Tex. App. 255, 34 Am. Rep. 746, and others, the insistence was made that an act prescribing the time for holding the district court in the Twenty-Second judicial district was unconstitutional on the ground that same is a local law, and not a general law. After quoting from the case of Orr v. Rhine, in 45 Tex. 345, this court then proceeds to discuss the question in the following language: "Turning to the Constitution, we find enumerated in the fifty-sixth section of article 3 the subjects upon which the Legislature is restricted from passing any local or special laws, and laws changing the times of and terms for holding courts are not mentioned amongst the subjects therein prohibited. If such laws are at all embraced in that section, it can only be under the general language of the last paragraph, where it is declared that 'in all other cases where a general law can be made applicable no local or special law shall be enacted.' Section 56, art. 3, provides for and prescribes the rules to be observed and the forms necessary to be followed in all cases where local or special laws are desired and their passage is expressly prohibited, unless these forms are pursued. We take it that this latter section (56) relates more especially to that class of legislation which seeks the adjudication of private matters, in which the general public is not supposed to be concerned. Mr. Bouvier defines such acts to be 'those which operate only upon particular persons and private concerns,' whilst he defines general or public acts to be 'those which bind the whole community.' 'Of these,' he says, 'the courts take judicial cognizance.' To our minds it is evident the framers of our Constitution intended by the use of the phrase 'general act,' not that such acts should be general to the extent that they should have a uniform operation throughout the state, but simply that in its nature, character, and passage such law could be enacted, as any general law might be, without going through the forms and complying with the requisites prescribed for local or special laws by the fifty-sixth section of article 3. To illustrate the idea: As we have seen, the seventh section of article 5 expressly says: 'The Legislature shall have power by a general act to authorize the holding of special terms of the district court in any county for the dispatch of business.' A special term for such purpose in but one county could not in the nature of things have a uniform operation throughout the state; and it would be an absurdity to hold that it was necessary in such a case, or could ever have been intended, that the general act by which such a purpose or object might be accomplished should include and embrace within the range and scope of its provisions the 150 or 200 other counties in the state that could have no possible interest in the subject-matter. Technically speaking, an act to hold a special term in a particular county would appear to be both a special and a local law. Doubtless the intention was that in the passage of such an act the same forms were to be observed as in any other ordinary general act, as contradistinguished from those essential to the validity of local or special laws. Any other construction, it seems to us, would make the expression 'general act' not only contradictory of the provision, but unintelligible in its meaning." Further along in said opinion it is stated that: "A general law is one whose operation is equal in its effect upon all persons or things upon which the law is designed to operate at all. All laws operate upon persons or things. Are we, then, to understand that a general law is only one which operates upon all persons or upon all things? If so, it is obvious that our general laws are very few, if, indeed, there are any of that class. Obviously such cannot be the meaning of the words 'of a general nature' as here used. The word 'general' comes from 'genus,' and relates to a whole genus or kind; or, in other words, to a whole class or order. Hence a law which affects a class of persons or things, less than all, may be a general law"—citing Brooks v. Hyde, 37 Cal. 366. Then the court goes on, and holds that the act providing for five annual terms in Bexar county was intended to form part of the general machinery to be used in the administration of the laws of the state, affecting equally the whole citizenship of the state which came within its range; and, being such, it cannot be considered either special or local in the view contemplated by the Constitution; citing, among other cases, the case of Bohl v. State, 3 Tex. App. 685.

In the case of Clark v. Finley, 93 Tex. 171, 54 S. W. 343, Chief Justice Gaines in delivering the opinion of the court says: "A law is not special because it does not apply to all persons or things alike. Indeed, most of our laws apply to some one or more classes of persons or of things and exclude all others. Such are laws as to the rights of infants, married women, corporations, carriers, etc. Indeed, it is perhaps the exception when a statute is found which applies to every person or thing alike. Hence it cannot be that the statute under consideration is special merely because it is made to operate in some counties of the state and not in others. The definition of a general law, as distinguished from a special law, given by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in the case of Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 338, and approved by the Supreme Court of Missouri, is perhaps as accurate as any that has been given. State v. Tolle, 71 Mo. 645. The court in the former case say: 'Without entering at large upon the discussion of what is here meant by a "local or special law," it is sufficient to say that a statute which relates to persons or things as a class is a general law, while a statute which relates to particular persons or things of a class is special, and comes within the constitutional prohibition.' The law in question is applicable to every county of the designated class. Now, we do not propose to be led off into any extended discussion as to what is a proper class for the application of a general law. The tendency of the recent decisions upon the subject, as it seems to us, is to drift into refinements that are rather more specious than profitable. It is said in some of the cases that the classification must be reasonable; in others, that it must not be unreasonable or arbitrary, etc. If it is meant by this that the Legislature cannot evade the prohibition of the Constitution as to special laws by making a law applicable to a pretended class, which is, in fact, no class, we concur in the proposition. Such was the law passed upon in the case of Commonwealth v. Patton, 88 Pa. 258. That statute was made applicable to all counties in which there was a population of more than 60,000, and an incorporated city with a population exceeding 8,000, 'situate at a distance from the county seat of more than twenty-seven miles by the usually traveled public road.' There was but one city in the state which came within the pretended class. The court held this a covert attempt at special legislation, and that the act was a nullity. * * * To what class or classes of persons or things a statute should apply is as a general rule a legislative question. When the intent of the Legislature is clear, the policy of the law is a matter which does not concern the courts. A Legislature may reach the conclusion that the compensation of certain officers in certain counties of the state is excessive, while in others it is not more than enough. By the reduction of the fees of office throughout the state they may correct the evil in those in which the compensation is too great, but they would probably inflict a greater evil by making the compensation too small in all the others. In such a case it becomes necessary to make the law applicable to some, and not to all. There must be a classification. That classification may be either by population or by taxable values. One Legislature might do, as the Legislature of Texas did, make the classification by population; another, as was done by the Legislature of Arizona, might make the taxable values of the respective counties the basis of the classification. Shall the courts inquire which is correct? Can they say that the work of an officer is not in some degree proportionate to the population of his county? On the other hand, can they say that, the more the property of a county, the more the crime? To ask these questions is to make it apparent that they are questions of policy, determinable by the political department of the government, and not questions the determination of which by the Legislature is subject to review by the courts. Therefore, should we adopt the rule that, in order to make an act a general law, the classification adopted should be reasonable, we should still be constrained to hold the statute in question a general law, and valid, under our Constitution; for we cannot say that the classification is unreasonable. It may be, as urged in the argument, that there are counties in the class to which the law is made applicable the population of which very slightly exceeds that of other counties which are without it, and that it seems unreasonable to make a discrimination upon so slight a difference. To this the answer is: The line must be drawn somewhere, and that a similar difficulty would probably result if the classification were made upon any other basis. Exact equality in such matters, however desirable, is practically unattainable."

The jury law in this state provides that same shall apply only to counties having cities aggregating twenty thousand in population according to the census of 1900. This is nothing but a rational classification warranted by the Constitution, and is not a local or special law within the contemplation of the constitutional clause under consideration. The only difference between the jury law under consideration and the fee bill that was passed on in the Clark v. Finley Case, supra, is the fact that the jury law makes no provision for counties having the requisite population thereafter to come within its provisions, whereas the fee bill does, but a careful perusal of the Clark v. Finley Case will show that the court did not attempt to say nor do they intimate that the opinion of the court in that case was based, as appellant insists, upon the clause authorizing other counties each recurring four years to come within its provisions. In fact, to have so held would have been non sequitur. That is to say, there would have been no rational reason for holding that the fee bill was a general law, and not a special law, because it provided that other counties might come within its provisions each recurring four years. This provision would make it no less a general law, and no more a special law. If appellant's insistence in this case is correct, then the Legislature cannot name a classification and pass a general law that would be constitutional at all. Suppose the jury law had provided that a county having a population of 20,000 according to the census of 1900 should be under its provisions, and counties that thereafter according to each recurring census having a city of said population should be within its provisions, then we would have had this condition: For 10 years many counties, or some counties at least, would have a city of said population before the expiration of the 10 years, and yet said counties would not be within the terms of the jury law. The Legislature had a right to use its own yardstick, its own basis for classification, and, as indicated in the Clark v. Finley Case, supra, it is a matter of legislative, and not of judicial, discretion as to what the classification shall be. If we were to assume to pass on this character of question, we would be usurping the legislative discretion in order to render invalid a statute. The Legislature desired to fix a special mode of selecting juries in certain cities. In order to do so, they had to classify the cities on some basis. We are not apprised of but two bases upon which they could predicate the classification, either the taxable value of the city or the number of people that live within it, and the mere fact that they did not provide that cities hereafter that have said population may come within its provisions is a matter of legislative policy that does not in any degree affect the constitutionality of the act. So to our minds, for all practical purposes, we think the Clark v. Finley Case, above cited, is decisive of this question. However, appellant has cited us to a long line of authorities which he claims hold adversely to our decision in the case, as follows: 1 Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction, § 200; City of Topeka v. Gillett, 32 Kan. 431, 4 Pac. 800; Dunne v. Kansas City Cable Railway Co., 131 Mo. 1, 32 S. W. 641; State v. Herrmann, 75 Mo. 354; State v. Wofford, 121 Mo. 61, 25 S. W. 851; State v. County Court, 89 Mo. 237, 1 S. W. 307; Smith v. Grayson County, 18 Tex. Civ. App. 153, 44 S. W. 921; Young v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. App. 366, 102 S. W. 118; Holly v. State, 14 Tex. App. 514; Cordova v. State, 6 Tex. App. 220; Davis v. State, 2 Tex. App. 425; Orr v. Rhine, 45 Tex. 352; Cox et al. v. State, 8 Tex. App. 254, 286, 289, 34 Am. Rep. 746; Womack v. Womack, 17 Tex. 1; Graves v. State, 6 Tex. Cr. App. 234; Gonzales County v. Houston (Tex. Civ. App.) 81 S. W. 118; Ellis v. Ft. Bend County, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 506, 74 S. W. 45; Flewellen v. Ft. Bend County, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 155, 42 S. W. 775; Hill County v. Atchison (Tex. Civ. App.) 49 S. W. 144; Coombs v. Block, 130 Mo. 668, 32 S. W. 1139; Glover v. Meinrath, 133 Mo. 292, 34 S. W. 72; McMahon v. Pac. Ex., 132 Mo. 641, 34 S. W. 479; Dallas v. Elec. Co., 83 Tex. 243, 18 S. W. 552; 1 Lewis' Sutherland, Con. Stat. § 203; Murray v. Bd. Co. Commissioners, 51 Minn. 359, 84 N. W. 103, 51 L. R. A. 828, 83 Am. St. Rep. 379.

The lateness of this term and the enormous length that an opinion would necessarily reach to take up seriatim all of the authorities that appellant has cited or any of them would make it entirely too long. We candidly concede that the authorities on the question as to what is a special or local law differ nearly as widely as the number of decisions that have been rendered. We also readily concede that many of the authorities cited by appellant above hold that the act in question is unconstitutional because of the fact that there is no "enabling clause" in the jury law whereby other counties can come within the provisions of said jury law. On the contrary, however, we have found several decisions that combat this position and they appear to us more in consonance with reason, and enunciate more clearly the distinction between a general and a special law than any that appellant has cited above. In the case of Elkin v. Moir, 199 Pa. 534, 49 Atl. 351, 53 L. R. A. 837, 85 Am. St. Rep. 801, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania held that a statute for the government of cities based upon classification cannot be held unconstitutional as local or special, although it was intended, and the classification made, so as to apply to only a limited number of existing cities; furthermore, that such an act was not unconstitutional because it provides for methods of government and administration different from those required in the other classes, in particulars where there is no real difference, if the classification is made with reference to municipal, and not to irrelevant or wholly local, matters. The court further says that the courts have nothing to do with its wisdom, propriety, or justice, or with the motives which are supposed to have inspired the passage of the act; that it is a matter of legislative and political policy addressed to the discretion of the Legislature. Furthermore, in said case the court, among other things, used the following language in quoting from Pittsburgh's Petition, 138 Pa. 401, 21 Atl. 757, 759, 761, as follows: "It was urged that certain sections of the act then in question made the act local 'by fixing dates at which acts necessary to put the government in operation are to be done,' which were possible only to one city, the city of Pittsburgh, and which are impossible to the city of Allegheny, which has come into the class since the act was passed. The reply to this objection is that at the date when the act became a law there was but one city in the second class. The provisions of the act were general in their character. They related to all cities of the second class. If there had been several such cities, the terms employed would have applied to all alike. It was necessary, in order to give effect to the change in the system of municipal government, that a definite time should be fixed upon at which the change should take place and the new system be put in operation. The trouble with the act is not that it made such provisions for cities then entitled to a place in the second class, but that it did not also make similar provisions for cities that should thereafter be entitled to come into the class. We cannot hold, however, that the failure to provide a date for the organization of cities afterwards to come into the class deprives such cities of the benefit of the law, or renders it local, and so inoperative, in the cities to which it would otherwise be applicable." This authority is one of the most elaborate and best considered decisions that we have had access to, and the last proposition cited therefrom conclusively answers the insistence of appellant that the jury law is unconstitutional because it has no enabling clause whereby other cities may come under the jury law. The court here very explicitly held that it is a general law, although it applies to certain cities and does not apply to others, nor is it rendered invalid by failing to provide that others may come within the provisions of the law. In the case of Cook v. State, 90 Tenn. 407, 16 S. W. 471, 13 L. R. A. 183, the court held that the Dortch law is not unconstitutional as class legislation by reason of the fact that it is confined in its operation to counties having 70,000 inhabitants and to cities having 9,000 inhabitants computed by the federal census of 1880, or that should have such number of inhabitants by any subsequent federal census. In said case the court holds that the Legislature is the judge of the means to be adopted and their necessity when it comes to classification of cities. That the power to regulate and reform the right of franchise in said cities is in said Legislature. They are presumed to know the conditions and wants of the state.

In the case of State of Iowa v. Forkner, 94 Iowa, 1, 62 N. W. 772, 28 L. R. A. 206, the law was held not to be a local or special law that provided for a different mode and method of regulating the sale of whisky for certain cities from that provided in cities of a different class. In the case of Caven v. Coleman, 96 S. W. 774, Judge Talbot of the Fifth Court of Civil Appeals of Texas in passing upon the act of the Twenty-fifth Legislature which required every city having underground sewers to create a board for the examination of plumbers with authority to issue licenses to plumbers who would pass a regular examination therefor, and from prohibiting any person from conducting the business of plumbing until he or they shall have passed the required examination, held that said act was constitutional. The rule there in reference to local or special laws is very tersely stated as follows: "We think it well settled that a statute which selects particular individuals from a class and imposes upon them special obligations or burdens from which others in the same class are exempt is unconstitutional; but such is not in our opinion the character of the statute under consideration." In this last cited case we have a statute under consideration held valid by the court wherein it was provided that cities having underground sewers at the time of the passage of the law should have licensed plumbers. There is no provision in the act authorizing other cities to come within its provisions, but the act applies to all cities that then had underground sewerage. This case, we take it, is also in point on the jury law now under consideration. See, also, State v. Barrett, 138 N. C. 630, 50 S. E. 506, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 626. In the case of Douglas v. People, 225 Ill. 536, 80 N. E. 841, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1116, 116 Am. St. Rep. 162, the court held that a law requiring all engaged in the plumbing business in municipalities containing more than 5,000 inhabitants to procure a license, and requiring the appointment of a board of examiners in those of more than 10,000 inhabitants, is not an arbitrary classification, so as to render the statute invalid; that a statute requiring the procurement of a license by persons working at the business of plumbing in municipalities of more than 5,000 inhabitants throughout the state is not invalid as special legislation. Further commenting upon the question, the court says: "The general rule is that a classification of the cities, towns, and villages of the state by population as a basis for legislation may be made if such classification is based upon a rational difference of situation or condition found in the municipalities placed in the different classes; otherwise legislation based upon such classification will not be sustained." They hold that there is a clear and rational difference in the situation or circumstances so far as the plumbing business and appointment of a board of examiners of plumbers is concerned in cities of 10,000 inhabitants or more.

It is also urged that the act is not general in terms, and does not apply to all persons in the state alike, and for that reason it is class or special legislation. "The act does apply uniformly to the persons engaged in or working at the business of plumbing as master plumbers, employing plumbers, or journeymen plumbers in the several classes of cities, towns, and villages created by the act throughout the state, and we think, therefore, it is not subject to the criticism of want of uniformity in its application. A law is said to be general and uniform, not because it operates upon every person in the state alike, but because it operates alike upon every person in the state who is brought within the conditions and circumstances prescribed by the law. Steed v. Edgar County, 223 Ill. 187, 79 N. E. 123. In Meyer v. Hazelwood, 116 Ill. 319, 6 N. E. 480, it was said: "Laws are general and uniform, and hence not obnoxious to the objection that they are local or special, when they are general and uniform in the operation upon all in like situation." So we have in this case a uniform application of the jury law to all cities that come within its operation. It is a law in which the public at large have an interest in its enforcement and in its passage, in that there is a congested condition of population in the larger cities that to the legislative wisdom suggested that a different mode and method of selecting juries for said large congested centers should apply to the jury than that which applies throughout the balance of the state. To ask the question as to whether or not a different condition exists is to suggest a governmental policy which, of course, addresses itself to the sound discretion of the Legislature, and not to the courts. This law applies to all of the people of the county where the city of the population named is located and is uniform upon each. In the case of Title & Document Restoration Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. 289, 88 Pac. 356, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 682, 119 Am. St. Rep. 199, the court had under review the law to provide for the re-establishment of lost record titles to real estate. This is a case from the Supreme Court of California in which their Constitution in reference to the exception of certain things from special legislation is very similar to the exceptions in our own Constitution. They hold that said act is constitutional, and that it is not necessary that the law shall affect all the people of the state in order that it may be general or that a statute concerning procedure shall be applicable to every action that may be brought in the courts of the state. A statute which affects all the individuals of a class is a general law, while one which relates to particular persons or things of a class is special; citing McDonald v. Conniff, 99 Cal. 386, 34 Pac. 71. The Legislature has the right to enact laws applicable only to one class where the classification is authorized by the Constitution or is based upon intrinsic differences requiring different legislation. A law which operates only upon a class of individuals is none the less a general law. See, also, Reed v. Rogan, 94 Tex. 177, 59 S. W. 255. In the last-cited case the principle is laid down that where the public at large have an interest in the matter, and the legislation merely applies to a locality, but affects all who live in said locality, or whose interests may be drawn to same, that the law is a general law, and not a special one. We therefore hold that the jury law passed by the Thirtieth Legislature is in all things constitutional. That it is a general law applicable to all within its provisions, and the fact that it does not have a clause authorizing other cities to come within its provisions, does not render it invalid, nor does the fact that the jury law mentioned by appellant in his objections above stated differ from those of the jury law that applies to the rest of the state in any respect render said law unconstitutional.

There being no other question in appellant's case, in the absence of statement of facts that can be considered, the judgment is in all things affirmed.

DAVIDSON, P. J. (dissenting). Not being able to agree with my Brethren in holding the act of the Thirtieth Legislature a general law, but believing it is a special law, I have thought it proper to file some reasons upon which I base my dissent.

That portion of the act which enters into this discussion is found in the following language: Section 1. "That between the 1st and 15th day of August, A. D. 1907, and between said dates every two years thereafter, in all counties in this state having a city or cities therein containing a population aggregating twenty thousand (20,000) or more people, as shown by the United States census of the year 1900, the tax collector, or one of his deputies, and the tax assessor, or one of his deputies, and the sheriff, or one of his deputies, and the county clerk, or one of his deputies, and the district clerk, or one of his deputies, shall meet at the courthouse of the county and select from the qualified jurors of the county the jurors for service in the district and county courts in such county for the ensuing two years, in the manner hereinafter provided." This is the only part of the act which fixes the criterion of classification or which attempts to classify the counties which are to be included in the operation of this act. At a glance it will be seen that all counties are excluded from the operation of this act, and perpetually so, except those which include a city or cities of 20,000 inhabitants as determined by the United States census of 1900. This act is exclusive, and perpetually so, inasmuch as there is no provision in its terms which included counties with cities of 20,000 inhabitants at the time of its passage, or such counties as may thereafter be similarly situated. Then it is not debatable that every county in Texas was excluded from the operation of the act except those having a designated class of a city or cities as evidenced by the United States census of 1900. Several reasons were urged in the court below as well as in this court why this act was not a general one, but special, and therefore interdicted by the terms of the Constitution. I am of opinion these contentions are correct, and that the law is in direct violation of the spirit, as well as the letter, of the Constitution. An inspection of the Constitution makes patent the proposition that under our representative form of government, which is one of delegated power to departments of government, every citizen of this state stands upon an equal basis unless for reasons otherwise stated in the Constitution. It will necessarily follow from this that unless there is some reason manifested in the Constitution, or it is otherwise therein provided, all laws in regard to jury trials must be general and apply alike to all of our citizenship, and the duties, obligations, rights, privileges, and immunities are the same to each and all. This is the general proposition, and every law infringing this idea will be unconstitutional unless it is otherwise provided in the organic law and it is not "otherwise provided" in regard to jury trials. Article 1, § 3, of that instrument provides: "All free men, when they form a social compact, have equal rights." Section 15 of article 1 says: "The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate.

The Legislature shall pass such laws as may be needed to regulate the same, and to maintain its purity and efficiency." Section 19 of article 1 ordains that "no citizen of this state shall be deprived of life, liberty, property, privileges, or immunities, or in any manner disfranchised, except by the due course of the law of the land." Article 3 § 42, of the same instrument thus reads: "The Legislature shall pass such laws as may be necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this Constitution." Section 56 of article 3 provides: "The Legislature shall not, except as otherwise provided in this Constitution, pass any local or special law, authorizing the summoning or impaneling of grand or petit juries." It further inhibits the passage of such special laws in the following language: "And in all other cases where a general law can be made applicable, no local or special law shall be enacted; provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the Legislature from passing special laws for the preservation of the game and fish of this State in certain localities."

So it will be seen by the provisions quoted that equality of rights and uniformity of legislation applicable alike to the citizenship of this state in jury trials is the underlying principle of the organic law, and to get away from this broad organic principle we must find somewhere in the Constitution that it is "otherwise provided." That instrument may be searched in vain for any provision which will justify the Legislature in passing the act in question for by the express terms of section 56 of article 3 the Legislature is specially prohibited from passing any special law in regard to such "summoning and impaneling of grand and petit juries," and this is emphasized by the other clause which says that no special law shall be enacted where a general law can be made applicable, excepting out of the provision of this clause laws with reference to the protection of game and fish. There could not be a more special emphasis of the prohibition of special laws than by the words employed. This section not only expressly forbids such special laws, but emphasizes this by excepting out certain things. It is therefore emphasized, doubly so, that special laws with reference to matters contained in article 3, § 56, are not subject to special legislation. This is sought to be avoided by classifying counties by the criterion set forth, to wit, the census of 1900. It occurs to the writer that the provisions of section 1 of the act of the Thirtieth Legislature, but emphasizes the fact that this law is special, and that it was an attempt on the part of the Legislature to evade the provisions of the Constitution above quoted. Even when the doctrine of classification is resorted to, it is found to be uniformly held by all the authorities that, when the act applies alike to all of a class, it may be held to be a general law; but, when it does not apply to all of a class so specified, it is a special law. This doctrine was recognized by our Supreme Court in Clark v. Finley, 93 Tex. 171, 54 S. W. 343, and it was by virtue of this rule that that high tribunal was enabled to hold the "fee bill" constitutional. In what is known as the "fee bill" law, provision was made, however, that all counties in Texas could be brought under the operation of the law on the happening of a certain contingency. Therefore the idea of perpetual exclusion was not in that law, and it was so found by the Supreme Court. It was upon that theory, and that alone, that the fee bill law was upheld by our Supreme Court. Now, our Constitution provides specially and definitely that there shall be no special laws in regard to "summoning and impaneling grand and petit juries," and that no such law shall be passed when a general one could be made applicable. In other words, the Constitution makes it plain that legislation in regard to summoning and impaneling grand and petit juries must be of universal application throughout Texas, and it could not have been more plainly written if the wording had been expressed that such laws shall apply alike to every county in the state. Jury trials must "remain inviolate" and any discrimination in favor or against such jury trials would be violative of the Constitution, and would not constitute "due process of law." Every county in Texas should alike be brought under the operation of such laws, and no citizen subject to jury duty or who has the right to sit upon juries can be excluded without violating these plain provisions of the Constitution. Every citizen in Texas has equal rights in trials by jury under the terms of the Constitution. Have these rights been accorded under the provisions of the act in question? The answer is plainly in the negative. Why? Because the citizenship of the state at large are placed under a different rule and on different lines of procedure than in those counties which are within the purview of said act. All counties are excluded except those which had in 1900 a city or cities aggregating a population of 20,000 inhabitants. Is this in accord with the provision of the Constitution with reference to "due process of law"? To this the answer must be in the negative. Will it be doubted that the Legislature could have as readily and as easily passed an act which could be made applicable to every county in the state? If not, why not? Some fancied reason why some of the counties should have a different rule from the others in regard to "summoning and impaneling juries" would not justify nor authorize a Legislature to pass an act otherwise than as provided in the Constitution. The police power or matters of policy on the part of the Legislature must be subordinate to the plain provisions of the organic law. I have been unable to find any tangible reason why the act in question could not have easily been made applicable to every county in the state as it was to the few counties made subject to the law, and under all the authorities that have come under my observation this law would be special in its operation. There is no reason, in view of the provisions of the Constitution, why Dallas county should come within this classification, and the adjoining counties of Ellis, Kaufman, Collin, and Hunt should not. The rights of the citizenship of these various counties are said to be equal in the Bill of Rights. All counties in Texas are on an equal basis, territorially speaking, as divisions of the state, and certainly the citizenship, personally speaking, and their rights, ought to be the same in regard to jury trials. I cannot conceive a reason that would require or authorize the citizens of one county to be tried under a different jury system or method of procedure from those in any other or all other counties in view of constitutional provisions quoted. Why a method pursued in one county in these respects should be different from a method pursued in another and maintained in the face of the Constitution is not apparent. It is not giving to "all free men" "equal rights" from the standpoint of jury trials. Therefore it seems to me that all laws in regard to "summoning and impaneling of grand and petit juries" can be but special laws, and therefore unconstitutional, when not of uniform general application to all the counties and all the citizenship of this state alike. I perhaps might rest with safety my dissent at this point, but there are other phases urged and my Brethren have to some extent discussed them.

It is urged that the classification by the act under discussion is arbitrary. This to some extent has been noticed in what I have previously said. The act certainly does not apply to all counties similarly situated at the time of its passage, and by its provisions excludes all those that may be similarly situated in the future. It sometimes occurs that the line of demarcation between what is termed general and special laws is not as clear as should be under the decisions, many of which are more than doubtful in reasoning and wrong in effect. This confusion has doubtless arisen very largely because courts have a tendency to rather magnify their sense of courtesy or comity towards the legislative branch of the government, and withhold proper obedience to the Constitution, and these decisions have at times had the effect of overriding very largely the letter and real purposes of the Constitution. Certainly the Constitution is the paramount law, and to it all departments of the government should render obedience, for they are simply creatures of the people through the terms of that instrument. This comity may speak well for the courtesy and chivalry of the courts towards the co-ordinate branches of the government, but rather disparagingly of their real and true loyalty to the organic and paramount law. It should be the undeviating purpose of all departments of government, as created by the Constitution, to adhere to the letter as well as to the real purpose and intent of that instrument. This is necessary to the end that the people who ordained and made it the paramount law may not lose or be deprived of its benefits. No act of the Legislature ought to be passed which infringes the intent or real purpose of the Constitution. Much less should one be enacted violative of the plain provisions of that instrument. If the Constitution is thought to be weak or inadequate, it can be amended or changed, but in no instance can any department of the government be authorized to do so. This must be done by a vote of the people. If it can be evaded in one respect, it would necessarily follow that it could be so done in every respect, and solely by legislative acts upheld by evasive rules of construction by the courts. It was well said in Morrison v. Bachert, 112 Pa. 328, 5 Atl. 740: "It ought to be unnecessary for this court to make this judicial declaration, but it is proper to do so in view of the amount of legislation which is periodically placed upon the statute book in entire disregard of the fundamental law. Much of this legislation may remain unchallenged for years only to be overturned when it reaches this court. In the meantime parties may have acted upon it, rights may have grown up, and the inconveniences and losses entailed thereby may not be inconsiderable. As we view it, this note of warning at this time is needed." The confusion, inconveniences, troubles, and losses which may arise from such legislation should warn our legislative body to be careful and guarded in the enactment of laws to the end that they may stand and not fall, and that courts may not be called upon to set them aside. The courts should not hesitate to declare unconstitutional laws invalid to the end that our form of government may be preserved as intended by its founders.

Recurring to the terms of the act in question, the proposition is urged that it is not a general law, is not uniform or equal, but special and local in its operation, and does not properly but arbitrarily classify. If this is true, the law is invalid. 1 Lewis' Sutherland, Statutory Construction, § 199, is quoted as follows: "Special laws are those made for individual cases, or for less than a class requiring laws appropriate to its peculiar condition and circumstances. Local laws are special as to place. When prohibited, they are severally objectionable for not extending to the whole subject to which their provisions would be equally applicable, and thus permitting a diversity of laws relating to the same subject. The object of the prohibition of special or local laws is to prevent this diversity. 'Every subject of legislation,' says the Supreme Court of Ohio, 'is either of a general nature, on the one hand, or local and special, on the other. It cannot be in its nature both general and special because the two are inconsistent.'" State v. Spellmire, 67 Ohio St. 77, 81, 85 N. E. 619; Fitzgerald v. Phelps et al., 42 W. Va. 570, 26 S. E. 315. As the decisions are, it is somewhat difficult to fix any definite rule by which to solve the question as to whether a law is special or general. Often it is found to be expedient to leave the matter largely to be determined upon the circumstances of the particular law. If the operation and effect of the law is necessarily special, the act itself would be special without reference to the form of the act. If, on the contrary, the act would operate upon all of the class of things present and prospective, the act might be general. That this question is not solved by mere matter of form has been expressly held or necessarily implied in practically all the cases. If this were not true, the Constitution could be very easily evaded by using language for special laws that would make it appear in the guise of a general statute. Lewis' Sutherland, Statutory Construction, § 200; Duffy v. New Orleans, 49 La. Ann. 114, 21 South. 179; State v. Herrmann, 75 Mo. 340; State v. Nelson, 52 Ohio St. 88, 39 N. E. 22, 26 L. R. A. 317, and a great number of cases.

So, with reference to the classification of subjects for legislation, when an act is assailed as class or special legislation, the attack is necessarily based upon the claim that there are persons or things similarly situated to those embraced in the act, and which under the terms of the act are excluded from its operation. The question, then, generally speaking, is whether the persons or things embraced by the act form by themselves a proper and legitimate class with reference to the purposes of the act. It seems to be agreed on all hands that the Constitution does not forbid a reasonable and proper classification of the subjects for legislation. Lewis' Sutherland, Statutory Construction, § 203. One of the troubles arising in discussing these matters has been to fix a definite and absolute rule, and thus far it seems to have been found practically impossible, and, as before stated, it seems to be generally held that the question must be determined under the law as it arises. But, in whatever shape the question may come, it must not be a mere arbitrary selection or classification. See State v. Jacksonville Terminal Co., 41 Fla. 303, 27 South. 221. The Minnesota court lays down the following proposition in regard to the solution of these questions: (1) "The fundamental rule is that all classification must be based upon substantial distinctions which make one class really different from the other." (2) "Another rule is that the characteristics which form the basis of the classification must be germane to the purpose of the law; in other words, legislation for a class, to be general, must be confined to matters peculiar to the class. There must be an evident connection between the distinctive features to be regulated and the regulation adopted." (3) "Another rule is that to whatever class a law applies it must apply to every member of that class." The fifth rule is as follows: "The last proposition to which we will refer is that the character of an act as general or special depends on its substance, and not on its form. It may be special in fact, although general in form, and it may be general in fact although special in form. The mere fact is not material." State v. Cooley, 56 Minn. 540, 58 N. W. 150. In a subsequent case, to wit, Murray v. Board of Co. Com., 81 Minn. 359, 84 N. W. 103, 51 L. R. A. 828, 83 Am. St. Rep. 379, that court said: "A law is general and uniform in its operation which operates equally upon all subjects within the class for which the rule is adopted, provided the classification be a proper one. The Legislature, however, cannot adopt an arbitrary classification, for it must be based on some reason suggested by such difference in the situation and circumstances of the subjects placed in the different classes as to disclose the necessity or propriety of different legislation in respect thereto. Any law based upon such classification must embrace all, and exclude none, whose condition and wants render such legislation to them as a class or appropriate to them as a class. Legislation limited in its relation to particular subdivisions of the state, to be valid, must rest on some characteristic or peculiarity plainly distinguishing the places included from those excluded." See, also, Duluth Banking Co. v. Koon, 81 Minn. 486, 84 N. W. 335. The above seems to lay down the general rule as held by all the courts as drawing a proper distinction under the circumstances mentioned between what would constitute general and special laws. Referring to the decisions of our own state, we find as far back as Janes et al. v. Reynolds, 2 Tex. 250, the same rule announced and followed. The above doctrine has been approved in Harding v. People, 160 Ill. 464, 43 N. E. 624, 32 L. R. A. 445, 52 Am. St. Rep. 344; Millet v. People, 117 Ill. 301, 7 N. E. 631, 57 Am. Rep. 869; Kalloch v. Superior Court, 56 Cal. 238; Eames v. Savage, 77 Me. 212, 52 Am. Rep. 751. So it has been held the term "laws of the land" are general public laws binding on all under similar circumstances, and not partial or private laws, affecting the rights of private individuals or private classes. Speaking on this matter in Clark v. Finley, supra, Chief Justice Gaines, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The definition of a general law, as distinguished from a special law, given by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in the case of Wheeler v. Philadelphia, 77 Pa. 338, and approved by the Supreme Court of Missouri, is perhaps as accurate as any that has been given. State v. Tolle, 71 Mo. 645. The court in the former case say: 'Without entering at large upon the discussion of what is here meant by a "local or special law," it is sufficient to say that a statute which relates to persons or things as a class is a general law, while a statute which relates to particular persons or things of a class is special, and comes within the constitutional prohibition.' * * * The tendency of the recent decisions upon the subject, as it seems to us, is to drift into refinements that are rather more specious than profitable. It is said in some of the cases that the classification must be reasonable, in others, that it must not be unreasonable or arbitrary, etc. If it is meant by this that the Legislature cannot evade the prohibition of the Constitution as to special laws by making a law applicable to a pretended class, which is, in fact, no class, we concur in the proposition. Such was the law passed upon in the case of Commonwealth v. Patton, 88 Pa. 253. That statute was made applicable to all counties in which there was a population of more than 60,000, and an incorporated city with a population exceeding 8,000, 'situate at a distance from the county seat of more than twenty-seven miles by the usually traveled public road.' There was but one city in the state which came within the pretended class. The court held this a covert attempt at special legislation, and that the act was a nullity." Tested by the rule laid down in the Clark v. Finley Case, supra, and which has been followed in this state since the case of Janes v. Reynolds, supra, I am of the opinion this law is not general, but special. Our Supreme Court in the decision quoted lays down two rules: The law is general where it covers all of the class, but special when it does not cover all or every member of that class. Therefore under the decisions of our own state, the act of the Thirtieth Legislature under discussion is special, and not general.

My Brethren refer to the case of Douglas v. People, 225 Ill. 536, 80 N. E. 341, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1116, 116 Am. St. Rep. 162. This case supports the writer's views of the subject of classification. In that case, as I understand, the Legislature was classifying cities. If the classification was proper, the Legislature had the right to do so. That question, as applied to classification of cities and towns, would hardly be debatable in Texas by reason of the fact that the Constitution expressly provides that the Legislature has power and is clothed with full authority to pass special laws or acts with reference to cities of a population of 10,000 or more inhabitants, and general laws in regard to towns with less population. The immediate subject of discussion in Douglas v. People was an act regulating the business of plumbing, etc. This significant expression is found in that opinion: "A law is said to be general and uniform, not because it operates upon every person in the state alike, but because it operates alike upon every person in the state who is brought within the conditions and circumstances prescribed by the law. Steed v. Edgar County, 223 Ill. 187, 79 N. E. 123. In Meyer v. Hazelwood, 116 Ill. 319, 329, 6 N. E. 480-486, it was said: "Laws are general and uniform, and hence not obnoxious to the objection that they are local or special, when they are general and uniform in their operation upon all in like situation." That is the rule I am invoking and which I held correct in Clark v. Finley, supra. Wherever the Legislature has the right to classify, the rule referred to is correct. That opinion recognizes the doctrine contended for here; that is, that the Legislature has no right to classify when arbitrary or when it excludes persons or things similarly situated. Viewed in the light of the constitutional provisions heretofore noticed in this dissenting opinion, the proposition is supported by the authorities relied upon by my Brethren, that wherever classification is resorted to the act must apply to all alike who are similarly situated, whether upon persons or things, and the objection urged to the act of the Thirtieth Legislature is that it does not apply to all counties alike similarly situated, and that it institutes rules for those similarly situated both as to counties and persons which are dissimilar. It fixes the manner of "summoning and impaneling grand and petit juries" entirely different in some portions of the state from what it does in others, and it directly excludes counties in the state similarly situated at the time of the passage of the law, and forever debars their coming under its operation. As before stated, if the Constitution with reference to this subject means anything, it means that every county in Texas shall have the same procedure in regard to "summoning and impaneling grand and petit juries," and every citizen shall be tried under the same procedure with reference to "summoning and impaneling grand and petit juries." That the same rule should govern alike every county and that every citizen should stand upon the same plane where his life and his property are involved in so far as jury trials are concerned ought to be self-evident, and the Constitution so directly ordains. This matter of jury trials has perhaps been regarded by our race as being one of its most sacred reserved rights. At the time of the passage of the act under discussion there were other counties in Texas containing a city or cities whose population numbered 20,000 inhabitants. These were and are excluded for all time to come, and every county in Texas was excluded, except perhaps seven or eight. This act cannot be sustained upon any known or rational theory of classification in my judgment. In fact, there is no attempt at classification. It was but a mere exclusion of certain counties, and, in fact, nearly all counties, in the state. It is but a mere designation of a few counties, and makes no provision by which any other county in the state may by reason of its increase of population in the growth of cities in the future come within its provisions. See authorities already cited. In Scowden's Appeal, 96 Pa. 422, this language was used: "The act of June 12, 1879, makes no attempt at classification of cities. It is merely an effort to legislate for certain cities of the fifth class, to the exclusion of all other cities of the same class." See, also, City of Scranton v. Silkman, 113 Pa. 191, 6 Atl. 146; State ex rel. West v. Des Moines, 96 Iowa, 521, 65 N. W. 818, 31 L. R. A. 189, 59 Am. St. Rep. 381; Campbell v. City of Indianapolis, 155 Ind. 186, 57 N. E. 925; McInerney v. Denver, 17 Colo. 302, 29 Pac. 516; State v. Scott, 70 Neb. 685, 100 N. W. 812. The latter case construed an act regulating county offices, which, in its terms, limited the operation of counties having a population of 50,000 according to the census of 1900, which is the same as our jury act under consideration, and held the act local and special since it can never apply to any of the counties except the two that were in the class at the time of the passage of the act. See, also, Central Trust Co. v. Railway Co. (C. O.) 82 Fed. 1. In De Hart v. Atlantic City et al., 63 N. J. Law, 223, 43 Atl. 743, the act discussed authorized creation of district courts in counties of 20,000 or less which should by resolution adopt the act within three months from its passage. It was held a special law, because it denied to all then existing cities whose necessities might at any time after the three months have demanded a district court as well as two new cities, and the effect of the limitation as a restriction of the class to which the law may apply. The same proposition is laid down in Murphy v. Long Branch (N. J. Sup.) 61 Atl. 593. State v. Queen, 62 S. C. 247, 40 S. E. 554, is a South Carolina case. That act designated certain counties by name (our jury law does this in effect), and provided for the drawing and listing of grand juries which was held to be a special law and obnoxious to a similar prohibition of our Constitution as found in article 3, § 56. This case is directly decisive of the constitutionality of the act of the Thirtieth Legislature under discussion. To the same effect, see Railway Co. v. Martin, 53 Ohio St. 386, 41 N. E. 691. That law was held to be a mere evasion, and was really but an exclusion of future cities. In regard to evasion, see Endlich, Stat. Con. § 521; State v. Schwab, 49 Ohio St. 229, 34 N. E. 736. The act then under discussion was held special although written in general terms. It only applied to one city, and never could to any other; only one census being named as a criterion for determining the class. See, also, State v. Ellet, 47 Ohio St. 90, 23 N. E. 931, 21 Am. St. Rep. 772, is to the same effect, as is State v. Anderson, 44 Ohio St. 247, 6 N. E. 571. See, also, State v. Board of Managers, 89 Mo. 237, 239, 1 S. W. 307; Wanser v. Hoos, 60 N. J. Law, 482, 38 Atl. 449, 64 Am. St. Rep. 600; State v. Messerly, 198 Mo. 351, 95 S. W. 913; Burnham v. City, 98 Wis. 123, 73 N. W. 1018. It was held in Re Henneberger, 155 N. Y. 420, 50 N. E. 61, 42 L. R. A. 132, that a mere designation is not a classification. In Angell v. Cass County, 11 N. D. 265, 91 N. W. 73, it was said: "A law is general and uniform in its operation which operates equally upon all subjects within the class for which the rule is adopted, provided the classification be a proper one. The Legislature cannot, however, adopt an arbitrary classification, for it must be based on some reason suggested by such a difference in the situation and circumstances of the subject placed in different classes as to disclose the necessity or propriety of different legislation in respect thereto. * * * Legislation limited in relation to particular subdivisions of the state, to be valid, must rest on some characteristic or peculiarity plainly distinguishing the places included from those excluded." See, also, State v. Ritt, 76 Minn. 531, 79 N. W. 535; Duluth Banking Co. v. Koon, 81 Minn. 486, 84 N. W. 336. Other cases might be cited almost without number supporting the same proposition.

As to another phase of this law and its constitutionality, to wit, that it is exclusive and operates for the present only, to the exclusion of the counties which might come within its operation, all the authorities support the contention of appellant. Hetland v. Board, 89 Minn. 492, 95 N. W. 305, holds an act special where its operation was limited to such counties as had at the time of its passage expended at least $7,000 for courthouse purposes. The court says the classification was both illusive and arbitrary, and that it was unique and novel. "To approve it would open the door to all sorts of special legislation, general in form but special in fact, the only limitation to which would be the ingenuity of legislators in devising new classifications." Without going into a further discussion of this particular phase of the subject, I cite in support of my views the following cases: State v. Simon, 53 N. J. Law, 550, 22 Atl. 120; Bennett v. Common Council, 55 N. J. Law, 72, 25 Atl. 113; Parker v. Common Council, 57 N. J. Law, 83, 30 Atl. 186; Coutler v. City, 44 N. J. Law, 58; Zeigler v. Gaddis, 44 N. J. Law, 363; Douglas v. People, 225 Ill. 536, 80 N. E. 841, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1116, 116 Am. St. Rep. 162. In my opinion it is a safe proposition to assert that the act of the Thirtieth Legislature does not apply to every county in the state and is therefore void; that, to make it a general law, it must not legislate only for present or unchangeable conditions. I am persuaded that no case can be found in the reports which holds a law to be general which failed to provide for and anticipate the wants of the future. On the contrary, wherever the question has arisen, every court has held a law special which created a classification which was arbitrary or illusive, and which operated upon unchangeable conditions and failed to provide for future localities or objects to come within the class, no matter how ingenious the evasion employed to make a special law assume the guise of a general law may have been. Perhaps there may be no limit to the ingenuity displayed by legislative bodies intentionally or otherwise to make a mere designation assume the form of a classification.

I have written beyond what I intended but it occurs to me that the act under consideration is so entirely obnoxious to our Constitution and to the authorities and to our jurisprudence that I have amplified beyond my first intention. To my mind there is no reason why this law should be upheld; that it is fundamentally violative of the Constitution, and that it is an arbitrary designation operating upon a few counties and excluding from its operation all counties wherein cities may accumulate a population that ought to entitle them to come under its operation. But it is still farther objectionable, because it is at fundamental variance with that uniformity and equality of the equal rights of our citizenship. It strikes at the great inviolability of jury trials. It makes those trials and procedure under them different in different localities, leaving the great body of the state and different sections under entirely different rules, and it injects in jury trials a procedure different in parts of the state from those obtaining in other parts, thereby directly and expressly violating the plain provisions of the Constitution as enunciated in article 3, § 56, which says no special law shall be passed in regard to "summoning and impaneling of grand and petit juries."

I will express in conclusion a sense of obligation and appreciation to the attorneys in other cases involving this question. My Brethren selected this case in which to write the opinion. The arguments and briefs in the case of Brown v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 112 S. W. 80, by Messrs. Crawford & Lamar, Messrs. Crane, Gilbert & Crane, and Messrs. Muse & Allen, and the arguments and brief in the case of Pate v. State, 113 S. W. 750, by Messrs. Thomas & Sewell and Messrs. Crawford & Crawford, and the argument and brief in the case of Lee v. State, 113 S. W. 301, by Mr. E. T. Branch, are able and convincing, and have been of great service to the writer in his investigation of the questions involved. I deem it but right that I should make this statement in view of the fact that I have been so greatly assisted by them in the cases represented by them respectively. I also mention my high appreciation of the brief in this case of Mr. A. S. Baskett, who represented appellant, and who so ably presented the questions involved.

I shall pursue no further a discussion of the questions involved, but for the reasons suggested I respectfully dissent from the conclusion reached by my Brethren.

LEE v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 21. 1908.)

1. JURY (§ 70*)—DRAWING OF JURORS—OFFICERS—STATUTES.

Under Acts 30th Leg. (Laws 1907) p. 269, c. 139, providing that the keys for the wheel containing the names of jurors shall be kept by the sheriff and the district clerk, and providing that the clerk of the district court and the sheriff shall draw from the wheel the names of jurors, etc., and that, when a special venire is ordered, the "clerk" shall draw from the wheel the names required, a special venire in the criminal district court of a county is properly drawn by the district clerk of the county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 282*) — MANSLAUGHTER — QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Evidence held to require the submission of the issue of manslaughter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 574; Dec. Dig. § 282.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 276*) — SELF-DEFENSE — EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to require the submission of the issue of self-defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 569; Dec. Dig. § 276.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 295*)—MANSLAUGHTER—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where accused testified that decedent hit him on the breast and knocked him down, and that the blow hurt him for two days, and that decedent called him a "son of a bitch," and threatened to kill him, an instruction on manslaughter which failed to state the language of Pen. Code 1895, art. 702, that an assault and battery by decedent, causing pain or bloodshed, constituted an adequate cause, and which stated that insulting words or an assault and battery so slight as to show no intention to inflict pain were not adequate causes, was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 606; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1186*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

Accused is entitled to have the jury correctly charged on the law of the case, and, where that has not been done, the court on appeal must reverse the judgment, though the defense of accused rests on an unsubstantial basis of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1186.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1189*)—INSTRUCTIONS—MOTIONS FOR NEW TRIAL.

Where errors in the instructions were called to the attention of the court in the motion for new trial, the court erred in denying the motion, and the court on appeal has no discretion but to reverse the conviction and remand the case for new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3225, 3226; Dec. Dig. § 1189.*]

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; J. K. P. Gillaspie, Judge.

Henry Lee was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

E. T. Branch and S. B. Ehrenwerth, for appellant. F. J. McCord, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

RAMSEY, J. Appellant was indicted in the criminal district court of Harris county, charged with the murder of one James S. Simpson. He was tried therein on the 29th day of April, and was convicted of murder in the second degree, and his punishment assessed at 20 years' confinement in the penitentiary.

Many of the questions raised on the appeal have been decided adversely to the contention of appellant. He raises, among other questions, the validity of what is known as the "jury wheel law." This question has been decided against appellant in the case of Smith v. State (not yet officially reported) 113 S. W. 289, and need not be further discussed.

In the same connection appellant contends that the special venire in this case was improperly drawn in that same was drawn by the district clerk of Harris county, and not by the clerk of the criminal district court of said county. We do not believe that this contention can be maintained. Section 3 of the act of the Thirtieth Legislature (Laws 1907) p. 269, c. 139, provides that, after the cards containing the names of jurors shall be deposited in the wheel, same shall be kept locked at all times, except when in use as hereinafter provided, and that the keys to such locks shall be kept one by the sheriff and the other by the district clerk. It is provided by section 4 of said act that not less than 10 days prior to the first day of the term of court the clerk of the district court, or one of his deputies, and the sheriff, or one of his deputies, in the presence and under the direction of the district judge if the jurors are to be drawn for the district court, shall draw from the wheel containing the names of jurors, after the same has been well turned, so that the cards therein are thoroughly mixed, one by one the names of 36 jurors, or a greater or less number where such judge has so directed, for each week of the term of the district court. By section 9 of said act it is provided that, whenever a special venire is ordered, the clerk or his deputy, in the presence and under the direction of the judge, shall draw from the wheel containing the names of jurors the number of names required for such special venire. Attention is called to the fact that the law does not provide that the "district clerk," but that the "clerk," shall draw the names from the wheel, and the contention is made that this general designation "clerk" was so used that it might include the criminal district clerk, and it does not mean the clerk of the district court, or the clerk of a district court having no criminal jurisdiction, but that the intent of the entire act is that the clerk of the court in which the lists are to be used shall draw the names. We think in view of the entire statute, and particularly with reference to section 3, which provides that one of the keys shall be kept by the district clerk and the other by the sheriff, and the sections of the act in question where the general word "clerk" is used in respect to their duties concerning jurors, that it was not the intention of the Legislature that any special significance should be attached in section 9 of the act in question to the fact that the word "clerk," and not "district clerk," is used therein. It will be noted, too, that, when a special venire is drawn, it is made the duty of the clerk to prepare a list of such names in the order in which they are drawn from the wheel, and attach such list to the writ and deliver the same to the sheriff, and the cards containing such names shall be sealed up in an envelope and shall be retained by the clerk for distribution, as herein provided. So that we believe the court below took the proper view of this matter, and was clearly right in having the list drawn by the district clerk of Harris county.

The facts of the case show that appellant shot and killed James S. Simpson in a saloon in Houston very early in the morning. The proof shows that the parties, with others, had been up all night, and were all drinking, and that Simpson was in an advanced state of intoxication. Appellant, deceased, one Chumley, and a young man named Hayne all came into George Voss' saloon about 5 o'clock on the morning of March 4, 1908. Hayne left some half hour or more before the killing. The others remained. Practically all the testimony except that of appellant is to the effect: That deceased voluntarily gave up his pistol and belt to the witness Frank Casey, and the same was placed behind the bar. The conversation between the parties took a pretty wide range, and, just before the killing, Simpson said to Chumley, "Go away and leave me alone," and pushed him back, and he fell on the floor. At this time, according to the testimony of Casey and most of the witnesses, appellant was standing by the counter, some six or seven feet from Simpson, and thereupon appellant pulled his pistol, and fired three shots at Simpson. That at the time Simpson was not doing anything. When the first shot was fired, Casey testifies: Simpson made one step towards the door, and was facing appellant. That at the second shot deceased fell, with his head under the swinging doors. At the first shot he had his hands over his stomach, clasped in front of him over his stomach, and, after appellant commenced shooting, deceased kept his hands in the same position. That he fell after the second shot. That he fell, with his head underneath the screen door. That after deceased fell appellant made one step towards deceased's feet, and fired the third shot when deceased was lying on his back on the floor with his head under the screen door. The witness Casey gives a very full and circumstantial detail of all the facts of the killing.

His testimony makes a very strong case against appellant, and it is corroborated, to a large extent, by the testimony of all the other witnesses, except appellant, as well as the physical facts testified to on the trial. There is, however, some contradiction between the testimony of Casey and other witnesses concerning the killing which we do not deem it necessary to set out.

Appellant testified in his own behalf, and the following is a brief summary of his testimony as it relates to the particular facts of the killing: He says in the first place, and this seems to be conceded, that he and deceased were very friendly; both of them being policemen in Houston. He testifies that, after they had taken the last drink at Voss' saloon, Simpson seemed to be in a bad humor. That, when Chumley went up to him and spoke to him, he knocked him back against the wall and he fell, and that after he did that that he, appellant, walked up to him and said, "Jim, don't do that." That Simpson then hit him in the breast, and knocked him down. That the blow hurt for two days. That after he fell Simpson came towards him with his hands going back under his coat, and said, "God damn you son of a bitch, I will kill you," and that as he, appellant, was getting up from the floor, he pulled his gun and fired three shots at Simpson. Appellant also testifies that, when Simpson knocked him down, it made his watch fall out of his pocket, that he shot Simpson because he believed he was going to kill him, and that he would not have shot Simpson if he had known he was unarmed. He denies shooting Simpson while he was lying on the floor. He says the effect of the shots was that the room was full of smoke; that, when he fired the shots, Simpson was right in front of him; that all the shots were fired close together; that, when he fired the shots, Simpson had stepped up and thrown his hands behind him; that he pulled his gun and fired as he was getting up from the floor where he had just been knocked down by Simpson; that he fired no more shots after he saw Simpson had fallen; that he had other loads in his gun, and there was nothing to prevent him from shooting him again. This testimony is sufficient to demand and require a charge on the subject of manslaughter as well as self-defense.

Article 702 of the Penal Code of 1895 is as follows: "The following are deemed adequate causes: (1) An assault and battery by the deceased, causing pain or bloodshed." Construing this statute, it has been held that, to constitute this ground of adequate cause, it is not required that both pain and bloodshed should be caused by the assault and battery. Foster v. State, 8 Tex. App. 248; Tickle v. State, 6 Tex. App. 623; Hill v. State, 8 Tex. App. 142; Bonnard v. State, 25 Tex. App. 173, 7 S. W. 862, 8 Am. St. Rep. 431; Childers v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 509, 27 S. W. 133; Williams v. State, 15 Tex. App. 617; High v.

State, 26 Tex. App. 545, 10 S. W. 238, 8 Am. St. Rep. 488; Spivey v. State, 30 Tex. App. 343, 17 S. W. 546. On the subject of manslaughter the court gave the following instructions: "Manslaughter is voluntary homicide, committed under the influence of sudden passion arising from an adequate cause, but neither excused nor justified by law. By the expression 'under the influence of sudden passion' is meant: (1) The provocation must arise at the time of the commission of the offense, and the passion is not the result of a former provocation. (2) The act must be directly caused by the passion arising out of the provocation, and not a provocation given by some other person than the party killed. (3) The passion intended is either of the emotions of the mind known as anger, rage, sudden resentment, or terror, rendering the mind incapable of cool reflection, whether accompanied by bodily pain or not is adequate cause, in law. And when there are several causes to arouse passion, although no one of them alone would constitute adequate cause, it is for you to determine whether or not all such causes combined might be sufficient to do so. Insulting words and gestures, or an assault and battery so slight as to show no intention to inflict pain or injury, are not adequate causes. In order to reduce a voluntary homicide to the grade of manslaughter, it is necessary, not only that adequate cause existed to produce the state of mind referred to—that is, of anger, rage, sudden resentment or terror, sufficient to render the mind incapable of cool reflection—but that also such state of mind did actually exist at the time of the commission of the offense. Although the law provides that the provocation causing the sudden passion must arise at the time of the killing, it is your duty in determining the adequacy of the provocation, if any, to consider in connection therewith all the facts and circumstances in evidence in the case, and if you find by reason thereof the defendant's mind was incapable of cool reflection, and that said facts and circumstances were sufficient to produce such state of mind in a person of ordinary temper, then the proof of sufficiency of the provocation satisfies the requirements of the law, and so in this case you will consider all the facts and circumstances in evidence, the threats, if any, an assault, if any, the past conduct and bearing of said James S. Simpson towards the defendant, and all the facts and circumstances transpiring before, at the time of, and after the homicide in determining the condition of the defendant's mind at the time of the alleged killing, and the adequacy of the cause, if any, producing such condition. If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, Henry Lee, with a pistol, a deadly weapon that is as used was calculated reasonable and probably to kill, in a sudden transport of passion, aroused by adequate cause, as the same is herein explained, and not in his own self-defense and against an unlawful attack or threatened assault reasonably producing a rational fear or expectation of death or serious bodily injury, did shoot and kill James S. Simpson, in Harris county, Tex., on or about the 4th day of March, A. D. 1908, then find him, the defendant, guilty of manslaughter, and assess his punishment by confinement in the state penitentiary for not less than two or more than five years." It will be noticed from a careful reading of this charge that nowhere were the jury in terms instructed that an assault and battery causing pain was adequate cause. The failure of the court so to charge and the injury resulting therefrom was increased, as we believe, by the following portion of the charge on manslaughter: "Insulting words and gestures, or an assault and battery so slight as to show no intention to inflict pain or injury, are not adequate causes."

The case is very much like that of Warthan v. State, 41 Tex. Or. R. 385, 55 S. W. 55. In that case it seems the court gave a charge to the jury on manslaughter, which, after containing certain statutory provisions in reference to passion and adequate cause, instructed the jury substantially that the provocation must arise at the time of the commission of the offense, and that any circumstances or conditions which would arouse passion in the mind of a man of ordinary temper sufficient to render a person incapable of cool reflection would be adequate cause, and that the jury could look, not only to the provocation at the time, but to all the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties which might have a bearing on the provocation at the time. In that case, as in the case at bar, it was the contention of appellant that the only evidence requiring a charge on manslaughter consisted in the testimony of the defendant himself, and in that case another witness who had stated that just prior to the shooting, deceased, who had been ordered to get out of the house, advanced towards defendant and struck him a blow in the breast, and that the court, on this testimony, should have pertinently instructed the jury that if they believed from the testimony that deceased, prior to the shooting, struck defendant a blow which caused him pain, and if they believed his passion was thereby excited and he was rendered incapable of cool reflection, and under such circumstances slew deceased, then to find him guilty of manslaughter. Passing on the question there raised, Judge Henderson, speaking for the court, says: "We understand it to be the duty of the court in charging the jury to instruct them upon the very phase of the case suggested by the testimony. The only issue presented by the evidence requiring a charge on manslaughter was the provocation which arose at the very time of the homicide. This provocation was the blow, which, according to the testimony of defendant and another witness, deceased struck him when he commanded him to cease the disturbance and leave his premises. Our statute makes a blow, under certain conditions, adequate cause to reduce a homicide to manslaughter. The blow must cause pain, and must also engender passion which renders the mind incapable of cool reflection. Now, while it is true that the charge of the court was comprehensive enough to include the adequate cause here presented, was it sufficiently pointed to direct the attention of the jury to the very act of the deceased on which appellant predicated his defense of manslaughter? We think not. If the jury had been told that, as a matter of law, a blow which caused pain was adequate cause, this obstacle would have been removed from their pathway; and then it would have only been necessary for them to find that the blow was struck, and that it caused pain which rendered the mind of defendant incapable of cool reflection. As it was, they were left without any suggestion from the court to determine the matter of law in the first instance." As we have seen, the charge of the court in the case at bar is subject to all the objections pointed out in the case which we have just quoted from, and the failure of the court in this case to charge that an assault and battery causing pain was adequate cause was intensified by the instruction that an assault and battery so slight as to show no intention to inflict pain or injury is not adequate cause. The testimony of the state in this case is very strong. The circumstances all indicate to our mind, if we were the arbiters of matters of fact, that the claim and contention of appellant as to the circumstances of the shooting rests on a very insubstantial basis of fact, but it must be conceded in every case that every appellant is entitled to have the jury charged the law of the land and charged correctly. For us to undertake, where this has not been done, to write a judgment of affirmance, is to deny him the right of trial by jury and to make ourselves what the law of the land never contemplated we should be, the arbiters of matters of fact. The charge of the court is erroneous. These errors were called to attention in a motion for a new trial. This should have been granted. Not having been done, we have no discretion but to reverse the same and remand it for a trial in accordance with law, which is here done.

HAMM v. GUNN.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. June 20, 1908. Rehearing Denied Oct. 17, 1908.)

1. NUISANCE (§ 18*)—ABATEMENT.

The right to abate nuisances is a well-established doctrine of equity courts, based on the maxim that the owner of property must so use it as not to materially injure another.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. § 49; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

2. NUISANCE (§ 34*) — NUISANCES PER SE—COTTON GIN.

A cotton gin is not a nuisance per se, it being among the beneficial appliances of modern life, which, to be abated as nuisances, must be shown to be so operated as to materially injure another or interfere with the comfortable use of his own property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. § 91; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

3. NUISANCE (§ 33*)—COTTON GIN.

Evidence held not to show that a cotton gin near a private residence was so operated as to constitute it a nuisance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

Appeal from District Court, Taylor County; J. H. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Nannie Gunn against John C. Hamm to abate a nuisance. There was a judgment perpetually restraining the acts complained of, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Hardwicke & Hardwicke, Harry Tom King, and Theodore Mack, for appellant. Wagstaff & Davidson, for appellee.

CONNER, C. J. This appeal is from a judgment perpetually restraining appellant from operating a gin on certain lots near appellee's residence, and the only question that we deem worthy of discussion is whether the evidence sufficiently supports the judgment. The evidence shows that appellee's residence is situated in the northeast corner of block 23, and that for several years prior to the institution of the suit appellant had operated an electric light plant located in block 22, which is east of block 23; that appellant made what is designated in the evidence as a "gin addition" to the light plant. The light plant extends north and south on one of the southern tiers of lots in block 22, and the gin was extended east from the south end of the light plant, forming an L. No additional motive power was installed by reason of the gin addition; the gin being operated by the motive power of the light plant. Appellee has a small orchard and garden south of her house, and a street 60 to 80 feet wide extends between block 23 and block 22. Cotton to be ginned is taken from loaded wagons by means of a suction pipe on the south side of the gin. The nearest point of the gin to appellee's residence is about 200 feet. Lots 14 and 15 and said street intervening between the gin and appellee's premises.

T. C. Weir testified, in behalf of appellee, to the erection of the gin, and that he "did not see any difference between this gin and other gins. Sometimes there is very little dust in cotton, and sometimes there is a great deal. There is always some dust in cotton in this country. When cotton goes into the gin stand and saws, it has dust in it. That is when the dust begins to fly. It has lint in it when it first reaches the saws, and then the lint begins to fly. Dust goes out into the room, and from there passes out through the windows and doors and through the flues. There are two flues to this gin. A few days ago I passed while they were ginning a bale of cotton, and could plainly hear the noise; saw no difference in the running of this gin and other gins as to noise. There was lint and dust in the upper part of the flues, and I could see it; looked like fine dust passing out of the flues. There was just a little smoke. You could see it by looking at the smokestack. The smokestack is about 45 feet high. I have never seen a gin that did not let lint escape from it. At the time I speak there was some lint lodging on some screens of some kind there; did not examine to see how thick the screens were." On cross-examination T. C. Weir again testified concerning the conditions usually following the operations of a gin, stating that he "did not testify as a gin expert at all; that when he was there and looked at the building they were ginning a bale of cotton; that he stopped a few minutes on the southwestern corner of the gin, and from the sidewalk made his observation; that while there saw a little dust pass out of the ventilator at the top; that the ventilator was about 45 feet high; it was concentrated at the two flues as it passed out at the top; that the dust I saw coming through had come from cotton then being ginned. I could see the dust with the naked eye. It comes out of the top of the house through a galvanized opening. I saw some lint on screens that had been put in around the top of the ventilator; did not see lint flying in the air; saw it catch on the screens which was catching the lint. I saw the dust pass off a little here and there and settle somewhere."

Appellee testified that "she was the head of a family, and owned and resided in the residence involved. In speaking of the operation of the gin, she said: 'I think the first bale was ginned last Saturday a week. I was at home at the time. I was at home another day while they were ginning, but do not remember the day of the week. On the Saturday I noticed the gin and heard the noise, and saw the lint coming from the windows and passing around and flickering about the light plant, and dust. I did not notice the flues; did not know what the flues were for; did not look in the direction of the flues. Dust was whipping around on the east side and coming through the windows. It came toward my house, some of it got to my fence or very near it. The wind was blowing more away from me than toward me. Lint of considerable size came towards me, large enough that you could see it distinctly from my place to the gin. Some of it fell in my yard, and I sent out and had it picked up to be confident it was lint cotton.' 'Q. Did you see the lint and dust in considerable quantities? A. No, sir; I can't say in considerable quantities, because it was the first day they had been ginning there. I think I was in the house when the bale was being ginned. I could hear the gin running; I could hear them all the time. Q. Well, was the noise of the running of that gin, and the dust and lint, does that disturb you any? A. It does. Q. What effect does it have on you? A. Just worries me in a nervous way; and, as far as to the lint, I consider that the lint and dust are unhealthy. Q. Is it there all the time, or practically all the time? A. Yes, sir; the noise is, and of course the lint is if they are ginning. Q. When you are in the house can you hear that noise? A. I can; it is a buzz there all the time. There is hollering there at night.' On cross-examination she stated: 'Q. Did you see dust? A. Yes, sir; I saw dust. Of course, in no great quantities—in all probability it would light before it got there. It would reach my premises if there was a strong breeze. Q. And it might have gone over the house if there had been a very strong breeze? A. Yes, sir; of course. But any obstruction always stops anything like that. I did not say I saw great quantities of lint. I know some lint came over there. I watched it as it flew from the gin.'"

Appellant and Hugh Hunt, a gin expert, testified to the effect that the gin was a modern one, and so arranged and equipped that neither dust nor lint will escape therefrom, and that by means of a "muffler" the noise was in a great measure subdued. J. H. Oliver testified that he was at the gin when the first bale of cotton had been ginned, and walked around to observe conditions; that he saw no dust and saw no lint escape; that there was but little noise, less than generally about a gin. O. W. Williams testified that he was at the gin when the first and third bales were ginned, and that there was no lint or dust that he could tell flying, and that there was very little noise. M. Crowder testified that his shop is about one lot east of the gin, and that he had not noticed any dust from it; none had been blown into his shop. Charles Stephens and J. C. Holland, living about as far from the gin as appellee, testified that they could hear the gin machinery running, but neither testified that they had observed whether there was dust or lint projected. O'Brien testified: "The light plant is just across two 50-foot lots and an alley from me. When I am at home I can hear the machinery running over there distinctly. I don't think I have been at home any time while the gin was running."

It appears that at the time of the trial but few bales of cotton had been ginned at all, and the foregoing is substantially all of the testimony on the subject. In our judgment the evidence is altogether too inconclusive and unsatisfactory to support the decree. The right to abate nuisances is a well-established doctrine of courts of equity, for it is a maxim of our law that the owner of property must so use it as not to materially injure another. But it cannot be successfully contended that a gin is a nuisance per se. Cotton gins are among the beneficial and useful appliances of modern life, and in a large part necessary to the rapid utilization of one of the staple products of the South, and before a citizen should be permitted to abate a business or enterprise of this kind, he should be required to show that its operation was so conducted as to in some material way injure him or interfere with the comfortable use of his own property. For a general discussion of the subject, see Rouse v. Martin, 75 Ala. 510, 51 Am. Rep. 463; Railway Company v. Oakes, 94 Tex. 155, 58 S. W. 999, 52 L. R. A. 293, 86 Am. St. Rep. 835. Under the court's charge, before the jury were authorized to find for appellee, it was necessary that they find from a preponderance of the evidence that the operation of appellant's gin would materially interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of appellee's home as a private residence, or by reason of dust and lint reasonably threaten the health of appellee or members of her family, thus charging the law as we have indicated it to be. But, as before stated, we think the evidence wholly fails to establish such to be the case. The evidence entirely fails to show that any of the dust or lint spoken of by the witnesses penetrated appellee's residence. On one occasion only, it appears, a small particle of lint was picked up in her yard, and while she may have heard the noise, nothing in the testimony shows that it was of such character or volume as to reasonably and materially affect the comfort or health of a person of ordinary sensibilities. Counsel for appellee does not very vigorously insist that the testimony adverted to establishes a nuisance, save that it is contended, in effect, that the operation of a gin so near appellee's residence necessarily constitutes a nuisance; that it is impossible to so operate it as that material inconvenience and injury can be avoided. If this contention be sound, it would necessarily follow that a gin so located would constitute a nuisance per se, and it cannot be so affirmed. Inhabitants of the modern city are necessarily subjected to more or less of noise, of dust, and of other disagreeable things, and the only way in which they can be avoided is by seclusion from among the busy activities of the age, unless, indeed, we would destroy many progressive features and necessary enterprises of the time. If we live in a city, it is but reasonable that we abate somewhat of our own comfort and convenience for the common good.

We find no merit in appellant's exceptions to the petition, nor material error in the charge of the court; but, because of the insufficiency of the evidence, it is ordered that the judgment be reversed and the cause remanded.

MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. CO. v. HOPKINS.
(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 31, 1906.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 103*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—DELAY IN DELIVERY—ACTIONS—PLEADING—PETITION.

A petition, alleging that plaintiff delivered to defendant railway company at A. goods consigned to a buyer at K., and received a bill of lading therefor, providing that the consignees should be allowed to inspect the goods before acceptance, that the consignment was in accordance with a contract with the consignees to buy at a certain price f. o. b. at A., and that defendant knew of the terms of the contract and the importance of the provision for inspection, was not subject to general demurrer as showing that title passed from plaintiff by delivery f. o. b. at A.

2. CARRIERS (§ 105*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—FAILURE TO DELIVER—ACTIONS—DAMAGES.

Where the contract between a buyer and seller that the buyer should have the right to inspect the goods before acceptance was communicated to the carrier, and it refused to allow inspection, which resulted in a refusal to accept, and plaintiff allowed the consignee to handle the goods on consignment, thereby realizing a sum less than the contract price, the carrier was liable for the difference between the sum received and the contract price.

3. CARRIERS (§ 105*)—CARRIAGE OF GOODS—FAILURE TO DELIVER—ACTIONS—DAMAGES.

The carrier having refused consignees the right to inspect until too late to inspect and unload on Saturday, it was liable for damages to the time the goods were taken in charge by the consignees on Monday morning; they not being bound to unload on Sunday to lessen the damage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 451; Dec. Dig. § 105.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 355*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—STATEMENTS OF ACCOUNT.

In an action against a carrier for failure to deliver potatoes according to contract, which resulted in the consignees' refusal to accept and a sale on commission at a price less than the contract price, certificates of sale, attached to the deposition of the commissionman, which purported on their faces to be accounts of sale of the same potatoes shipped by the carrier, reciting the number of sacks sold, which corresponded with the number specified in the bill of lading, showing the price obtained and the commission, which was the customary charge, the freight and the net proceeds were admissible; though not verified as correct, where the price obtained corresponded to evidence of the market price of potatoes at the time and the amount of deterioration through delay in delivery.

BOOKHOUT, J. Plaintiff brought this suit in the court below for damages in the sum of $300, and alleged that on the 13th day of June, 1906, he entered into a contract with the Walker-Brewster Grocery Company, brokers of Kansas City, by which he sold to said brokers two cars of potatoes, to be delivered f. o. b. cars at Alba, Wood county, Tex., at the price of 70 cents per bushel, said potatoes consisting of approximately 893 bushels; that the agent of the appellant at Alba knew of the terms of the contract and the character of the goods shipped, and was instructed to mark on the waybill, "Allow inspection," so that the consignee would be allowed to inspect said potatoes; that the agent failed to so mark the waybill, and when the potatoes arrived at Kansas City on the morning of the 15th of June, 1906, the agents of the carrier there refused to allow inspection, and that thereby the delivery of the potatoes was delayed, and the consignees refused to accept the same, and breached the contract, and that the plaintiff had to allow, or did allow, the consignees to handle the potatoes on consignment, and that plaintiff realized $330.45 only for said potatoes, and here sues for the difference in the contract price and the amount that he received for the potatoes, and in the alternative for damages in the sum of $300 for failure to properly mark the billing for said freight. The case was tried before the court, and judgment rendered by the court for the sum of $204.54, the difference in the price that appellee was to have received for the potatoes from the consignees under the contract between them and the amount of money remitted to the appellee by the commissionmen to whom he delivered the potatoes. From this judgment appellant prosecutes this appeal.

1. It is contended that the court erred in overruling defendant's general demurrer to plaintiff's amended original petition because said petition showed upon its face that the plaintiff had no such interest in the subject-matter of this cause as entitled him to sue. The petition alleged that heretofore, about June 13, 1906, plaintiff delivered to defendant, its agent, and employees at Alba, Tex., 607 sacks of Triumph Irish potatoes, approximating 893 bushels, consigned to Walker-Brewster Grocery Company, Kansas City, Mo., and received a bill of lading therefor, expressly providing that said consignees should be allowed to inspect said potatoes before acceptance thereof; that prior to said consignment he had negotiated a sale with said consignees, Walker-Brewster Grocery Company, at 70 cents per bushel f. o. b., Alba, Tex., and that the consignment was in accordance with said contract and agreement with said consignees. It was further alleged that the agent of appellant knew at the time of shipment of the terms of the contract between appellee and the consignees, Walker-Brewster Grocery Company, and of the importance of the stipulation in the bill of lad-ing allowing the said consignees the privilege of inspecting said potatoes before acceptance thereof by them. We think it clear from the petition that the title to the potatoes was not to pass until they were delivered at Kansas City, Mo., and the consignees had inspected and accepted the same. The petition did not show on its face that the title of the potatoes passed out of plaintiff by their delivery on board of the cars at Alba, Tex., and the court properly overruled the exceptions.

2. It is contended that the petition did not allege the proper measure of damages; that the true measure of damages was the difference in the market value of the potatoes at the time they should have been delivered to consignees in Kansas City and the time they were actually tendered to consignees. We do not concur in this contention. As stated, the petition alleged that at the time of the shipment the defendant company knew of the contract of sale between plaintiff and Walker-Brewster Grocery Company, and the importance of prompt delivery and of allowing consignees the privilege of inspection. The bill of lading delivered at the time to the plaintiff stated that inspection was to be allowed the consignees, but the waybill did not, by reason of the agent's negligence, mention this fact, and because of this failure the defendant refused to permit the consignees to inspect the same. The special terms of the contract between plaintiff and the consignees having been communicated to the carrier, the appellant became liable for the damages resulting from its breach. Express Co. v. Darnell, 62 Tex. 639; Wells Fargo Co. v. Battle, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 532, 24 S. W. 353.

3. Error is assigned to the court's action in overruling a demurrer to the petition, in effect, that the same was insufficient wherein it sought a recovery of defendant for the damages to the potatoes after they were turned over to Walker-Brewster Grocery Company. The shipment reached Kansas City on Friday morning of June 15th. The potatoes were delivered on the afternoon of Saturday, June 16th. They were not unloaded from the car until Monday, the 18th. The petition alleges that the potatoes were damaged by the sun and exposure to the weather. The consignees, Walker-Brewster Grocery Company, having the right of inspection before acceptance of the potatoes, and inspection having been refused by the appellant until too late to inspect or unload them on Saturday, and the consignees having unloaded them on Monday and disposed of them on commission, the carrier was responsible for the damages up to the time that the consignees took charge of the same on Monday morning. They were not required to unload the potatoes on Sunday to lessen the damage accruing to them by reason of appellant's negligence. There was no error in overruling the exception to the petition.

4. The seventh assignment of error is to the effect that the court erred in admitting as evidence, and considering in the rendering of his judgment, the two certificates of purchase attached to the deposition of C. E. Walker and marked "Exhibit A," over the objections of the defendant and the motion of the defendant to suppress and strike said certificates out, because said certificates did not of themselves show that they were correct and truthful statements of the expenses incurred in handling said potatoes by Walker-Brewster Grocery Company. The proposition presented under this assignment is that, the certificates of purchase attached to the deposition of the witness C. E. Walker failing to show on their faces that they were true and correct statements of the matter they purported to show, and the witness having failed to verify them as within his own knowledge to be true and correct records of the matters they purported to show, they were inadmissible as evidence on any issue in the case. C. E. Walker testified that he was president of Walker-Brewster Grocery Company, and resided at Kansas City; that the potatoes were in the cars on appellant's railroad tracks in Kansas City until Monday, the 18th of June, when they examined them, and found them in an inferior condition and beginning to rot; that they refused to accept them on the contract; that plaintiff then delivered them to his company to be handled on a consignment basis, and the railroad company was so instructed; that they were exposed to the sun and weather for four days, standing in defendant's yards; that the potatoes were damaged 33 cents per bushel on account of rot and unfitness for market; that after the potatoes were turned over to them to be handled on consignment, they disposed of them on consignment for account of plaintiff, and rendered an account of sales on this basis, charging him regular commission. There were two certificates, one showing a sale of 303 sacks of potatoes sold on account of F. N. Hopkins, Alba, Tex., for $326, showing the charges of Walker-Brewster Grocery Company to be $32.65, and freight $126.40, leaving net proceeds, $167.55. The other showed a sale of 304 sacks of potatoes for $313, and charges of Walker-Brewster Grocery Company $31.50, and freight $118.80, net proceeds $162.90. Plaintiff testified that he received from Walker-Brewster Grocery Company $330.45 for the potatoes. Walker-Brewster Grocery Company, at the time they paid the plaintiff, also inclosed him an account of sales, being the original account of sales, of which the certificates read in evidence were copies. The plaintiff in his pleading alleged that he turned the original account of sales over to the railroad, and notified the defendant to produce the same on trial, or secondary evidence of the contents of the same would be introduced by plaintiff. No objection was made to the certificates on the ground that they were not the originals. The objection to their introduction was that they were not verified by any one as being true and correct. The certificates purported on their face to be accounts of sale of potatoes sold by Walker-Brewster Grocery Company for the account of F. N. Hopkins, of Alba, Tex. The number of sacks correspond with the number of sacks specified in the bills of lading. They show that the potatoes sold for an aggregate sum of $634; that the grocery company charged for its services $63.95, which the testimony shows was the usual charge. The freight was $341.45, leaving the net proceeds, $330.45. The evidence was that the market value of potatoes in Kansas City on Monday, June 18th, was 60 cents per bushel. It further shows that these potatoes had diminished 33 cents per bushel by exposure to the sun and weather while on the railroad tracks in Kansas City. There was no error in admitting the certificates in evidence.

The evidence was sufficient to support the judgment, and the same is affirmed.

Affirmed.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 24, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 14, 1908.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 634*)—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS — PERMIT TO DO BUSINESS IN THE STATE—EFFECT.

Rev. St. 1895, art. 745, requiring a foreign corporation to procure a permit to transact business in the state and providing that on obtaining such permit it shall enjoy the rights and privileges conferred on domestic corporations, does not fix the domicile of a foreign corporation in the state granting such permit, but merely places a foreign corporation holding such a permit on the same footing as domestic corporations in the transaction of its business.

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 666*)—ACTIONS—VENUE.

The venue of an action against a foreign corporation-obtaining a permit to transact business in the state as provided by Rev. St. 1895, art. 745, is fixed by article 1194, subd. 25, and the fact that a foreign corporation has taken out a permit to transact business in the state and has established its principal office in a county in the state does not require that a suit against it shall be brought in that county.

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 128*)—JUDGMENT—EQUITABLE RELIEF.

The court in a suit to enjoin the execution of a justice's judgment for want of jurisdiction over the person of defendant, entitled to be sued in another county, will presume that the evidence supported the judgment, and that the plea in abatement setting forth the right of defendant to be sued in another county was not sustained, but was properly overruled where the evidence is not set out in the petition.

6. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 128*)—JUDGMENT—INJUNCTION—PETITION.

A petition in a suit to enjoin the execution of a justice's judgment based on the erroneous overruling of defendant's plea of privilege to be sued in another county should set out the evidence in support of the plea and the evidence, if any, disproving it, and an allegation that petitioner proved the truth of the plea is insufficient, being at most the conclusion of the pleader.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 407; Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

7. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 128*)—JUDGMENT—EQUITABLE RELIEF—GROUNDS.

Where there was evidence both ways on the plea of privilege interposed by defendant in justice's court, and the justice in overruling the plea merely committed an error of law, the judgment rendered by him could not be enjoined.

8. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 128*)—JUDGMENT—EQUITABLE RELIEF—PLEADING.

A petition in a suit to enjoin the execution of a justice's judgment based on the improper overruling of defendant's plea of privilege to be sued in another county should allege the existence of a valid defense to the action and set out the facts of the defense, and a mere allegation that the answer showed a good defense was insufficient where the answer was a general denial.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; Richard Morgan, Judge.

Action by the Coca Cola Company and another against E. M. Allison and others to enjoin the levy of an execution on a justice's judgment. From a judgment dissolving the injunction as to the Coca Cola Company, but perpetuating the same as to the J. W. Crowder Drug Company, the Coca Cola Company appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Phillips and W. D. Simpson, for appellant.

BOOKHOUT, J. It appears from the petition that C. B. Gunn, a citizen of Wise county, Tex., brought suit in justice court of precinct No. 1 of Wise county against the Coca Cola Company, a corporation incorporated under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Georgia, on an account for $8.25. The defendant was cited, and appeared and filed its plea in abatement, alleging in substance that it is a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the state of Georgia; that it has now, and had prior to the filing of the suit, a permit to do business in the state of Texas; and that it has its principal office and place of business in the county of Dallas. The plea alleged that said defendant has never been a resident of Wise county, or in precinct No. 1 thereof, nor did it reside in or have its place of business or office, or have an agent or representative, in Wise county, Tex., or in justice precinct No. 1 of said Wise county, either at the time of filing of said suit, or before or since, nor has it ever resided or had its place of business or its general office or any office or ever had an agent or representative, in said precinct No. 1 of Wise county, or in Wise county, Tex. The plea negatived the existence of other grounds which might authorize the bringing of the suit in justice court of precinct No. 1 of Wise county. The plaintiff alleges that the justice of the peace overruled its plea in abatement, and proceeded to render judgment against it for the amount sued for. The petition does not show upon whom the citation issued by the justice of the peace was served, nor does it show that it was not served upon some one upon whom the statute authorized service. The contention of the appellant, as we understand it, is that a corporation incorporated under the laws of another state upon securing a permit to do business in this state is entitled to all the privileges and immunities of a domestic corporation, including the right to be sued in the county of its domicile, and that its domicile is the place of the location of its principal office. Article 745 of the Revised Statutes of 1895, provides, in substance: That a corporation for pecuniary profit organized under the laws of another state, desiring to transact business in this state, shall procure a permit from the Secretary of State to do so, and "on obtaining such permit it shall have and enjoy all the rights and privileges conferred by the laws of this state on corporations organized under the laws of this state." This statute was not intended to fix the domicile of a foreign corporation in this state. It only intends to place a foreign corporation, upon procuring a permit to do business in this state, upon the same footing as domestic corporations in the transaction of its business. The venue of suits against foreign corporations is fixed by subdivision 25 of article 1194 of the Revised Statutes of 1895. The fact that the appellant took out a permit to transact business in this state, and established its principal office in Dallas county, did not make it a domestic corporation or require suit against it to be brought in the justice's court of precinct No. 1 of Dallas county. It was a foreign corporation, and it could be sued in any court within this state having jurisdiction over the subject-matter in any county where the cause of action or a part thereof accrued, or in any county where such company may have an agency or representative, or in the county in which the principal office of such company may be situated, or, when the defendant corporation has no agent or representative in the state, then in the county where plaintiff resides. Mr. RAINEY, C. J., is not prepared to agree with this construction of the statute, but as the issue was raised by the plea in abatement as to whether the appellant had its principal office and place of business in Dallas county, and the evidence on this issue is not set out in the petition, it will be presumed that the evidence supported the justice's judgment, and that the plea in abatement in this respect was not sustained, but was properly overruled. He therefore agrees to the conclusion reached in the opinion.

The judgment of the justice of the peace being for less than $20, it could not be appealed from. If the judgment was void, then the district court had power to enjoin it. Railway Co. v. Rawlins, 80 Tex. 579, 16 S. W. 430. If the appellant was entitled to have the suit brought in Dallas county, and a proper plea of privilege to be sued in Dallas county was presented and ignored by the justice, or the evidence was all one way in the support of such plea and the justice arbitrarily overruled the same, then the district court, upon the matter being properly presented to it, had power to grant an injunction. Jennings v. Shiner (Tex. Civ. App.) 43 S. W. 276.

The petition alleges that the plea of privilege was presented to the justice and by him overruled. It further alleges that the petitioner presented his plea of privilege in the justice's court, "and proved the truth of the contents of the same." It does not set out the evidence tending to sustain the plea and state that there was no other evidence, or negative the fact that plaintiff also introduced evidence tending to disprove the plea. The allegation that appellant proved the truth of the contents of its plea is at most a conclusion of the pleader. The evidence in support of the plea should have been set out as well as that, if any, tending to disprove the allegations therein. If there was evidence both ways on the plea, and the justice of the peace in overruling the same simply committed an error of law, then the judgment could not be enjoined. Again, the petition alleges that appellant filed in the justice's court its answer subject to the ruling on its plea of privilege, which answer showed "a good and valid defense to the petition of said C. B. Gunn." This is the only allegation that we find in the petition that appellant has any defense to the account sued on in the justice court. Looking to the answer filed in the justice court, we find that a general denial is the only answer filed therein, except the plea of privilege. This allegation was insufficient in a suit asking for equitable relief. The petition should have alleged that the appellant had a valid defense to the cause of action sued on in the justice court, and set out the facts showing such defense. Foust v. Warren (Tex. Civ. App.) 72 S. W. 404.

Appellant filed a motion for new trial in the justice court on the ground that the judgment was contrary to law and contrary to, and not supported by, the evidence. This motion was not prosecuted or presented in that court, but overruled by operation of law. No question was raised by appellant in the trial court as to the power of the district court of Dallas county to grant this injunction, or to hear and determine the same, and none is raised in this court. We conclude that the trial court did not err in sustaining a general exception to the petition, and in dissolving the injunction and dismissing the cause as to appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 24, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 14, 1908.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 116*) — INSTRUCTIONS—DEFINITION OF TERMS.

In trespass to try title, the defense being the statute of limitations and that the deed under which plaintiff claimed was fraudulently procured, an instruction that if the jury believed that defendants executed the deed because of false representations, etc., and if they further believed that defendants had held peaceable and adverse possession of the tract for so long a period as 10 consecutive years next before filing of the suit, and such possession has been open, notorious, peaceable, distinct, continued, and inconsistent with the claims of all others, they should find for defendant, was sufficient, though not defining peaceable and adverse possession separately, and in the language of the statute.

2. DEEDS (§ 70*) — VALIDITY — FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS—RELIANCE ON REPRESENTATIONS.

If defendants in trespass to try title were induced to sign the deed under which plaintiffs claimed by fraudulent representations, and would not have signed it but for such representations, defendants could recover, and it was not essential that the false representations were the sole inducement to its execution, if it would not have been executed but for such representations.

† Writ of error denied by Supreme Court.

Appeal from District Court, Hill County; W. C. Wear, Judge.

Trespass to try title by H. R. Stoker against A. B. Fugitt and wife. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.

A. M. Frazier and Vaughan & Hart, for appellant. Morrow & Smithdeal, for appellees.

TALBOT, J. This case was before us on a former appeal, 102 S. W. 743. The action is in form of trespass to try title, and involves the title to about 22⁹⁰/₁₀₀ acres of land. The litigation grows out of a dispute as to the true location of a division line. It seems that appellant, who was the plaintiff below, with the knowledge of appellees, in company with the county surveyor, J. F. Wright, went upon the land, surveyed it, and established the line where appellant claims it should be. After the land was surveyed by Wright, he went to the home of appellees and prepared a partition deed in accordance with the survey he had made, and appellees signed and acknowledged it, the acknowledgments being taken by Wright, he being a notary public. This deed was dated April 24, 1906, and was also signed and acknowledged by appellant. To appellant's petition appellees pleaded not guilty, the statutes of three, five, and ten years' limitation, and specially that said deed of April 24, 1906, was without consideration and procured by the false representations of appellant and the said Wright, and that said Wright was acting as the agent of appellant in the transaction. They prayed that said deed be canceled. On the 20th day of September, 1907, a trial before the court and jury resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of the defendants, and the plaintiff has appealed.

Appellant's first assignment of error complains of the court's action in refusing to give his special charge No. 1. The issues made by the evidence and submitted to the jury were whether or not appellees were induced to execute the instrument dated April 24, 1906, by the false representations of appellant, and whether or not appellees had held peaceable and adverse possession of the land in controversy for 10 years next prior to the institution of this suit. The special charge refused undertakes to present the law upon both of these issues, and among other things, defined "peaceable possession" and "adverse possession," and instructed the jury, in effect, that, before they would be authorized to find that the said instrument was invalid on account of false representations of material facts made by the appellant to procure it, they must believe that such representations were the sole inducement to its execution. The court charged the jury as follows: "If you believe from the preponderance of the evidence that the witness, J. F. Wright, in the presence and hearing of the plaintiff, H. R. Stoker, made to the said W. B. Fugitt and his wife, M. A. Fugitt, any false statement or statements as to the purpose or effect of the instrument which purports to effect a settlement and fix the boundary line between the plaintiff and defendants, dated April 24, 1906, and signed by the plaintiff, H. R. Stoker, and the defendants, W. B. Fugitt and his wife, M. A. Fugitt, and that the same were false statements as to some material fact or facts, and that the said Fugitt and his wife believed said statements to be true and were induced thereby to sign said instrument, and that but for such representations they would not have signed the same, and you further believe from the preponderance of the evidence that the defendants have had and held peaceable and adverse possession of the tract of land described in plaintiff's second amended original petition for as long a period of time as 10 consecutive years next before the filing of this suit, viz., May 12, 1906, and that such possession has been open, notorious, peaceable, distinct, continued, and inconsistent with the claims of everybody else, you will find a verdict in favor of the defendants and so say." While this general charge of the court did not define "peaceable possession" and "adverse possession" separately and in the very language of the statute, and while it would have been better to have done so, yet we think the charge presented the law of the case with sufficient accuracy and clearness to meet the demands of the statute and to protect the rights of the appellant. Upon the issue of whether or not the execution of the instrument of April 24th, on the part of appellees, was procured by the alleged false representations made by appellant, the special charge was, we think, erroneous in requiring the jury to find that the appellees were solely induced by such representations to make said instrument. The general charge instructed the jury that if appellees were induced by such representations to sign said instrument, "and that but for such representations they would not have signed the same, etc., to find for them." This was a full and correct application of the law to the facts, as we understand it, and the word "induced" should not have been qualified by the word "solely," as was done in the special charge. If appellees would not have signed the instrument in question but for the false representations alleged, then they should not be held bound by it, although some other consideration operated in part as an inducement to its execution. It was not essential to their recovery that the false representations were the sole inducement.

The fourth assignment complains that the court erred in refusing to charge the jury, at his request, "that false representations are never presumed, but, like any other fact in issue, must be established by legal and competent evidence." It may be conceded that the charge announces a correct general proposition, but we are of opinion that it was properly refused in this case because not called for by the evidence.

We have carefully examined the evidence, and believe that it is sufficient to support the judgment, and finding no reversible error in the record, it will be affirmed.

HANSEN v. WILLIAMS et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 28, 1908. On Rehearing, Nov. 18, 1908.)

1. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTIONS AS TO FACTS.

Where, in an action for a broker's commission on a sale of real estate, there was conflicting testimony as to whether the owner had imposed a specified condition on the sale, an instruction that if the broker was informed by a subagent that he, in making the trade with a purchaser had failed to state such condition, and that the earnest money was turned back to the purchaser and the trade declared off on such understanding, the verdict should be for defendant, was properly refused, as assuming a fact in dispute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420-435; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

It is not error to refuse a requested instruction covered by the charge given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

3. BROKERS (§ 85*)—COMMISSIONS—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for a broker's commission, the owner testified that he had placed the property in the broker's hands for sale for a certain price, net, and the broker testified that the owner had not stated that the price was to be net, the owner could not corroborate his testimony by evidence that, at a time when he said that the price was all right he knew that the broker had been trying to sell the property in connection with other property in the vicinity, and that he thought that the broker would get compensation through the sale of the other property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1056*)—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for a broker's commission, the court charged the jury to find for defendant if they found that a specified condition had been stated by defendant to a subagent of the broker, the exclusion of evidence that the owner relied on the fact that the subagent had made the sale on such condition was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 1056.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 589*)—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY—TESTIMONY OF PARTY.

Where a broker suing for a commission testified that 5 per cent. commission was the customary compensation, and defendant did not adduce any evidence on the subject, the court did not err in taking the testimony of the broker as undisputed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2438; Dec. Dig. § 589.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 220*)—ADMISSIONS—FAILURE TO DENY STATEMENTS BY OTHERS.

Where, in an action for a broker's commission on the sale of real estate, the owner and a subagent of the broker testified that in an interview at which the broker was not present, the owner authorized the subagent to sell on a specified condition, which the owner had not mentioned at any other time, statements subsequently made in the presence of the broker in which such condition was referred to, without contradiction by him, could not be construed as an admission that such condition had been imposed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 771-778; Dec. Dig. § 220.*]

On Rehearing.

7. BROKERS (§ 88*)—COMMISSIONS—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for a broker's commission on the sale of real estate, the court charged that the jury should find for defendant if a specified condition had been imposed for the sale, and a sale was made without reference thereto, an instruction that if the broker by himself or through his subagent, produced a purchaser ready and able and willing to buy on the terms agreed on between the broker and the owner, the owner was liable, was not misleading, for, if the specified condition had been imposed, the charge required proof that the sale had been effected accordingly.

Appeal from El Paso County Court; Albert S. Eylar, Judge.

Action by Wash Williams and another against J. C. Hansen. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. B. Elfers and Millard Patterson, for appellant. Atlas Jones, for appellees.

JAMES, C. J. This is an action for a broker's commission in respect to the sale of certain lots.

The second assignment complains of the refusal of this instruction: "If you believe from the evidence that after the evening of January 24, 1907, South was informed by Young that he, Young, in making the trade with Pitman had failed to state the condition that the lots should be graded by the purchaser and that the earnest money, $100, was turned back to Pitman and the trade declared off upon such understanding, you will find for the defendant." There being evidence that such condition had not been imposed by the owner, Hansen, prior to the closing of the trade, the instruction was properly refused. The charge assumed the fact that the grading was a condition upon which the owner had authorized the sale. It appears from Hansen's own testimony that he had authorized a sale by South of the lots at $2,700, net cash, and that on the 24th of January he went to the office of Williams and South and announced that if they were not sold by 5 p. m. he would withdraw them. That he returned to said office a little prior to that hour and found the lots had not been sold, and told Williams he would withdraw the lots. South was not then present, and at that time Young (subagent of South) came up and asked for 20 minutes more in which to sell the lots, and Hansen stated: "That all depends

If the party does not grade them, I would not give you two minutes." That Young went off, and shortly came back to the office with Pitman, the purchaser. The witness Hansen testified that he had never said anything to South about the grading of the lots, and when the trade was concluded with Pitman on the last occasion in said office that nothing was said about grading. Some days after witness and Young got South, and they all went to Pitman, and Hansen asked Pitman if he was going to grade the lots, and Pitman said he was not, as he had not purchased on that condition. Young then said that Hansen had told him to sell the lots to a purchaser who would agree to grade them and that he had, in the hurry, neglected to tell Pitman. As Pitman refused to perform that condition he demanded his $100 earnest money, and that South and Young then agreed to return the earnest money. Young testified that, when he had asked for 20 minutes more time, Hansen said he would give it if the lots were sold to a purchaser who would agree to grade them. But Williams, who both Hansen and Young stated was present on that occasion, testified that he heard everything said by Hansen to Young, and that Hansen said nothing about grading the lots. As neither Hansen nor Young claimed that Hansen had ever done so on any other occasion, it is apparent that there was a conflict of evidence on that subject, and that the charge would clearly have been wrong.

The third assignment is that the court should have given this instruction: "You are charged that in the transaction mentioned in this evidence the defendant Hansen, under the undisputed evidence, had the right to treat the subagent, Young, as his own agent, and, if you believe that Young failed to state to Pitman the condition (if such condition was imposed) that the purchaser should grade the property, you will find for the defendant." The charge given contained the substance of this instruction.

The fourth assignment complains of rejected testimony of Hansen which would have been to the effect that on the evening of the 24th, when the check of $100 given by Pitman was being discussed, and Hansen said that the price was all right, he (Hansen) knew that South had been trying to sell the property of witness in block 48, Alexander's addition, in connection with other property in the same vicinity involving several thousand dollars, and that he (witness) thought at that time that South would get any compensation he might receive in effecting the sale, through the sale of the other property of witness, and that he (witness) did not at any time have the idea in his mind that any commission should be paid by him upon the $2,700 named in the check. It appears that Hansen had testified that he had placed the property in South's hands for sale for $2,700, net to him. South testified that he had not stated that this price was to be net. It hardly needs discussion to decide that Hansen was not entitled to corroborate himself by such testimony as that above mentioned.

The fifth is that the court erred in excluding Hansen's testimony to the effect that when, on the evening of January 24th, he said the check for $2,700 was all right, he thought and relied on the fact that Young had made the sale upon the condition that Pitman should grade the lots. The refusal of this did not injure defendant, for the reason that the jury were charged absolutely to find for defendant if they found that the condition had been stated to Young.

The sixth is that the court erred in charging that if they found for plaintiff, to find for the amount sued for. This was 5 per cent. commission. The proposition is that, as South was the only witness who testified as to the customary compensation, and that the same was 5 per cent., and as South was an interested party, and was testifying as an expert, the court should have left it to the jury to discredit him, and to form their own conclusion about the compensation to which plaintiff was entitled, if anything. The witness was testifying to a fact. We think the court did not err in taking it as undisputed, the testimony being as to a fact which could readily have been disproved if not true, and defendant not seeing fit to adduce any testimony on the subject.

Other assignments raise this question. It appears that, a few days after the 24th, Young and Hansen and South had the interview with Pitman, in which Young and Hansen had the discussion with Pitman concerning the grading of the lots, and which resulted in South and Young giving the check for earnest money back to Pitman. The complaint is of a special charge given at plaintiff's request which instructed the jury to "disregard any statements made by Young or Hansen as to the grading of the lots after the deal was closed with Pitman, for the reason that the evidence does not show that South ever consented or admitted that said statements were true, and for the further reason that they are irrelevant and inadmissible." The real issue after all was whether or not Hansen, on the evening of the 24th, imposed the condition of grading the lots, when he authorized Young to sell in 20 minutes. It is not attempted to be claimed that the condition was imposed at any other time, or had been mentioned by Hansen at any other time. It was established, however, that South was not present on that occasion. There is no evidence that he had been informed of any such condition. In these circumstances he was not called upon and could not be expected to contradict Young when he admitted in the interview a few days after that Hansen had told him to sell on that condition but that he had forgotten it. What was said on that subject by Young or Hansen, or what was done on that occasion with the check under such circumstances, was not evidence against South as to the fact of imposing the condition. His conduct on that occasion could not be construed as an admission of that fact. Hansen and Young testified fully concerning the only interview at which it was ever claimed that Hansen had told Young to sell upon the condition that the lots should be graded, and the declaration afterwards in his presence could affect plaintiff only when made under circumstances in which there would be ground for saying that he had admitted their truth, and this could not be when it appeared that he had no knowledge of the subject one way or the other at the time. The charge was properly given.

The assignment No. 1 relates to a peremptory charge asked for by defendant. This was properly refused.

Affirmed.

On Rehearing.

The opinion is objected to as not passing on an assignment which complained of a charge in effect that if the jury believed that plaintiffs by themselves or through a subagent, produced to Mr. Hansen, in the person of Mr. Pitman, a purchaser ready, able and willing to buy upon the terms agreed on between the plaintiffs and defendant, then defendant would be liable to plaintiffs for the amount they have sued for. The charge was a correct statement of the law. If the condition of grading the lots had been imposed, then the above charge required proof that the sale had been effected accordingly. The jury could not have been misled by said charge, when the whole charge is considered, especially the emphatic instruction to find for defendant if said condition had been imposed and the sale to Pitman had been made without reference to it.

The motion is overruled.

HOWELL v. DENTON.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 17, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 7, 1908.)

1. BROKERS (§ 80*)—ACTIONS FOR COMPENSATION—DEFENSES.

Where a contract specifically authorized the sale of a tract of land containing a certain number of acres, and it does not appear that prior to the sale the owner claimed, or that the agent knew that there was a greater number of acres in the tract, evidence that the tract did contain a greater number of acres is inadmissible to defeat an action for commissions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Dec. Dig. § 80.*]

2. BROKERS (§ 88*)—ACTIONS FOR COMPENSATION—FINDINGS—CONSTRUCTION.

Findings of fact, in an action for commissions for the sale of land, that the purchasers to whom the agent sold took 320 acres did not limit the amount of land sold to 320 acres so as to defeat the action, the authority being to sell 327 acres, where in answer to another question, if there was an excess over 320 acres, to state how many acres of such excess each of the purchasers agreed to take, the jury found that one purchaser agreed to take 3½ acres and another 3½ acres.

Appeal from Hill County Court; N. J. Smith, Judge.

Action by George N. Denton against J. W. Howell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Vaughan & Hart and Works & McKee, for appellant. Morrow & Smithdeal, for appellee.

TALBOT, J. Appellee brought this suit to recover of appellant $490.50, alleged to be due him as commissions for selling land belonging to appellant. This is the third appeal in the case. 68 S. W. 1002, 87 S. W. 221. The terms of the contract in the main relied upon by appellee for his authority to sell the land as he did are embraced in the letters that passed between him and appellant, the most important one bearing date August 28, 1900. This letter was written by appellant to appellee in reply to a letter in which appellee stated, "I have a number of parties who like your place if they could get it cut in tracts of from 100 to 160 acres"—and so much of it as is necessary to quote is as follows: "Yours of the 27th received, and will say that cannot cut the place as desired, unless all is taken. * * * Will sell the south 163½ acre tract for $32.50 and the end 163½ acre tract for $27.50, or will cut 200 off south end for $32.50, provided the north 127 is taken at $26.00 per acre; in other words, will sell the north 127 for $26.00 per acre and the south end 200 for $32.50 per acre, provided all is taken. Will not cut unless all is taken." On November 26, 1900, appellee, as evidenced by a written contract, sold 100 acres of said land to G. D. Hill at $30 per acre, to C. H. Stamphill 100 acres at $33 per acre; to Geo. B. Helton 60 acres at $25 per acre, and to C. L. Hardison 60 acres at $30 per acre, aggregating 320 acres, the said Helton and Hardison agreeing to take all the land in the tract over and above said 320 acres, and by verbal contract obligating themselves to pay $30 per acre for such overplus. The contract showing the above sales of the land, together with a letter from appellee asking if it was necessary for appellant to come down to measure the land, and stating that the parties were willing to take it at appellant's figures of 327 acres in the whole tract, was promptly sent to appellant, and he refused to recognize the trade and to make the deeds. On the last trial of the case in the lower court it was submitted on special issues and resulted in a judgment in favor of appellee for the sum of $490.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes 50, from which appellant has appealed to this court.

Among other questions submitted for the determination of the jury were the following: "How many acres of land were there in the tract of land that defendant placed with the plaintiff to sell for him as his agent? How many acres, if any, were there in said tract of land in excess of 320?" To the first of these questions the jury answered, 327, and to the second they replied, 7, acres. The defendant (appellant here) moved the court to set aside and hold for naught these findings, upon the ground that they were wholly without evidence to support them and his motion was by the court sustained. Upon other issues submitted to the jury they found that the appellee sold to Hill, Stamphill, Hardison, and Helton, respectively, the number of acres of land aggregating 320 acres, as stated in the contract sent to appellant immediately after said sales were made, and appellant testified that after the second trial of this case, and not before, he, with the assistance of his nephew and another young man, measured the said land, and that according to their measurement and figures the tract contained 358 acres.

It is contended that, having set aside the findings of the jury to the effect that the tract of land in question contained 327 acres and that the excess over 320 was 7 acres, the other findings were insufficient to authorize the judgment rendered, and that judgment should have been entered for appellant, that this was especially true in view of the jury's findings that Hill, Stamphill, Helton, and Hardison had agreed to take so many acres each aggregating 320 acres, and the testimony of appellant that according to his measurement of the land the tract contained 358 acres, all of which appellee had not contracted to sell. In this view of the case we do not concur. We think the court was clearly in error in striking out the findings of the jury referred to, but the other findings amply support the judgment rendered. The judgment is not in conflict with the jury's findings or verdict, but in accord with such findings.

But, aside from this view, it seems that the judgment rendered was the only proper one that could have been rendered. Appellant's letter, dated August 28, 1900, called for a tract of land containing 327 acres, and expressly authorized appellee to sell that number of acres. It provided into what size tracts the land might be cut up, and the prices for which such several tracts might be sold, and it does not appear that prior to the time appellee contracted to sell the same that appellant claimed, or that appellee knew, that there was a greater number of acres in the tract than 327 acres. On the contrary, the evidence is practically conclusive that appellee did not know that there were more than 327 acres (if they were), and that no such claim was asserted by appellant before the sales made by appellee. This being true, and the letter of appellant of August 28th being unambiguous and specifically authorizing appellee to sell a tract of land containing 327 acres, evidence to show that the tract did in fact contain more than that amount of land was inadmissible. Because of the admission of such testimony the case was reversed by the Court of Civil Appeals at Austin on a former appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of appellant. In reversing the case the court said: "This testimony was admitted * * * in support of appellee's theory [appellant here], to the effect that, as there was more than 327 acres in the tract, he was not bound by the sale made by Denton, and therefore not liable to Denton for the commissions claimed. We are of the opinion that this evidence was not admissible. As said before, the terms of the letter of August 28th are definite and specific. It authorizes Denton to sell a tract of land of 327 acres, and the evidence falls to show that the appellee asserted any claim to a greater quantity of land prior to the time that Denton made the sale. The written contract embraced in the letters could not be controlled and affected by the evidence offered by Howell to the effect that there was more land in the tract than 327 acres." We concur in the views of the Court of Civil Appeals at Austin, as here expressed, and find no evidence in the record that would justify a change or modification of such holding. Besides, the findings of the jury, other than those stricken out by the court upon appellant's motion, show an excess in the tract of only seven acres. These findings further show, as was alleged, that Hardison and Helton each took $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres of said excess at \$30 per acre. The contention that the jury's findings in answer to questions 4, 5, 6, and 7 affirmatively limited the amount of land sold to 320 acres is not sustained, we think, by the record. In addition to these issues, question 8, propounded to the jury, is to the effect that, if there was an excess in the tract of land over and above 320 acres, then say how many acres of such excess each of the purchasers agreed to take, to which they replied, Hill, none, Stamphill, none, Helton, $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres, and Hardison, $3\frac{1}{2}$ acres. It is clear, therefore, that the jury's findings comprehended 327 acres as the whole number of acres in the tract.

The other assignments are practically disposed of adversely to appellant by what has already been said, and need not be discussed. Our conclusions lead to affirmance of the judgment of the court below, and it is so ordered.

Affirmed.

ST. LOUIS SOUTHWESTERN RY. CO. OF TEXAS v. LONG.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 22, 1908.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 12, 1908.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 218*)—RIGHTS OF PARTIES—INJURIES BY THIRD PERSONS.

If an embankment as constructed by a railroad company created a permanent nuisance, causing constant or regularly recurring injury to adjoining land, a cause of action then arose in favor of the then owner of the land for all damages then caused or which might in the future be caused to the land by such embankment, so long as it was maintained in an unchanged condition, so that a subsequent owner would have no cause of action for damages suffered because of the embankment after he became owner, unless resulting from a change in the embankment, which change would have to be alleged by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 456; Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 218*)—RIGHTS OF PARTIES—INJURIES BY THIRD PERSON.

The overflows onto adjoining land of water obstructed by defendant railroad company's embankment on its land being neither constant nor regularly recurring, the right of action for any future overflow accrues at the time thereof to the then owner of the adjoining land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 456; Dec. Dig. § 218.*]

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 218*)—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

The nuisance to adjoining land because of a railroad embankment not being permanent, neither the recovery against the railroad company, on the theory of a permanent nuisance, by the one owning the land at the time of the construction, nor his release to the company of any future damages, will defeat the cause of action of one buying the land without notice or knowledge of such judgment or release for subsequent overflows of the land from insufficient culverts and sluiceways to carry off the water obstructed by the embankment.

Error in including in the judgment a certain item of damages, in the absence of pleading authorizing it, may be cured by remittitur.

Appeal from District Court, Fannin County; Ben H. Denton, Judge.

Action by J. H. Long against the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed on condition of remission of damages.

This suit was commenced by appellee against appellant by a petition filed July, 7, 1907. The appeal is prosecuted by the latter from a judgment for the sum of $560.25 in favor of the former. The trial was before the court without a jury; and from the record it appears that the court found as facts: (1) That by purchase of one Wilson on October 6, 1904, appellee became, and thereafterwards and at the date of the trial, was, the owner and in possession of the land described in his petition, and lying north of and contiguous to appellant's right of way, on which in 1888 it had constructed and there afterwards maintained as its roadbed a dump or embankment about 2½ feet in height. (2) That in the construction of said dump, and in the maintenance thereof thereafterwards, appellant had neglected to provide culverts and sluiceways sufficient to carry off the water obstructed in its natural flow by said embankment, and, as a result, appellee's land and crop growing thereon were injured and destroyed by water so obstructed in its natural flow. (3) That said embankment and its culverts and sluiceways remained as constructed in 1888, except that as originally constructed a ditch or barrow pit was provided along the north part of appellant's right of way, adjoining appellee's land, which, when kept well opened, furnished reasonable protection to said land from water obstructed by said embankment. (4) That after the railway had been so constructed the ditch or barrow pit gradually filled up, but was opened up about 1898, when it again began to fill up, and by the beginning of 1906 was so filled up as not to furnish protection against water obstructed in its natural flow by said embankment. (5) That, as the result of water obstructed by said embankment overflowing and washing his land and the crops growing thereon during the years 1906 and 1907, said land was "permanently damaged and depreciated in value" in the sum of at least $100, his corn crop was damaged in the sum of $40, and his cotton crops in the sum of $660, less the sum of $199.75, which would have been the cost of growing, etc., said crops. The court further found that some time prior to April 28, 1893, one Queener, who at the time the embankment was constructed owned the land, had sued appellant and recovered against it a judgment for damages to said land and crops growing thereon sustained by him prior to the institution of his suit by reason of appellant's failure to provide sufficient culverts and sluiceways to carry off the water obstructed in its natural flow by said embankment, and that in 1898 said Queener, then still being the owner of the land, had entered into a written contract with appellant whereby, for a sufficient consideration, he had released to appellant all claim for damages theretofore or which might thereafterwards be sustained by him by reason of overflows caused, or which might be caused by water overflowing his land because obstructed in its natural flow by said embankment. The court further found that appellee had neither actual nor constructive notice of the judgment recovered by Queener against appellant in 1893, nor of the release by Queener in 1898 of damages which might thereafterwards result to the land and crops growing thereupon as the result of overflows, but was a purchaser in good faith from Wilson, to whom Queener had conveyed, of the land for a valuable consideration paid by him to said Wilson. We adopt as our own the findings of the trial court, so far as specified above.

McReynolds & Hay and Head, Dillard & Head, for appellant, McGrady & McMahon, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). If it should be said from the record, in face of the finding of the trial court to the contrary necessarily included in the judgment rendered, that the embankment as constructed by appellant created a permanent nuisance, causing constant or regular recurring injury to the land in question, the contention made by appellant that at the time the embankment was constructed a cause of action arose in favor of Queener, then the owner of the land, for all damages caused or which might in the future be caused to his land by the embankment, so long as it was maintained in an unchanged condition, would be a sound one. Rosenthal v. Taylor B. & H. Ry. Co., 79 Tex. 325, 15 S. W. 268; Railroad Co. v. Barry, 98 Tex. 248, 251, 83 S. W. 534. And it would follow that, the right to recover such damages having accrued to Queener as the owner of the land at the time the embankment was constructed, a right of action could not accrue to appellee for damages suffered by him after he became the owner of the land, unless such damages were suffered by him as the result of a change occurring in the condition of the embankment. And it would further follow, appellee's petition failing to allege such a changed condition, the judgment in his favor could not be sustained by this court, notwithstanding evidence in the record showing that a change sufficient to account for the injury to his land claimed to have been suffered by him had occurred in the provision made when it was constructed for carrying off the water obstructed by the embankment. But we think the record does not make such a case. On the contrary, as we view it, the evidence authorized the conclusion which must have been reached by the trial court that the overflows from water obstructed by the embankment were neither constant nor regularly recurring. If they were not, then the nuisance was not of a character to entitle the owner of the land at the time the embankment was constructed to sue for and recover damages which might thereafterwards be suffered as the result of overflows caused by it. The right of action for damages which might be caused by such future overflows would accrue as the overflows occurred in favor of the owner or owners of the land at the times they occurred. "The building of the embankment and culverts, as alleged," said the court in Railroad Co. v. Anderson, 79 Tex. 433, 15 S. W. 485, 23 Am. St. Rep. 350, "was not of itself a nuisance. It was no invasion of plaintiff's rights. They were not put on his land. They became a nuisance only at intervals by diverting water from rainfalls from its natural flow upon plaintiff's land. The embankment and the culverts were permanent, but the nuisance was not. There was no constant and continuing injury." And see Bonner et al. v. Wirth, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 560, 24 S. W. 306; Railway Co. v. Davis (Tex. Civ. App.) 29 S. W. 484; Railway Co. v. Goldman, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 257, 28 S. W. 267; Railway Co. v. Lensing (Tex. Civ. App.) 75 S. W. 826; Railway Co. v. Caldwell (Tex. Civ. App.) 102 S. W. 461; Railway Co. v. Kyle (Tex. Civ. App.) 101 S. W. 272; Gramann v. Elcholtz, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 309, 81 S. W. 756.

Appellant, however, insists that, if the embankment did not create such a nuisance as entitled the then owner of the land to sue for and recover in one suit all damage it had caused or would cause in the future, Queener, the owner of the land at that time, nevertheless so treated it, and recovered in the suit brought in 1893 all such damages. Conceding that Queener in the suit referred to so treated the embankment, and after recovering the judgment in 1893 could not have maintained a suit for damages which may afterwards have been suffered by him, we do not think it follows that appellee could not maintain an action for damages suffered by him after he became the owner of the land. His rights in dealing with the land should be held to be controlled by the real character of the nuisance, and not by the character ascribed to it by the suit of which he had no knowledge instituted in 1893. If the nuisance created by the embankment was not a permanent one within the meaning of the law—if it was not such a nuisance as constantly injured the land—we do not think it should be held that, when appellee purchased the land of Queener, he took it burdened with a servitude in favor of appellant of which he had no notice. On the facts shown by the record we think he had a right to assume that no such servitude existed, and that the duty imposed by law on appellant to provide and maintain culverts and sluiceways sufficient to carry off the water obstructed by its roadbed (Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 4436; Clark v. Dyer, 81 Tex. 343, 6 S. W. 1061; Railway Co. v. Davis [Tex. Civ. App.] 29 S. W. 483) still rested upon appellant (Sellers v. Railway Co., 81 Tex. 458, 17 S. W. 32, 13 L. R. A. 657, 21 A. & E. Ency. Law [2d Ed.] 722).

Nor do we think there is merit in appellant's contention that the release of damages which might accrue to the land by reason of the embankment made by Queener in 1893 in favor of appellant should be held to operate to defeat appellee's cause of action. Appellee had no knowledge or notice of that transaction at the time he acquired the title to the land, and we think his rights were not affected by it. Webb, Record Title, par. 48; Blake v. Boye, 38 Colo. 55, 88 Pac. 470, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 418; Treadwell v. Inslee, 120 N. Y. 458, 24 N. E. 651; Taggart v. Warner, 88 Wis. 1, 53 N. W. 33.

In the absence of pleadings authorizing it, the court found and rendered judgment in appellee's favor for the sum of $40 as damages suffered by him by the destruction in 1906 of his corn crop growing on the land, caused by an overflow of water diverted by the embankment. The error can be cured by a remittitur filed here. The judgment of this court, therefore, will be that the judgment of the lower court be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial, unless the appellee within 20 days from the date thereof shall remit of the amount of the judgment in his favor the sum of $40, in which event the judgment of the lower court will be reformed and affirmed for the sum of $520.25.

ST. LOUIS SOUTHWESTERN RY. CO. OF TEXAS v. WILBANKS.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 31, 1908.)

1. TRIAL (§ 235*) — INSTRUCTIONS — CLERICAL ERROR.

An instruction that certain circumstances constituted a "prima case of negligence" on defendant's part must have been understood to mean that they constituted a prima facie case, and was therefore not objectionable because of the clerical error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 235.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 465*) — FIRES — PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Where fire was communicated from defendant's locomotive to the house of O., and from thence spread to plaintiff's dwelling house and outbuildings, defendant's negligence in permitting the fire to escape was the proximate cause of the burning of plaintiff's buildings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1690; Dec. Dig. § 465.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 478*) — FIRES — PLEADING.

A petition against a railroad company for destruction of plaintiff's buildings by fire alleged to have escaped from defendant's locomotive was not required to specify with particularity the facts which were the immediate cause of the fire's escape.

Appeal from District Court, Henderson County; B. N. Gardner, Judge.

Action by J. G. Wilbanks against the St. Louis Southwestern Railway Company of Texas. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

On the 20th of August, 1906, appellee instituted this suit in the district court of Henderson county to recover of appellant the value of a five-room dwelling house, smokehouse, chicken house, and fencing, situated in the town of Malakoff, in Henderson county, Tex., belonging to appellee, and alleged to have been destroyed by fire through the negligence of appellant. On the 5th day of September, 1907, the case was tried in said district court of Henderson county, and resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of appellee in the sum of $550. Motion for new trial was presented and overruled on the 4th day of October, 1907. The defendant perfected an appeal.

E. B. Perkins, Daniel Apthegrove, R. S. Neblett, and W. R. Bishop, for appellant. Watkins, Green & Richardson, for appellee.

BOOKHOUT, J. There is no error in the first paragraph of the charge, as complained of in the first assignment of error. It is conceded that there is a clerical error in the transcript in copying the charge. The charge actually delivered reads as follows: "You are instructed that, if, from the evidence, you believe that sparks of fire escaped from the defendant's engine or engines, and set fire to the house of one Odom, and that said fire was communicated to the five-room cottage, smokehouse and chicken house, and yard and lot fence of plaintiff, and thereby burned up said houses and fence, then such facts constitute a prima case of negligence on the part of defendant, and in the absence of rebutting evidence, sufficient to overcome such prima facie case of negligence, will render the defendant liable for the injury occasioned thereby." It is clear from a reading of the charge that by the use of the words "prima case of negligence" the court meant prima facie case of negligence, and the jury must have so understood it. The charge taken as a whole is correct, and appellant's criticism to the same is not sustained. Railway Co. v. Johnson, 92 Tex. 591, 50 S. W. 563.

Error is assigned to the overruling of defendant's fifth special demurrer to the petition, to the effect that plaintiff's petition is insufficient, because it appears that the negligence of which plaintiff complains is the remote, and not the proximate, cause of the destruction of the house and property described in plaintiff's petition. The same contention is presented under another assignment, which complains of the court's action in refusing a special charge embracing the proposition embraced in this exception, to the effect that the proof shows that the house of appellee was not set fire by sparks thrown or emitted from the engine of defendant, but shows that appellee's house was destroyed by a fire which was communicated to it from the house of one Odom. The court, therefore, should have instructed the jury that even if the Odom house, from which appellee's house was fired, was set on fire by the negligence of appellant, still such negligence was the remote, and not the proximate, cause, and for it appellant could not be liable, and therefore the court erred in refusing the special charge requested to that effect. The contention is not sustained. The petition and evidence show that the fire was set by the railroad company to the house of one Odom, and then spread from the Odom house to the dwelling house, smokehouse, chicken house, and fencing of plaintiff, all of which were burned. The principle contended for was decided against appellant by this court in the case of Railway v. Gentry (Tex. Civ. App.) 80 S. W. 845. We there held that where fire was set out by the negligence of the railroad company, which spread over intervening property owned by different proprietors and finally reached plaintiff's property destroying it, the company was liable, and that the negligence of the railroad company in setting the fire was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's damage. In the case now before us there was no intervening agency for the spread of the fire. The sparks escaped from the defendant's engines and set the house of Odom on fire, and the fire from the house of Odom was directly communicated to the house of plaintiff. The allegations of the petition in charging the defects in the apparatus and machinery of defendant to prevent the escape of sparks were sufficient, as were also the allegations to the effect that defendant was negligent in the use of and handling of such machinery. The engine and apparatus to prevent the escape of fire was in the exclusive control of defendant, as was also the evidence as to how the engine was handled, and plaintiff was not required to specify with particularity the facts which were the immediate cause of the escape of the fire. Railway Co. v. Smith, 74 Tex. 276, 11 S. W. 1104; Railway Co. v. Easton, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 378, 21 S. W. 575. The contention of appellant that the court erred in overruling its special exceptions to the petition as to such allegations is not sustained.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 15, 1908.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 12, 1908.)

1. HOMESTEAD (§ 103*)—EXEMPTION—DURATION.

A judgment lien does not attach to the homestead of a judgment debtor so long as the property remains a homestead.

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 103*)—RIGHT TO—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—MATERIALITY.

In trespass to try title to land deeded to defendants by a judgment debtor and sold to plaintiff under the judgment, it was not error to refuse plaintiff a new trial for newly discovered evidence showing a record of an abstract of the judgment, where it appeared that the land remained the judgment debtor's homestead until conveyed by him, since, being a homestead, no judgment lien attached to the property, and hence the evidence could not affect the result of the suit.

Appeal from District Court, Hopkins County; R. L. Porter, Judge.

Trespass to try title by W. T. Savage against W. S. Cowan and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This was an action of trespass to try title to nine acres of land of the William H. Ravey survey, in Hopkins county, brought by the appellants, and to which the appellees filed a plea of not guilty. In a trial before the court without a jury judgment was rendered in favor of the appellees, and the appellant brings the case on appeal for review. It was admitted by all the parties to the suit that W. A. Patrick is the common source of title to the land in the suit. Appellant, who was plaintiff, read in evidence a judgment in the justice court in Dallas county, Tex., in favor of D. M. Osborne & Co., and against W. A. Patrick, for $169.64, with interest and costs, dated November 27, 1905; an alias execution issued on said judgment on the 16th day of November, 1906, to Hopkins county, Tex., and on the 21st day of November, 1906, levied on the land in suit as the property of W. A. Patrick; sale of the land under the levy and execution on the 1st day of January, 1907, by the constable to appellant for $50 cash, and payment of the money to the constable by appellant; a deed executed and acknowledged by the constable, making the levy and sale to appellant, conveying the land as levied on and in suit, dated January 1, 1907, and duly recorded in the clerk's office of Hopkins county January 10, 1907. The appellees read in evidence a deed executed and acknowledged by W. A. Patrick and his wife, Ella Patrick, to the appellees, conveying the land in suit, dated February 21, 1906, and duly filed for record in the clerk's office of Hopkins county on December 1, 1906, and recorded December 4, 1906. It was proven by the appellees that W. A. Patrick and his wife had continuously used and occupied the land in suit as their homestead previous to the levy and up to and at the time of their sale to appellees; that the appellees at the time of the purchase from Patrick and his wife took actual possession of the land, and continued in the actual possession of the premises through their tenants, M. M. Renfroe

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. & Am. Digs. 1907 to date, & Reporter Indexes and Logan Richardson, who each lived upon and occupied the premises under rental contract, and made and gathered a crop on the premises, and that Logan Richardson was on the premises at the date of the levy of the execution in evidence, and continued to live on the place under rental contract until the 1st day of January, 1907; that it was a part of the rental contract of appellees' tenants to house their rent portion of the corn, cotton, and potatoes on the premises, which was done, and same remained there housed on the premises from the time the crops were gathered until the first of the year 1907, and until Mrs. Mann, who had rented the premises from the appellees for 1907, moved there. It was proven by appellees that at the constable's sale C. E. Brown, one of the appellees, was present and gave notice that the land offered for sale belonged to the appellees. Appellant proved by his attorney that "just before the land in controversy was levied on I made inquiry as to whether the land was in any manner occupied by any person other than W. A. Patrick, and whether or not the same was claimed by any other person. I learned that W. A. Patrick did not claim or occupy the same at the time of the levy. I did not learn of any one else occupying or claiming the same at the time of said levy or immediately before."

Frank E. Scott, for appellant. D. Thornton, for appellees.

LEVY, J. (after stating the facts as above). Appellant's first and second assignments of error complain of the action of the court in overruling a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. The motion sets out that an abstract of judgment in favor of D. M. Osborne & Co. against W. A. Patrick recovered in the justice court of precinct 1, Dallas county, Tex., was properly and legally recorded in Hopkins county on December 29, 1905, and which was not discovered by appellant before the trial, and that the abstract of judgment is valid and fixed a lien on the land in controversy. It is an undisputed fact appearing in the record that before and at the date of the filing and recording of the abstract of judgment mentioned in the motion the land in controversy was the homestead of W. A. Patrick and his wife, and continued to be their homestead, without interruption or abandonment on their part, to the very day of the sale of the premises by them to the appellees. It is a settled rule of law in this state that a judgment lien does not extend or attach to the homestead of the judgment debtor as long as the property remains the homestead. The judgment lien would attach only when the property ceases to be the homestead, and remains the property of the judgment debtor. Marks v. Bell, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 587, 31 S. W. 699. Because of the proof that the property was the homestead of the judgment debtor, and never ceased to be the homestead to the date of the sale to appellees, and no contest to this evidence appearing in the motion or record, the refusal to grant a new trial to enable the introduction in evidence of the recorded abstract of judgment could not be ruled to operate as prejudicial or reversible error, because such evidence would not affect the result of the suit. The first and second assignments of error are therefore overruled.

By the remaining assignments of error it is complained of the sufficiency of the evidence to establish actual possession of the premises at the time of the levy of the execution, either by appellees themselves or through tenants. We think the evidence in the record supports the findings involved in the general finding of the trial court, that appellees, by tenants, were in actual possession and occupancy of the premises in suit at the time of the levy of the execution, and that such actual possession at the time of the levy of the execution was sufficient to give notice of appellees' ownership of the land. There is no question made as to the proof that Renfroe was a tenant of the appellees in actual possession of the premises. The precise terms of the agreement made between Renfroe, the tenant of the appellees, and Richardson, and "understood and recognized" by appellees in respect to the premises, are not defined in the evidence; but the course of dealing between the parties with respect to the premises and its use and occupancy tends to show that it was the intention of the parties to make a new relationship in respect to the premises. The act of Richardson and Renfroe after the agreement between themselves about the premises are consistent with the conclusion that Renfroe transferred and parted with all of his interest in the rented premises to Richardson for Richardson's service in finishing gathering the crop on the place, and this with the appellees' consent. Renfroe left the country, and vacated the premises and surrendered the rental contract to Richardson, and Richardson exclusively occupied and used the house and premises from that time in September, prior to the levy, until January 1st following, under the terms of the original rental contract made by the appellees with Renfroe, and the appellees so "understood and recognized." This evidence would support the finding that Renfroe transferred and parted with all his right under the rental contract to Richardson, and that Richardson took all the interest of Renfroe in the rented premises and occupied the same as the tenant of the appellees, and that the appellees agreed to the transfer or substitution of tenants. Even had the evidence established that Richardson was merely an employé or hired man of the tenant Renfroe, staying on the place and taking care of the crop and the place for him, as argued, yet this relationship would not so interrupt or be inconsistent with or show an abandonment of the tenancy relation of Renfro and appellees as could be regarded as insufficient to affect with notice of appellees' ownership of the land. As to the appellees, the legal consequence is that Renfro was still in possession and use of the premises as tenant of the appellees, notwithstanding he had hired or employed Richardson to stay on the place and take care of the same for him. In a suit by the appellees against Richardson to subject him to liability for the rent of Renfro, it might be successfully defended by Richardson on the grounds that he was occupying the premises merely as an employé of Renfro. We suggest, however, that, considered on the question of notice and the sufficiency of the circumstances to affect with notice, we are not prepared to rule that merely because Richardson's occupancy of the premises was as an employé of Renfro, the tenant of appellees, the plaintiff in execution in legal consequence was an innocent purchaser unaffected with notice of the ownership of the land. Such character of occupancy, as well as relationship, might be a sufficient circumstance and the means and reasonable information to put a person upon inquiry as to the title under which he holds the premises.

The case was ordered affirmed.

HILLMAN v. GALLIGHER et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 22, 1908.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 387*)—PROCEEDINGS FOR TRANSFER—FILING OF APPEAL BOND—TIME.

Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 1387, requires the appeal bond to be filed within 20 days after notice of appeal is given if the term of court may by law continue for more than eight weeks and appellant resides in the county, and by Acts 1907, p. 198, c. 100, a term of the district court in Bowie county may continue longer than eight weeks, if necessary. Appellant resided in Bowie county. Notice of appeal was given December 20th, but an appeal bond was not filed until February 19th, 60 days thereafter. Held, that the filing of the bond within the required time was essential to give the Court of Civil Appeals jurisdiction, and the appeal must be dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2003; Dec. Dig. § 387.*]

Appeal from District Court, Bowie County; P. A. Turner, Judge.

Action between J. W. Hillman and Dan Galligher and others. From a judgment, Hillman appealed. Appeal dismissed.

J. W. Hillman, in pro. per. Hart, Mahaffey & Thomas, for appellees.

WILLSON, C. J. The case is before us on a motion by appellee to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that, because of the failure of appellant to perfect his appeal by filing an appeal bond within the time permitted by law, this court has not acquired the power to hear and determine it. It appears that the judgment appealed from was rendered on the 17th day of December, 1907, and that the judgment overruling appellant's motion for a new trial was rendered December 20, 1907, when he gave notice of appeal. The term of the court at which the cause was tried commenced December 2, 1907, and ended January 30, 1908, having lasted by authority of law (Acts 1907, p. 198, c. 100) longer than eight weeks. It further appears that appellant at the time of the trial was a resident of Bowie county, where the cause was tried.

The motion must be sustained. Under the law the term of the court might have continued, and in fact did continue, for a period longer than eight weeks. Appellant, being a resident of the county where the cause was tried, was required to perfect his appeal by filing an appeal bond within 20 days after the date of the notice given by him of an appeal. Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 1387. The bond was not filed until the 19th day of February, 1908, or on the sixtieth day after the notice of appeal was given. The filing of the bond within the time permitted by law was necessary to confer jurisdiction of the appeal on this court. Sanger v. Burke (Tex. Civ. App.) 44 S. W. 871; National Bank v. Carper (Tex. Civ. App.) 67 S. W. 192.

Necessarily, therefore, the appeal must be dismissed.

RAINEY, C. J. The defendant in error sued plaintiffs in error to recover on a note executed by Mrs. S. E. Wright, wife of J. E. Wright, given for one piano. The petition alleged that Mrs. Wright was the agent of her husband, and represented that he would also sign the note; that he had never repudiated the contract; had accepted the piano, and thereby became bound, etc. A lien on the piano was alleged and foreclosure thereon prayed for. Defendant pleaded coverage of Mrs. Wright, general denial. J. E. Wright pleaded non est factum, in that he had not signed the note and had never authorized the signing of same. A trial before the court without a jury resulted in a judgment against both appellants as prayed for, and the case is here on appeal.

The evidence warranted the judgment against J. E. Wright and the foreclosure of the lien on the piano. The piano was delivered at the house of J. E. Wright to his wife, where it has ever since remained. Wright never repudiated the contract or offered to return the piano, but, on the other hand, refused to return it, and forbid the defendant in error from removing it from his house. The testimony shows that Wright accepted and ratified the contract. In Walling v. Hannig, 73 Tex. 580, 11 S. W. 547, a case involving the principles here involved, Judge Stayton says: "Marriage alone confers on the wife an agency under which she may buy necessities for herself and children if her husband fails to do so, but a further agency may be presumed from the conduct of the parties"—and then quotes from a distinguished English judge as follows: "When a husband is living in the same house with his wife, he is liable to any extent for goods which he permits her to receive there. She is considered as his agent, and the law implies a promise on his part to pay the value. If they are not cohabiting, then he is in general only liable for such necessities as from his situation in life it is his duty to supply her. But, even when they are parted, if the husband has any control over goods improvidently ordered by the wife so as to have it in his power to return them to the vendor, and he does not return them or cause them to be returned, he adopts her act and renders himself answerable." He then proceeds: "The evidence shows that the goods were used in his house for more than a year, and, after he was fully advised that they had been bought by his wife on a credit, he failed to return them or to offer to return them, unless upon condition that appellee would return the partial payments on the bill."

This settles the case against plaintiff in error J. E. Wright, and the judgment as to him is affirmed. The judgment against Mrs. S. E. Wright is a personal one, and in that respect it is error; she being a married woman. Under the facts shown she was not personally liable, and the judgment as to her personal liability is reversed and judgment here rendered in her favor. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed.

This was the claim of appellees, and they relied on circumstances to prove it, being unable to produce a deed from the original grantors, or a deed from their vendee Allen, Poole & Co., through whom appellees claim. Attached to a deed of assignment, made by Allen, Poole & Co. to B. A. Shepherd to secure their creditors, was a schedule of assets, in which appeared 640 acres in Liberty county, "patented to I. S. Fields, conveyed to Allen, Poole & Co." That deed was recorded on October 2, 1874. In July, 1881, a deed was made by the assignees to William P. Ballinger, conveying 640 acres of land out of the I. S. Fields survey, describing the 640 acres by metes and bounds. In that deed it was recited that the land conveyed was the same "conveyed by I. S. Fields to Rosena Menard by deed dated May 15, 1849, and from Emma G. Menard to Allen, Poole & Co. by deed dated January 21, 1871." The records of deeds of Liberty county were destroyed by fire in the year 1874. Appellees used due diligence in searching for the deeds from Isaiah Fields to Rosena Menard and from Emma G. Menard to Allen, Poole & Co., but they could not be found. Emma G. Menard was the only child of Peter and Rosena Menard, and when they died she inherited all of their property. The evidence showed, without contradiction, that the land in controversy was assessed for taxation by P. Menard, the husband of Rosena Menard, in 1854, and that it was so assessed every year from that time by said P. Menard or those claiming under him, including appellees. No claim was shown to have been made by the heirs of Isaiah Fields to the land until January 19, 1906, when Tompkins, their attorney in fact, executed a deed to appellant to a part of the land. The suit was instituted on January 26, 1907.

The court instructed the jury as follows: "You are charged that, unless you can presume a deed from Isaiah S. Fields to Rosena Menard after considering and weighing all the relevant facts and circumstances in evidence in this case, and applying the law given you to that feature of the case, then you are charged that the plaintiff is entitled to recover all the land in controversy, except the one-fifth interest which the plaintiff admits defendant is entitled to, and the proof shows such interest was conveyed by the Stevens heirs through their attorney in fact, Silas M. Johnson to ——. But if, following the instructions hereinafter given you as applicable to the question of presumption of a grant, you presume Isaiah S. Fields, on May 15, 1849, did execute a deed to said Rosena Menard to the land in controversy, then your verdict should be for the defendant. And, in determining the question as to whether or not the jury can presume a grant from Isaiah S. Fields to Rosena Menard, you will consider and weigh all the relevant facts and circumstances in evidence; and, if you find that from the relevant facts and circumstances in evidence it is more reasonably probable that Isaiah S. Fields did, on the 15th day of May, 1849, execute a deed to Rosena Menard to the land in controversy than that he did not execute such a deed, then the jury are at liberty to presume and find that such a deed was executed. But if you do not find that it is more reasonably probable that Isaiah S. Fields did execute such a deed than that he did not, then you are at liberty to presume such a deed, and in such case you will return a verdict for the plaintiff for all the land sued for, except the one-fifth interest of the Stevens heirs, which is admitted to be in the defendant, and as to which, should you find against the presumption of a deed from Isaiah S. Fields to Rosena Menard, you will return a verdict for the defendant."

It is claimed by appellant that the court committed fundamental error in submitting the case to the jury, because all the evidence was documentary, and it was the duty of the court to decide as to the legal effect of the evidence and instruct a verdict for one party or the other in consonance with such decision. The claim cannot be sustained. The recitations in the deed to Ballinger as to certain transfers, the lack of evidence to show any claim to the land, or any act of ownership, by those under whom appellant claims from 1849 until 1906, the assessment of the property for taxation by those under whom appellees claim continuously from 1852 to the time of trial, constituted circumstances that were sufficient to raise the issue as to whether the original grantees conveyed the land to Rosena Menard, and the issue was properly submitted to the jury. The objection to the admission in evidence of the deed of assignment made by Allen, Poole & Co., and the assignees' deed to W. P. Ballinger, and the chain of title thereunder to appellees, on the ground that, no deed being shown from the original grantees to any one under whom appellees claimed, the whole of the evidence was inadmissible, cannot be sustained. As before stated, there were circumstances tending to indicate that a deed had been made by Isaiah S. Fields to Rosena Menard, as recited in the deed by the assignees to W. P. Ballinger, and the court properly allowed all the facts to go before the jury. The deed containing the recitations in question was 26 years old, and the recitals were admissible as a circumstance which, taken with other circumstances, might show that the original grantees of the land had parted with the title. That the execution of a deed may be established by circumstances is the settled doctrine in this state. Bounds v. Little, 75 Tex. 316, 12 S. W. 1109; Walker v. Caradine, 78 Tex. 489, 15 S. W. 31; Sydnor v. Real Est. Ass'n (Tex. Civ. App.) 94 S. W. 451; Hirsch v. Patton (Tex. Civ. App.) 108 S. W. 1015. The case of Brewer v. Cochran (Tex. Civ. App.) 99 S. W. 1033, is very similar to this, and the court discussed the facts as follows:

"The circumstances relied upon were open and notorious assertion and claim of ownership by Roberts and those claiming under him, from the date of Roberts' deeds in 1869 down to the present time, together with payment of taxes. No actual possession was shown in any of the parties, plaintiffs or defendant or his vendors, but it was shown that the land was wild and unimproved land." There were recitals in Roberts' deeds to the effect that the land had been conveyed by parties owning to other parties, and the court, after discussing the effect of successive transfers as tending to show claim of title to the land for many years, said: "The recitals in the deed admitted in evidence go only a step further, and show a claim by Roberts that he had title from a certain source, the execution of the deeds, in and of itself, showing a claim of title. The recitals were not offered nor admitted as direct evidence of execution of the recited deeds, but only as a circumstance showing a claim by Roberts made as early as 1860, nearly 40 years ago, as explanatory of his claim of title in himself, that the Brewers had conveyed it to him." The recitals were held to be proper evidence, and the judgment was affirmed, and a writ of error refused by the Supreme Court.

The court did not err in admitting in evidence the schedule of property attached to the deed of assignment. The description of the land therein may have been vague and uncertain; but, if Allen, Poole & Co. owned any land in the Fields grant, it passed by the deed to the assignees whether it was sufficiently described or not.

The charge of the court is not open to the criticisms urged against it under the fifth and sixth assignments of error.

The second special charge given by the court was not on the weight of the evidence, and was not calculated to mislead the jury.

No error has been indicated by appellant necessitating a reversal of the judgment, and it is therefore affirmed.

LANE v. GENERAL ACCIDENT INS. CO.
(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 14, 1908.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 18, 1908.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 675*)—ACTIONS ON POLICY—RECOVERY—PENALTIES—ATTORNEY'S FEES—STATUTES.

The statute authorizing a recovery of 12 per cent. damages and attorney's fees where a "life or health insurance company" fails to pay the policy does not apply to accident insurance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1806; Dec. Dig. § 675.*]

2. COURTS (§ 121*)—JURISDICTION—AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY.

Where, in an action in the district court on an insurance policy, the petition demanded judgment for $500 and attorney's fees and 12 per cent. damages, and there was no plea or exception attacking the jurisdiction of the court or suggesting that a judgment could not be rendered for the attorney's fees and the damages, the amount in controversy exceeded $500, so that the court had jurisdiction, though attorney's fees and damages were not proper claims.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 413-426; Dec. Dig. § 121.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 531*)—ACCIDENT INSURANCE—CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION—RISKS AND CAUSES OF LOSS.

Where one insured as a sheep farmer against accident by a policy classifying as more hazardous the occupation of a hunter, and stipulating that, where an injury occurred while doing any act pertaining to any occupation classified as more hazardous, the liability of insurer should be for such part of the principal as the premium paid would purchase at the rates fixed for such more hazardous occupation, was killed while hunting for recreation, insurer was liable only to the indemnity provided for the occupation of a hunter.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; J. L. Camp, Judge.

Action by Clara Alma Lane against the General Accident Insurance Company. From a judgment granting insufficient relief, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Swearingen & Tayloe, for appellant. Don A. Bliss, for appellee.

FLY, J. Appellant instituted suit in one of the district courts of Bexar county against appellee on an accident insurance policy issued by appellee to her husband, Louis V. B. Lane, who had been killed by the accidental discharge of a gun in the hands of another. The suit was for the sum of $500 insurance, $200 attorney's fees, and the sum of 12 per cent. as a penalty for failure to pay the amount of the policy. Appellee admitted the execution of the policy, but claimed that only $100 was due because deceased was killed while hunting, which was an act pertaining to the occupation of a hunter, and that more than that sum could not be recovered under the terms of the policy. The court instructed a verdict for $100.

The first question that arises is: Did the district court have jurisdiction of the amount in controversy? It is the contention of appellee that, as this suit is one on an accident policy, appellant could not, under the law, recover more than $500 and interest, and that the mere statement of attorney's fees and appeal could not give jurisdiction to the court; the actual amount in controversy being $500. Their contention is based on the proposition that penalties and attorney's fees can only be recovered against health and life insurance companies for failure or refusal to pay the amount of policies by reason of direct statutory provision therefor, and, there being no provision in the laws of Texas as to penalties against accident insurance companies, such penalties cannot be collected, and allegations in regard to such penalties and attorney's fees cannot be used to give jurisdiction to a court which otherwise would not have it. It is undoubtedly true that the district court had no jurisdiction of the principal amount in controversy, which did not exceed $500, and unless appellant was authorized under the statute to recover attorney's fees or a penalty, or unless the mere allegation of a claim for such fees and penalty gave the court jurisdiction over a matter of which it otherwise had no jurisdiction, the cause should have been dismissed. The statute permitting the recovery of penalties against insurance companies is as follows: "In all cases where a loss occurs and the life or health insurance company liable therefor shall fail to pay the same within the time specified in the policy, after demand made therefor, such company shall be liable to pay the holder of such policy, in addition to the amount of the loss, twelve per cent. damages on the amount of such loss, together with all reasonable attorney's fees for the prosecution and collection of such loss." By the terms of that statute the recovery of penalties is permitted against none but "life or health insurance" companies; and it has been held that such penalties cannot be recovered against accident insurance companies. Insurance Co. v. Parker, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 521, 72 S. W. 621; Insurance Co. v. Wade (Tex. Civ. App.) 99 S. W. 877; Insurance Co. v. Parker, 96 Tex. 287, 72 S. W. 168, 580, 621. It was not intimated, by plea or otherwise, that the penalty and attorney's fees were fraudulently inserted in the petition for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to the district court, but, on the other hand, it is apparent that it was a bona fide claim for the whole sum sued for and it was fully acquiesced in by the appellee, not even a general demurrer being urged to the petition. It has been held by the Supreme Court that, where jurisdiction is sought to be conferred by allegation as to matters which could not be recovered, in order to raise the question of fraud in such allegations, the defendant must allege it and prove it, unless it is apparent from the pleadings themselves that a fraud on the jurisdiction is sought to be perpetrated. Dwyer v. Bassett, 63 Tex. 274; Roper v. Brady, 80 Tex. 588, 16 S. W. 434; Hoffman v. Building & Loan Ass'n, 85 Tex. 409, 22 S. W. 154. Without any plea or exception attacking the jurisdiction of the court, or suggesting that a judgment could not be rendered for the penalty and attorney's fees, the court had jurisdiction, even though under the law the penalty or fees were not proper claims against appellee. It could interpose a defense to those claims or not as it might choose, and, not having invoked the action of the court thereon, it cannot now be heard to say that they are not proper claims against it and thereby destroy the jurisdiction of the court. The penalty and attorney's fees were sued for and unobjectioned to remained a part of the amount in controversy. We therefore hold that the trial court had jurisdiction of the cause.

It was proven, without contradiction, that the deceased was hunting at the time that he was killed by the accidental discharge of a gun in the hands of a companion. He was engaged in hunting as a mere recreation, and not as an occupation. On the back of the policy, and expressly made a part thereof, is the following agreement, signed by Louis V. B. Lane: "I understand that if I contract illness or am injured, fatally or otherwise, after having changed my occupation to one classified by this company as more hazardous than that herein stated, or if I am injured while doing any act or thing pertaining to any occupation so classified, the liability of the company shall be only for such proportion of the principal sum or other indemnity as the premium paid by me will purchase at the rates fixed by this company for such more hazardous occupation." It appeared from the evidence that deceased was insured as a "sheep farmer." He so stated his occupation in his application for insurance, and that occupation was classed as "D" in the classification of occupations made by the company, while the occupation of a "hunter" was classed as "X." Deceased paid a monthly premium of $2 which secured an indemnity of $500 for a "sheep farmer," but which secured for a "hunter" an indemnity of only $100. Deceased had not changed his occupation when he was killed and was still engaged in sheep farming, but he was actually engaged in hunting deer when he was shot, and was undoubtedly doing an "act or thing pertaining" to the occupation of hunting, which was classified as an occupation more hazardous than that of sheep farming. It would not matter whether deceased was acquainted with the classification or not, for he had bound himself to abide by the company's classification whatever it might be.

Almost the identical language used in the policy in this case was construed in the case of Holiday v. Accident Association, 108 Iowa, 178, 72 N. W. 448, 64 Am. St. Rep. 170, under quite similar facts, and it was held that "the carrying of the gun would be an act to be done in hunting, and it might pertain to hunting, but not to it as an occupation." That was said in a case where a man out hunting was accidentally shot by the discharge of his gun while he was getting through a barbed-wire fence, and the effect of the decision was to destroy the force and effect of the language, "while performing an act pertaining to an occupation classed as more hazardous than the one under which the certificate is issued," and to hold that a party must actually be engaged in a more hazardous occupation before the clause in question could have any effect. The decision is in the very teeth of language that is plain and simple, and had the effect of destroying the contract made by the parties and of substituting therefor one made by the court. The case of Union Mut. Acc. Ass'n v. Frohand, 134 Ill. 228, 25 N. E. 642, 10 L. R. A. 383, 23 Am. St. Rep. 664, was relied on by the Iowa court as sustaining its decision, but we do not think it does. In the Illinois case the man was hunting for recreation, and while so engaged was accidentally killed, and the insurance company was seeking to lessen its liability by a clause in the policy which lessened it if the insured received "an injury while engaged temporarily, or otherwise, in an occupation more hazardous than the one he was engaged in when insured." The decision turned on the question as to whether the insured was engaged in the occupation of hunting when killed. The court held that he was not so engaged, but was hunting for pleasure. To follow the Iowa case we would be compelled to hold that there is no such thing as an act pertaining to the occupation of hunting; for, if following wild deer with guns with the expressed intention of killing them is not an act pertaining to the occupation of hunting, there can be no such act. A man might carry a gun without performing an act pertaining to hunting, but, when he is on a hunting expedition and is engaged in the very act of attempting to kill a deer when he is shot by his companion, it is clear that his acts are those pertaining to the occupation of hunting. To hold otherwise would be to say that no one could perform acts pertaining to the occupation of a hunter unless he was a professional hunter. We think such a position untenable.

The judgment will be affirmed.

JARVIS v. MATSON et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 31, 1908.)

1. CONTRIBUTION (§ 9*)—ACTIONS—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action by an obligor on a bond against his co-obligors for contribution, where the notes evidencing plaintiff's advancements were not signed by all the obligors, but the money was used to discharge the obligation of all of them, parol evidence was admissible to show that plaintiff took the notes as evidence of the transaction, and as collateral security for payment of the money by the signers of the bond, and that he did not look for payment by the signers of the notes until he failed of reimbursement by the bond signers, and to show the source of part payment on the notes, and that the loan was not made to the signers of the notes to discharge their obligations under the bond, but to discharge the joint obligations of all the obligors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contribution, Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 402*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—VARYING TERMS OF WRITTEN INSTRUMENT—PERSONS NOT PARTIES.

Although the terms of the notes were unambiguous, the defendants objecting to the introduction of such evidence, not being parties to the notes, the question of varying the terms of a written contract by parol evidence was not involved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 402.*]

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 49*)—COMPUTATION OF PERIOD—IMPLIED CONTRACTS—CONTRIBUTION.

In suits for contribution, the right of action is upon the implied promise to repay, and limitation begins to run from the date of each advancement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 271; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

4. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 49*)—COMPUTATION OF PERIOD—CONTRIBUTION.

A suit for contribution was not barred by two years' limitation, where the sum was advanced by plaintiff August 26, 1903, and the original petition was filed August 22, 1905.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

5. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 196*)—EVIDENCE.

In an action for contribution by one obligor against his co-obligors on a bond, where it appeared that it was the custom of the obligors to secure advancements to meet their obligations, and to execute notes therefor payable in the future; and that it was contemplated that the sums would be repaid out of collections made from time to time, a note given plaintiff for his advancement, though the obligors were not liable upon it, was admissible to show whether the general rule that limitations begin to run from the date of advancement was varied by the understanding of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Dec. Dig. § 196.*]

6. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 49*)—ACTIONS FOR CONTRIBUTION.

If the money advanced was not to be paid until some definite future time, no cause of action for contribution accrued until such time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 271; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

7. PAYMENT (§ 41*)—APPLICATION—UNENFORCEABLE DEMAND.

In an action by one of several co-obligors against the others for contribution, where plaintiff had advanced two separate amounts in payment of the joint obligation, if the earlier of such advancements was barred by limitation, sums repaid by defendants to plaintiff, of less amount should be credited thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. § 119; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

Appeal from District Court, Hill County; W. C. Wear, Judge.

Action by E. Jarvis against J. V. Matson and others. From a judgment for plaintiff against two of the defendants, and in favor of the other defendants against plaintiff, he appeals. Reversed and remanded for a new trial as to all the defendants.

E. W. Bounds and Vaughan & Hart, for appellant. Morrow & Smithdeale, for appellees.

TALBOT, J. This is the second appeal in this case. See 94 S. W. 1079. The suit was filed on the 22d day of August, 1905, by appellant against J. V. Matson, J. M. Carroll, Lee Fresby, T. C. Morgan, W. R. Bounds, Myrtle H. Davis, W. A. Putnam, J. M. Peden, J. R. Jones, Jr., M. P. Harwood, and J. E. Clonch. It is alleged, in substance, that the plaintiff and the defendants, on the 21st day of October, 1902, executed a written contract or bond, payable to one R. H. Baker, in which said parties obligated and bound themselves to procure for the Trinity & Brazos Valley Railway Company the right of way for a certain distance in Hill county, Tex., and as rapidly as the same was required for the construction of said road; that plaintiff and defendants were constituted a right of way committee to procure said right of way, and that it was contemplated that the necessary funds with which to secure said right of way would be raised by subscriptions and donations from the citizens of said Hill county; that said committee was unable to collect sufficient money, by contributions and subscriptions, to purchase the right of way as rapidly as was required for the construction of said road, and it became necessary, in order to perform their obligations to R. H. Baker as the representative of said railway company, to secure an advancement or loan of money; that the necessary loan or advancement, which amounted to $4,000, was obtained from plaintiff in two separate amounts, namely, $2,500 on the 17th day of July, 1903, and $1,500 on the 26th day of August, 1903; that it was the custom of said committee to execute notes, through such members of the committee as were accessible to sign them, for money advanced to it for the purposes stated, and that sundry such notes were so executed. Plaintiff further alleged that about August 17, 1905, all of the money that could be collected by contributions and other sources had been received; that on said date a complete statement of the account on the part of said committee, with paid funds so received and paid out by it, was made, and it was ascertained that plaintiff had been repaid of said $4,000 the sum of $1,375.45, leaving due him by said signers of said contract and bond referred to, the sum of $2,629.55; that by the terms of said contract and bond the defendants became and are, jointly and severally, bound to plaintiff to make contributions to him for their several proportional parts of said sum of $2,629.55, except defendant Putnam who, by limitation of his liability in said bond and contract, is only liable for the sum of $100, for all of which plaintiff sues. The defendants Matson, Carroll, Morgan, and Clonch answered, pleading to the jurisdiction of the court the statute of limitations of two years, a general denial, and, in substance, that the $4,000, claimed by the plaintiff to have been advanced by him for the use of said right of way committee, was not so advanced, but was a loan, made by him at the request of the defendant Bounds and others, and was made upon the faith of said Bounds and others to refund the same, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. The other defendants did not answer, but made default. A jury was impaneled, and the court, after hearing the evidence, instructed a verdict in favor of all of the defendants except Bounds and Putnam. As to these two defendants, the court instructed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against Bounds for $252, and Putnam for $100. One of the parties, who signed the contract and bond made the basis of the suit, died insolvent, and his legal representatives were not sued. There was testimony tending to show that the defendants Mrs. Davis, Freaby, Peden, and Jones paid part of the amount claimed pending the suit, and we presume the verdict was directed in their favor, although they had not answered, upon the theory that plaintiff had not sued on the notes, and that they had paid their respective proportional parts of the said $2,629.55. It does not expressly appear upon what ground the verdict was instructed in favor of the defendants Matson, Carroll, Morgan, and Clonch, but we presume the trial court was of the opinion that the $4,000, claimed to have been advanced by the plaintiff to the committee, was money loaned to those parties who signed the notes taken at the time the money was paid over, and that said last-named defendants were not liable for the repayment of any part thereof, and, further, as to Clonch, that he was not liable, because he was neither a party to the contract and bond, nor to the notes taken for the said $4,000.

Appellant's assignments of error, from the first to the fourth, inclusive, complain of the trial court's action in excluding certain testimony offered by him. The bills of exception presented in support of these several assignments show that, by proper questions propounded by appellant's counsel, they sought to show by appellant that (1) his purpose in taking the two notes was to hold same as evidence of the transaction, and as collateral security for the payment of the money by the signers of the bond and contract for right of way; (2) that it was not the intention or purpose of appellant in taking said notes to look to the parties who signed them for repayment of the money until he had failed to be reimbursed by the signers of the right of way bond and contract; (3) that the money received by the appellant as payment on the $4,000 was derived from contributions made by citizens to pay for the right of way, and from money paid by some of the parties who had signed the notes, after it was found that a sufficient amount could not be collected from the contributions with which to pay the entire amount of $4,000 that he let the committee have; (4) that the $4,000 evidenced by the said two notes was not loaned by appellant to the parties signing said notes for the purpose of discharging their joint obligations as members of the right of way committee, but was advanced and paid to discharge the joint obligations of the whole committee.

The objections urged to the admissibility of the testimony were that it was immaterial, and that the notes speak for themselves. We are of the opinion that all of this testimony was pertinent to the issues made by the pleadings, was admissible, and that the court committed reversible error in excluding it. If the $4,000 was advanced by appellant to discharge the joint obligation of the members of the right of way committee assumed by them in the execution of the contract to Baker, and he took notes of only a part of the committee therefor, as alleged, the money so advanced having been in fact used, as seems to appear from the undisputed evidence, to discharge such obligations, parol evidence was admissible to show the real character of the transaction resulting in the taking of said notes. In a supplemental petition the appellant alleged that it became necessary, in the progress of the undertaking to secure the right of way, to use a considerable amount of cash, more than was available from the sources open to them, and that the committee saw fit to, and did, borrow the money needed in such business and transaction from the appellant, Jarvis, from time to time as it was needed, and that it was the custom of the committee to reimburse appellant from donations, assessments, and contributions when they had sufficient money on hand. As argued by counsel, appellant being one of the parties with appellees to the right of way contract executed to Baker, and there being evidence, properly admitted, tending to show that the $4,000 in question was advanced by him to the right of way committee for the purpose of performing the obligations resting upon them all, it was proper to show the purpose and intention of taking the notes; that is, whether it was appellant's intention and purpose to look to the parties signing the notes for repayment of the money advanced in the first instance, and whether said notes were accommodation paper for the benefit of the entire committee, or a loan made by appellant on the individual credit alone of the makers of said notes. The fact that the terms of the notes were clear and unambiguous would not alter the rule, and, the appellees objecting to the introduction of the evidence excluded not being parties to the notes, no question of varying the terms of a written contract by parol evidence was involved. If appellant furnished the $4,000 to the right of way committee under the established custom and business policy adopted by the committee, to be used in carrying out the contract entered into with Baker, then the mere taking of the notes of some of the members of that committee would not release the appellees, who would otherwise be liable for their respective pro rata parts thereof from such liability.

But it is contended by the appellees that appellant's cause of action, if any he ever had against them, was barred by the statute of limitations of two years. Conceding, as is the well-settled general rule, that in suits for contribution the right of action is upon the implied promise for reimbursement, and that the statute of limitations commences to run against such action from the date of each payment made by the plaintiff (Faires v. Cockerell, 88 Tex. 423, 31 S. W. 190, 639, 28 L. R. A. 528), yet clearly in this case appellant's right to recover, if otherwise entitled to do so, the excess of his share of the $1,500 was not barred. The record shows that the original petition was filed August 22, 1905, and this sum was paid and advanced by appellant on the 26th day of August, 1903. Hence two years had not elapsed from the date of such advancement up to the time of the institution of suit. We are also inclined to the opinion that his right to recover the proportional parts claimed to be due of the $2,500, although the suit was filed a little more than two years after the payment of said sum, was not barred. The note evidencing the amount of this advancement was payable November 1, 1903, and there is evidence going to show that it was the custom of the right of way committee, of which appellees were members, to secure the loan or advancement of money, when necessary to enable them to fulfill their agreement with Baker as the representative of the railway company, and execute notes therefor, payable in the future, and that it was contemplated and expected that such sums were to be repaid to the lender out of collections, made from time to time thereafter, from subscriptions and contributions. Such being the practice, custom, and policy of the committee, we think that said note, notwithstanding appellees were not liable upon it, was legitimate evidence to be considered in determining whether or not the general rule, above stated, that limitation begins to run from the date of payment was varied by the understanding of the parties, and was, together with the other facts shown, sufficient to justify the conclusion that by mutual agreement no demand for contribution of the sum evidenced by said note should be made by the appellant until the date of the maturity thereof; and, this suit having been instituted before the expiration of two years from that date, appellant's right of action was not barred. If the money advanced by appellant was not to be repaid until some definite time in the future, then no cause of action accrued to him for contribution until such time, and suit could not sooner be brought therefor. If, however, it should be established upon another trial that no such agreement to repay the money in the future existed, then the general rule announced would obtain, and appellant would not be entitled to recover any part of said $2,500; but in this event we think it proper to say, for the guidance of the trial court, that the $1,375.45, the amount shown to have been repaid appellant, should be credited on said sum of $2,500.

These views render it unnecessary to discuss other assignments.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial as to all of the defendants to the suit, in accordance with this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

DYCUS v. TRADERS' BANK & TRUST CO.
(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 31, 1908.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 105*)—CASHIERS—AUTHORITY—LEASES—MODIFICATION.

A bank cashier's agreement that the bank's lessee might use the leased premises for a purpose prohibited by the lease does not bind the bank, since under Rev. St. 1895, art. 661, providing that the business of the bank shall be managed by the directors, and the bank's charter and by-laws, defining the cashier's duties, it was a matter within the directors' control.

Appeal from District Court, Dallas County; J. C. Roberts, Judge.

Action by the Traders' Bank & Trust Company against N. D. Dycus. From an order granting plaintiff a temporary injunction, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Albert W. Webb, for appellant. J. J. Eckford, for appellee.

RAINEY, C. J. This is an appeal from an order granting a temporary injunction restraining the appellant from installing a moving picture show in a building that had been leased from appellee by appellant. Plaintiff's petition alleged, in substance, that the property in controversy had been on July 11, 1908, leased to defendant for use as a billiard and pool hall, and not otherwise; that a moving picture show would be a use not permitted by the lease, and it would be a nuisance generally; that it would increase the fire hazard, contrary to the terms of the lease; and that alterations were being made in the building contrary to the terms of the lease. Defendant answered by general and special exceptions, general denial, and specially an express agreement and permission for the use of the building as a moving picture show, etc. Upon the hearing of the application for the temporary writ, after notice to defendant, the court granted the writ, and the cause is here for review.

The written lease under which Dycus held the building provided "that the premises were to be 'occupied as a pool and billiard room and not otherwise'; that 'no improvements or alterations shall be made in or to the hereby demised premises without the consent of the lessor in writing'; 'that the lessee shall not assign this agreement or underlet the premises or any part thereof, except as may be mentioned above, or make any alterations in the building or premises, except as may be mentioned above, without the consent of the lessor in writing; or occupy, or permit, or suffer the same to be occupied for any business or purpose deemed extra hazardous on account of fire.'" The lease was signed "Traders' Bank & Trust Company, by J. Dabney Day, Cashier, and N. D. Dycus, Lessee." It was shown that Dycus was preparing to use the building to run a moving picture show, and the use of said building for such a purpose would make it extra hazardous on account of fire. The appellant claims that about noon September 30, 1908, he had a verbal agreement and understanding with Day, cashier, by which Day consented to his using said building for operating a moving picture show therein. Day practically admits this, but that about 6:30 o'clock of the same day he informed Dycus that such use of the building would not be permitted. In the meantime Dycus had been to some trouble and expense in preparing the building for use in operating the moving picture show.

Is the bank bound by this action of Day, its cashier? We think not. The appellant is a banking corporation under the laws of this state, and its charter provides that "the property or business of the corporation shall be controlled and managed by the directors," etc. This is also in effect the provision of the statutes. Article 661, Rev. St. 1895. The by-laws of the appellee in defining the powers and authority of the cashier read: "The duties of the cashier shall be to loan and invest the funds of said corporation under the supervision of the board of directors, to keep a record of all stock subscribed and transferred and minutes of all meetings of the stockholders and directors, supervise the keeping of all records and all business transacted by the corporation, to present at the annual and other meetings of the stockholders or directors all reports required by law or the board of directors, to perform the duties usually required of secretaries and cashiers of corporations and the duties required by the laws of the state of Texas, and to perform such other duties as the board of directors may impose." From this it seems the cashier had no power or authority to change or alter the provision of the lease contract without the consent or permission of the board of directors of the appellee. There is no proof that the board of directors ever authorized such action on the part of Day, or in any way sanctioned it. We therefore conclude that the verbal agreement changing the provisions of the written lease contract was unauthorized, and leaves the original contract in full force. Kolp v. Specht, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 685, 33 S. W. 715; Temple v. Dodge, 89 Tex. 69, 32 S. W. 515, 33 S. W. 222; Fitzhugh v. Land Co., 81 Tex. 311, 16 S. W. 1078.

Then the question for consideration is whether or not the appellee is entitled to the writ of injunction to restrain Dycus from using the building for any purpose other than a "billiard and pool hall," or for a business deemed "extra hazardous on account of fire." It is contended that appellee had an adequate remedy by suit for damages, and therefore was not entitled to an injunction. Our statutes provide that an injunction may issue "where it shall appear that the party applying for such a writ is entitled to the relief demanded, and such relief, or any part thereof, requires the restraint of some act prejudicial to the applicant." In Summer v. Crawford, 91 Tex. 129, 41 S. W. 994, Justice Denman, speaking for the court, quotes this language: "It is not enough that there is a remedy at law. It must be plain and adequate; or, in other words, as practical and efficient to the end of justice and its prompt administration as the remedy in equity"—citing Watson v. Sutherland, 5 Wall. 74, 18 L. Ed. 580; North v. Peters, 138 U. S. 271, 11 Sup. Ct. 346, 34 L. Ed. 936. He also said: "In courts administering both law and equity, like ours, the rule denying injunctions when there is a remedy at law should not be applied as rigidly as at common law, where the issuance of the writ in equity was to a certain extent an invasion of the jurisdiction of another tribunal." The contract of lease in this case restricts the use of the building to a "billiard and pool hall," and an injunction will lie restraining the use to any other purpose, although it may appear that no particular damage would result from such other use. 22 Cyc. pp. 859-862; Railway Co. v. Puckett (Tex. Civ. App.) 82 S. W. 662.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. PLEADING (§ 408*)—OBJECTIONS—TIME TO MAKE.

The anti-trust act (Act 1903, p. 119, c. 94), defining a trust as a combination to create restrictions in trade or restrictions in the free pursuit of any business permitted by the law of the state, prohibits a restriction of competition in business which under the laws of the state a person may engage in, but does not prevent an owner of a plantation from giving another the exclusive privilege of selling merchandise thereon.

Appeal from District Court, Harrison County; W. C. Buford, Judge.

Action by H. R. Sargent against the Redland Fruit Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John W. Scott, for appellant. W. C. Lane, for appellee.

HODGES, J. The appellee recovered a judgment in the court below against the appellant for damages on account of the alleged breach of a contract theretofore made and entered into between the parties. The allegations in the appellee's (Sargent's) petition are substantially as follows: That the appellee and one E. L. Harper, who was superintendent and manager for the appellant company, entered into the following written contract: "The State of Texas, County of Harrison. September 4th, 1905. This agreement made and entered into between E. L. Harper, Supt. of the Redlands Fruit Company, of the first part and H. R. Sargent, of the second part, witnesseth, that the said E. L. Harper, Supt., for and under instructions of said company and in and for the consideration of 5% on all sales of goods made by the said H. R. Sargent, the second party, on the premises of the said company does agree for the said H. R. Sargent to erect a storehouse on their premises and to conduct a general merchandise business and the company will endeavor to give the said H. R. Sargent their trade from the said plantation and will give no other rights on the premises to other parties for the sale of merchandise. The said H. R. Sargent shall sell no whisky or other intoxicating drink on the premises of said company. The said Sargent shall have the right to removal of said storehouse and the right to sell same. The said company acquires no claim or title to said storehouse building and the said Sargent no rights on premises, only so far as terms of this agreement. E. L. Harper, Supt. Redlands Fruit Company. H. R. Sargent." It is alleged that this contract was to last five years; that in pursuance thereof the appellee, plaintiff below, did erect a storehouse at an expense of $750, and put therein a stock of goods which, it is claimed, was worth at the time of the alleged breach from $700 to $1,000, and that the reasonable profits which he would realize from the sale of those goods would have been $1,000 per year; that but for the contract aforesaid he would not have erected the house nor bought the stock of goods; that the appellant company broke the contract it had thus entered into by throwing the trade of the plantation to others, and allowing others to erect a storehouse on its premises; that, on account of the breach of the said contract by the appellant company, the appellee's trade and the profits therefrom, which he says would have amounted to $5,000, left him. Appellee also alleges that his house was rendered valueless to him except to the extent of what it would be worth in lumber, which was estimated at $50; that his goods deteriorated to the extent of $750 on account of being left on his hands. He sues to recover the aggregate sum of $6,450. The defendant answered by a general demurrer, general denial, and specially that appellee breached the contract by selling intoxicating liquors on the premises, and in not paying over the 5 per cent. commissions provided for in the contract. The case was submitted to the court without a jury, and a judgment rendered in favor of the appellee for the sum of $240. From that judgment, this appeal is prosecuted.

There are five assignments of error in the record, two of which assail the refusal of the court to sustain the appellant's general demurrer. The remaining three attack the grounds upon which the court predicated its judgment in matters of facts.

The first question that presents itself for our consideration is whether or not the contract as pleaded by the appellee is void by reason of being in conflict with the provisions of what is known as the "Anti-Trust Law" of this state. The first error assigned complains of the refusal of the court to sustain the general demurrer interposed by the appellant in the trial below. It appears that a general demurrer was filed, but not called to the attention of the trial court, and was not passed on. The reason urged in the appellant's brief as grounds upon which the court should have sustained its general demurrer is that the contract sued upon, and set out in the appellee's original petition, shows upon its face that it is in violation of the law of this state prohibiting the formation of trusts and monopolies. If the appellee's cause of action as stated shows that he is undertaking to recover damages for the breach of an illegal contract, then the objection may be made at any stage of the proceedings. The objection goes to the substance of the petition, and the error, if it exists, is fundamental. Grant v. Whittlesey, 42 Tex. 320; Norris v. Logan (Tex. Civ. App.) 94 S. W. 123; Schuster v. Frendenthal, 74 Tex. 55, 11 S. W. 1051; Alamo Ins. Co. v. Davis (Tex. Civ. App.) 45 S. W. 605; 6 Amer. & Eng. Ency. Plead. & Prac. 380.

The question then is: Do the terms of the contract sued on violate the anti-trust statute? The provisions of the contract pointed out as being obnoxious to that statute are those by which Sargent is given the exclusive right to sell goods on the appellant's premises, and by which appellant bound itself to endeavor to induce its employees to trade with Sargent. In Acts 1903, p. 119, c. 94, a trust is defined as "a combination of capital, skill or acts by two or more persons * * * for either, any or all of the following purposes: (1) To create or which may tend to create, or carry out restrictions in trade or commerce, or aids to commerce, or in the preparation of any product for market or transportation, or to create or carry out restrictions in the free pursuit of any business authorized or permitted by the law of this state." An undertaking on the part of the appellant to endeavor to induce its employees to trade with the appellee could not be regarded as any violation of law, and the vice, if any, in the contract, must be that portion which gives to the appellee the exclusive right to sell goods on the appellant's premises. If this is in violation of the anti-trust statute, then the assignment should be sustained; otherwise it should be overruled. We do not think it was the purpose of the statute to prevent the making of exclusive contracts of every kind. Such an inhibition would be productive of a greater evil than that which the law attempts to remedy. The business competition which cannot be restricted is that which under the "laws of the state a person is permitted or authorized" to engage in. The privilege of selling goods upon the premises of another is not derived from the laws of the state, but from the consent of the owner. Ft. Worth & D. C. Ry. Co. et al. v. State, 99 Tex. 84, 87 S. W. 336, 70 L. R. A. 950; Lewis v. Railway Co., 36 Tex. Civ. App. 48, 81 S. W. 111, 10 Tex. Ct. Rep. 423. In the first case cited above a contract had been entered into between the railway company and the Pullman Company, by the terms of which the latter was given the exclusive right of furnishing the railway company sleeping cars on all of its lines for the term of 15 years. In an opinion holding that this contract did not violate the anti-trust statute, the court said: "Waiving the fact that at the time the law of 1903 was enacted there was no other person or company engaged in the like business in Texas, we come to the question: Did the railroad company have the lawful right to make a contract with the Pullman Company, whereby it excluded all other companies for 15 years from furnishing to the railroad company sleeping cars for the use on all of its lines? That question suggests this: Did all sleeping car companies have a right to demand of the railroad company to haul their coaches on its railroad? If yea, the contract restricted the free pursuit of a lawful business, and constitutes a trust under the Act of 1903; otherwise the law has not been violated by the agreement. * * *

This contract in no way interfered with the rights of any other sleeping car company, if any existed, to build or furnish its cars to other railroads. Neither the Pullman nor any other corporation or person had a right to have sleeping cars attached to the passenger trains of the Ft. Worth & Denver City Railroad Company. Therefore to exclude them did not restrict 'the free pursuit of any business authorized or permitted by law,' because such business was not authorized to be pursued on a railroad without the consent of the owner; and, since no such business right existed, it could not be restricted." In that opinion the case of Lewis v. Railway Co. is cited with approval. In the latter case an attack was made on the contract entered into between the railway company and one Green, by which the latter was given the exclusive right to go upon the train of the railway company and solicit the transfer of baggage from passengers riding thereon. Lewis and his employes would purchase tickets, board the passenger train of the railway company, and also solicit such patronage from the railway passengers. The railway company sought to enjoin this conduct on the part of Lewis, and set up the fact that it had contracted with Green that he should have this exclusive privilege. This feature of the contract was assailed as being in violation of the anti-trust statute. The court held otherwise; and, in disposing of the question, uses this language: "It is, we think, a sufficient answer to this contention that the rule or regulation of appellees by which Green was permitted to solicit the patronage of its passengers to the exclusion of appellant did not 'create or carry out restrictions in the free pursuit of any business authorized or permitted by the law of this state,' because the only restriction imposed is with respect to the transaction of appellant's business on appellee's passenger trains, which he is nowhere authorized or permitted by the law of this state to engage in. It is therefore not a restriction upon the free pursuit of this lawful business. In the sense that the regulation prevents appellant from securing the patronage of appellee's passengers, it may be said to be a restriction upon his business. But the least reflection will show that, if this construction of the law were to be adopted, a very large per cent. of the everyday contracts in the business world, such as those of leasing, of agency, of service, and the like would be reprobated—a result never dreamed of by the legislators who enacted the statute. If appellee is to be denied the relief prayed for, it must be upon other grounds than that asserted in this assignment." Applying the principles approved in the decisions quoted above, we may ask: Were any restrictions created or carried out in the contract under consideration against the free pursuit of any business which the law gave others the right to engage in? Did others have the right under the law to demand of the appellant that they be permitted to sell goods upon its premises? The right to sell upon the premises of another is not given by law, but by consent of the owner. The latter has the right to say who shall or who shall not use his premises for any such purpose. The right to give an exclusive contract for the purpose of any business is involved in every lease.

Our attention has been called to the case of the T. & P. Coal Company v. Lawson, 89 Tex. 394, 32 S. W. 871, 34 S. W. 919. The appellant urges with much earnestness that the language used in that case is decisive of this. We do not agree with that contention. While there is some language used in the opinion rendered by Justice Denman in the case referred to which tends to support the appellant's construction, yet the facts are different, and that language is not in harmony with the latter decision of our Supreme Court which we have cited. If we have departed from the ruling of the court in the Lawson Case we think our action is justified, not only by the latter expressions of the Supreme Court, but by sound reason as well. In the Lawson Case the contract which was held to be in violation of the anti-trust statute was more far-reaching than the one here under consideration. Among other things, the coal company, the owner of the premises, bound itself not to engage in a business in competition with that carried on by Lawson. It thus by agreement deprived itself of a right given by law, and in so doing restricted competition to that extent. In this case the contract is susceptible of no such construction. The second assignment of error is overruled because we do not think the pleadings were subject to the objections urged. They were sufficient to constitute a cause of action, however defectively this may have been stated.

The remaining assignments of error involve issues of fact which cannot be considered because of the absence of a statement of facts such as is now required by law. The transcript contains what purports to be a copy of the statement of facts. Under the law as it now exists, in all appeals from the district court, the original statement of facts must be sent up with the record. Laws 1907,

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 202*)—WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY—CONVEYANCE—NOTES FOR PURCHASE PRICE—LIABILITY.

Separate real estate of a wife was conveyed by deed, in which her husband joined. The purchaser executed a nonnegotiable note for a part of the price to be paid the wife's heirs at her death. After the death of her husband, the wife conveyed the same land to the same purchaser. The deed recited that the first conveyance should be held for naught, and that the note given for the price should be canceled. The purchaser conveyed to a third person for value and in good faith. Held, that the purchasers might rely on the recitals in the second deed, and were not liable on the note.

Appeal from District Court, Brazos County; J. C. Scott, Judge.

Action by Johnnie McFerrin and others against Ward Templeman and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed and rendered.

Geo. D. Neal and Doremus & Butler, for appellants. Haynes Shannon and A. G. Board, for appellees.

NEILL, J. On June 22, 1894, Zilpha McFerrin and her husband, L. McFerrin, made a deed to M. W. Peterson, conveying a certain tract of land containing 194 acres of the William Millican league, situated in Brazos county, Tex. After reciting the payment of $50 cash, the consideration is thus expressed in the deed: "And for the further consideration of two thousand four hundred dollars to be hereafter paid to the heirs of the said Zilpha McFerrin, to be due and payable to said heirs after the death of the said Zilpha McFerrin, and the further consideration of fifty dollars to be paid to the said Zilpha McFerrin by said M. W. Peterson every three months from this date so long as she lives, which sum of two thousand four hundred dollars are evidenced by the promissory note of said M. W. Peterson of this date to secure the payment of the same at the maturity thereof, the vendor's lien is retained on the land hereinafter described." Contemporaneous with its execution, the vendor, M. W. Peterson, executed and delivered to the grantors the following instrument: "On the death of Mrs. Zilpha McFerrin, for value received I promise to pay unto the heirs of the said Zilpha McFerrin the sum of two thousand four hundred dollars for a tract of land in Brazos county, Texas, described fully in the deed of the said Zilpha McFerrin and her husband, Levi McFerrin, of this date, in which the vendor's lien is retained to secure the payment of this note at its maturity which is to be at the death of said Zilpha McFerrin and fifty dollars every three months from this date which is provided for in said deed so long as she lives in lieu of interest on this note during her lifetime but this note to bear 10 per cent. from the date of her death until paid. M. W. Peterson"—which is the one referred to in the deed as the "note" given for a part of the consideration. The land was of the separate estate of Mrs. McFerrin.

Levi McFerrin died during the year 1898. The obligation or note of Peterson, above recited, for $2,400 was delivered by Zilpha McFerrin to Jesse McFerrin (but the date of such delivery is not shown by the record) to be held by him; and, when delivered, she stated to him that she "wanted him to keep the same, and stated that this is for my children and my will." Peterson paid Zilpha McFerrin the $50 per quarter, provided for in his said note or obligation, several times while it was held by Jesse McFerrin. On January 25, 1899, Zilpha McFerrin, then a feme sole, made a deed conveying the same 194 acres described in the deed above mentioned to M. W. Peterson. The consideration expressed in the deed is "for and in consideration of the sum of fifteen hundred dollars to me secured to be paid by M. W. Peterson of Brazos county, Texas, as follows: Three promissory notes signed and executed by M. W. Peterson each payable to Zilpha McFerrin or order at Navasota, Texas, of even date herewith each for the sum of five hundred dollars with ten per cent. interest per annum from date until paid the interest payable annually all past due interest to bear interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum and each note providing for the payment of ten per cent. on principal and interest as attorney's fees if placed in the hands of an attorney for collection or if suit is brought on same or if collected through the probate court and each reciting that it is given in part payment of the land herein conveyed, and that a vendor's lien is retained upon said property and said notes being due on one, two and three years after date respectively." It also contains the following recitations, to wit: "Whereas on June 22, 1894, said Zilpha McFerrin joined by her husband Levi McFerrin by deed of that date which is of record in Vol. 13 page 449 to 451 of the deed records of said Brazos county, conveyed said tract of land to said M. W. Peterson for the consideration of $50.00 cash then paid and the further consideration of $2,400.00 as evidenced by the promissory note of said Peterson to be paid to the heirs of said Zilpha McFerrin upon the death of said Zilpha McFerrin and the further consideration of $50.00 to be paid every three months by said M. W. Peterson to said Zilpha McFerrin so long as she lived and whereas it is intended by said M. W. Peterson and Zilpha McFerrin that this deed shall in all things take the place of said first deed. It is therefore expressly understood and agreed that said first deed shall be held for naught from henceforth and shall be of no further force or effect. And this conveyance shall in all things supersede and take place of said first deed it being intended to make a present conveyance of a present right and title and to convey in all things the present right of use, enjoyment and possession and the said Zilpha McFerrin herein acknowledges that there are no charges for or on account of said land that said purchase price of fifteen hundred dollars first above described and that said note mentioned in first said deed has been surrendered and canceled, and the lien upon said land for and on of the purchase money mentioned in said first deed is hereby canceled and released and said Peterson is discharged from all moneyed obligations under said first deed."

On October 24, 1900, M. W. Peterson, joined by his wife, Jessie L., made a deed to W. J. Foster and Ward Templeman, conveying to them, among other lands, the 194 acres described in the other two deeds. A part of the consideration for such conveyance was the assumption of and promise to pay the three promissory notes of Peterson to McFerrin, recited in the second deed above mentioned, which notes were by them subsequently paid off and satisfied. When the purchase was made by Foster and Templeman, each of the deeds first above mentioned was of record in Brazos county, and prior to and at the time of their purchase they had the title of the 194 acres examined by attorneys, and were advised by them that the title to the same was good. Foster and Templeman had no notice nor knowledge of the transactions between M. W. Peterson and Zilpha McFerrin and her husband other than as is disclosed by the record of the two first-mentioned deeds; nor did they know that Jesse McFerrin held the note or obligation of Peterson described in the deed first mentioned, and herein above copied, in his possession when they purchased the land from him. Zilpha McFerrin died during the latter part of 1901, leaving Johnnie McFerrin, her only surviving child, and Lillie Price, Gus Price, and Henry Price, children of her daughter, — Price, her only surviving grandchildren, who were her only heirs. Johnnie McFerrin died after this action was brought, leaving as his heirs the aforementioned grandchildren of his mother. He also left uncles, who are his father's full brothers. The facts just stated were, in substance, found by the trial court; and, there being no statement of facts with the record, are adopted by us.

This suit was brought August 24, 1905, by the minors, Johnnie McFerrin, and the above-named grandchildren of Zilpha McFerrin against M. W. Peterson, Ward Templeman, and W. J. Foster, to recover upon the obligation or note for $2,400 of M. W. Peterson, set out in the foregoing conclusions of fact, and to foreclose a vendor's lien on the land for which such instrument was given. The defendants, Ward Templeman and W. J. Foster, after interposing general and special exceptions and a general denial to plaintiffs' petition, specially pleaded the matters recited in the deed of January 25, 1899, from Zilpha McFerrin to M. W. Peterson, and the facts relating thereto, set forth in our conclusions of fact, in discharge of the alleged obligation or note sued upon. They further pleaded that they were purchasers in good faith for value, without notice, etc. M. W. Peterson having died during the pendency of the suit, his wife, Jessie, voluntarily made herself a party defendant, and after pleading the insolvency of her husband's estate at the time of his death, and that there had been no administration thereon, nor necessity therefor, disclaimed all interest in the land upon which the alleged lien is sought to be foreclosed, and adopted the answer of her codefendants. The case was tried before the court without a jury, who rendered judgment against Mrs. Jessie Peterson for the amount sued for, together with a foreclosure of the alleged vendor's lien on the land, as against her codefendants.

It cannot be successfully contended that the instrument sued upon was not the property of Mrs. Zilpha McFerrin when it was executed by Peterson for a part of the purchase money of the land he bought from her. It is axiomatic that no one can be an heir during the lifetime of his ancestor. Therefore, as Mrs. McFerrin had no heirs when the instrument was executed, and it could not then be known who would be her heirs when the money would become due, the writing sued upon must have necessarily remained her property, unless she parted with the title, until the occurrence of the event which would disclose her heirs to whom, by its terms, it would then be due and payable. It being her property, she could dispose of it, or make such contract with the obligor affecting it as she might see fit. Indeed the contention of appellees that she gave it to her children subsequent to its execution is a concession on their part that it was her property up to that time. For if she did not own it, she could not give it to any one. Therefore plaintiffs' ownership of the instrument sued on necessarily depends upon whether or not Mrs. McFerrin gave it to her children when she delivered it to Jesse McFerrin, telling him she wanted him to keep it, and that it was for her children. From the view we take of the case, it is deemed unnecessary to determine the question whether the transaction just referred to constituted a gift from her to her children or not. Let it be assumed that the transaction contained all the essential elements of a gift inter vivos, and that such gift was absolute and irrevocable, still, as the appellants had no notice of it, they were not affected by the gift; for the findings of the trial court show indisputably every fact necessary to constitute Templeman and Foster purchasers in good faith for value; and completely negative any personal liability of Mrs. Peterson upon the instrument sued upon. In fact, the allegations in plaintiffs' petition disclose no liability on her part.

The paper upon which this action is predicated is not a negotiable instrument; and, being, when executed, the separate property of Zilpha McFerrin, Templeman and Foster when they purchased had the right to rely upon the recitals in the deed of Mrs. McFerrin to their vendor that such instrument had been satisfied and canceled by mutual agreement of the parties; nor were they put upon further inquiry regarding the matter. *Moran v. CLARK et al. v. SOUTHWESTERN LIFE INS. CO. et al.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Oct. 21, 1908. Rehearing Denied Nov. 18, 1908.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 182*)—RIGHTS OF WIDOW AND CHILDREN—LIFE POLICY.

A widow's right to a yearly allowance for herself and children, and in lieu of a homestead, is inferior to the claim of a bank on a life policy, delivered to it by decedent to secure a debt.

2. INSURANCE (§ 347*)—LIFE POLICY—ASSIGNMENT—WHO CAN OBJECT.

Insurer having waived the requirements of a life policy as to the form of an assignment of the policy by insured to secure a debt, no one else could attack the form.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; Arthur W. Seeligson, Judge.

Consolidated actions by Cora Clark and by the Woods National Bank against the Southwestern Life Insurance Company, Whitney Patrick and others intervening. From the judgment plaintiff Clark brings error. Affirmed.

A. C. Bullitt and V. M. Clark, for appellant. W. P. Lobban and Cobbs & Cobbs, for appellees.

FLY, J. Cora Patrick, as the duly qualified survivor of the community estate of herself and her deceased husband, Lee Patrick, instituted this suit against the Southwestern Life Insurance Company to recover $5,000 insurance on the life of said Lee Patrick. The Woods National Bank had in a separate suit sought to recover the same insurance from the insurance company, alleging that the same had been transferred to it by Lee Patrick, and at the instance of the insurance company the two causes were consolidated, and it prayed that the question of ownership of the money be established by the court, so that it would be protected in the payment of the same. Through their next friend and attorney, A. C. Bullitt, Whitney Patrick, Cora Patrick, and Dulcie Patrick, minor children of Cora Patrick and Lee Patrick, intervened in the suit claiming an interest in the insurance money, which had been paid by the Southwestern Insurance Company into the registry of the court. For further statement we refer to the opinion in case of Insurance Co. v. Woods National Bank (Tex. Civ. App.) 107 S. W. 114, which was an appeal from the same judgment from which this writ of error is prosecuted. The case was submitted on special issues, and the judgment rendered is thus described in that opinion: "Upon those answers the court rendered judgment that neither appellant Mrs. Patrick nor the minors should recover anything, that appellant recover all costs incurred by reason of the suit of Mrs. Patrick, and the intervention of the minors, and that the Woods National Bank recover of appellant the sum of $5,000, the principal amount of the policy, the sum of $245, interest at 6 per cent. per annum from January 5, 1906, until October 29, 1906, $600, the statutory penalty for refusal to pay the loss, and $500 attorney's fees, the whole being $6,345. It was also provided in the judgment that the clerk should pay the $5,000, paid into the registry of the court by appellant, to Woods National † Writ of error denied by Supreme Court.

Bank, upon the execution of a bond by said bank in the sum of $8,000, payable to the district judge, or his successors, conditioned that the bank would repay the money, with interest, to the successful party in the suit." This writ of error is prosecuted by Cora Patrick, who became Cora Clark by intermarriage with V. M. Clark after the judgment was rendered. The minors did not join in the petition for writ of error, and they are in this court, together with Woods National Bank and the insurance company, as defendants in error. The evidence justifies the conclusions that Lee Patrick, whose life was insured for $5,000 by the Southwestern Life Insurance Company placed his policy of insurance in the hands of the Woods National Bank as collateral security for a debt greatly in excess thereof that he owed to the bank, and the policy was in the hands of the bank at the time that Lee Patrick died, and he was at that time indebted to the bank in the sum of $13,000. The form prescribed in the policy for its assignment was not complied with, but the facts showed, and the jury found, that the insurance company had recognized the assignment, and had waived the formal mode of assignment.

There is practically but one point to be decided in this case, and that is: Is the claim of plaintiff in error for a yearly allowance for herself and children, and in lieu of a homestead, superior to the claim of the bank on the policy, which had been placed in its possession by Lee Patrick to secure the payment of a debt due by him to the bank? In connection with that issue it may be stated that it was shown beyond controversy that the policy was delivered by Lee Patrick to the bank, to be held as security for a debt, and was in its possession at the time of Patrick's death. Mrs. Patrick admitted these facts, while acting as survivor, both orally and in writing. The issue presented has been time and again decided adversely to the claim of plaintiffs in error, by the appellate courts of Texas, which a brief review of the decisions will clearly demonstrate.

In the case of Huyler v. Dahoney, 48 Tex. 234, the administrator sued to recover certain promissory notes, left with the defendant as collateral security by the decedent for a debt owed by him to the defendant. The Supreme Court said: "When such negotiable instruments are deposited as collateral security for a debt, the creditor is not a mere mortgagee or lienholder, who, in case of the death of his debtor, must prove up his claim against the estate, and ask the aid of the probate court to enforce his lien. He has in his own hands the means of paying himself, and may, at any time after his debt is due, collect the collaterals, and appropriate the proceeds to such payment." That decision was reiterated in the case of Williams v. Lumkin, 74 Tex. 601, 12 S. W. 488.

In the case of Andrews v. Life Insurance Company, 92 Tex. 584, 50 S. W. 572, it appeared that the Union Central Life Insurance Company had issued a policy on the life of W. L. Andrews for the sum of $5,000. He died, and the insurance company paid the amount due on this policy to one A. P. Dyke. The court said: "The plaintiff claims that if Dyke was in fact a creditor of the deceased to the extent of the amount named in the policy, then she is entitled to recover, because the estate was insolvent, and there was no homestead or other exempted property which the court could set apart to the widow and minor children, and no property or funds out of which they could be furnished a year's support, and that the order of the probate court, setting apart the fund to be derived from the collection of this policy to the widow and children, gives a prior claim to that of the creditor. The petition alleges that Dyke, if a creditor at all, held the policy as collateral security for his debt. If it be agreed that the policy was in Dyke's hands as collateral to secure the indebtedness to him, then he had the right to collect it and apply the proceeds to the payment of his debt, and his claim was superior to that of the plaintiff and her children." The Supreme Court reversed the judgment, and on another appeal to the Court of Civil Appeals, in affirming the judgment of the lower court, it was said: "Dyke is shown to be the absolute owner of the policy, and it was not necessary to his recovery to show any assignment of it to him." Andrews v. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co., 24 Tex. Civ. App. 425, 58 S. W. 1039.

In the case of Fulton v. National Bank, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 115, 62 S. W. 84, decided by this court, the deceased had placed with the bank certain corporate shares to secure an indebtedness due by him. Some of the shares had been paid for by the bank, for the benefit of deceased, but there were others for which it did not appear that the bank had advanced the purchase price. Mrs. Fulton, the widow of deceased, sought to have the stock set apart as an allowance for her and her children. This court held that, as to all the shares except eight, the bank had a vendor's lien, which would be superior to a claim for an allowance, and as to the other shares, not paid for by the bank, this court said: "The statute does not authorize an administrator to assume or recover possession of property which the decedent had disposed of and was himself not entitled to. Fulton had neither possession of any of this property, nor was entitled to its possession at his death. He had a right to acquire or regain possession of it by satisfying the creditor who held it, and his administrator has no better right." The same rule fits the facts of this case to a nicety. The court, however, went farther in that case, and held: "But independently of the reasons stated in the above paragraph, the expressed views of the Supreme Court are not in accord with plaintiff's contention that these pledged stocks were subject primarily to the payment of allowances to widow and children." After a quotation from Andrews v. Insurance Company, herein cited, the court proceeded: "We are of the opinion that a pledgee of certificates of stock is entitled to hold them as against an administrator of the pledgor, and is entitled to receive and enforce dividends or other benefits attaching thereto so long as his claim is unsatisfied."

The policy was pledged to Woods National Bank to secure a debt he owed the bank, and he could not have recovered possession of the policy, without payment of the debt for which it was pledged, and neither can his wife and children. The insurance company having waived the requirements in the policy as to its assignment, no one else had the right to attack the form of the transfer. Coleman v. Anderson, 98 Tex. 570, 86 S. W. 730; Embry v. Harris, 107 Ky. 61, 52 S. W. 958; Lockett v. Lockett, 90 S. W. 1152, 26 Ky. Law Rep. 300; Cplitz v. Karel, 118 Wis. 527, 95 N. W. 948, 62 L. R. A. 982, 99 Am. St. Rep. 1004; McCauley v. Nat. Bank, 27 S. C. 215, 3 S. E. 193. It has also been held that where a debtor made an assignment of a policy upon his life as collateral security for his debt, the assignee does not waive his rights in the policy, by reason of having procured an allowance of his claim against the estate. Hight v. Taylor, 97 Ind. 392.

The judgment, as reformed in our opinion on the other branch of this case, will be affirmed.

STEGER & SONS PIANO MFG. CO. et al. v. MacMASTER.†

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. June 27, 1908. Rehearing Denied Oct. 17, 1908.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 837*)—PRESENTATION BELOW—OBJECTIONS TO PETITION—FAILURE TO STATE CAUSE OF ACTION.

In a suit to enjoin the prosecution of suits brought in a justice's court, assignments of error to a refusal to dismiss the injunction because the petition did not show any equity on its face, nor that plaintiff was entitled to the injunction, and because it failed to allege his defenses to the suits, were objections in the nature of demurrers and exceptions to the petition, and the proper practice was to first demur to the petition, and assign an adverse ruling thereon as error, and hence only require the appellate court to determine whether the petition would have been good on demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 837.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 719*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—NECESSITY—FAILURE TO STATE CAUSE OF ACTION.

It would be the duty of the Court of Civil Appeals to determine the sufficiency of the petition as against a general demurrer, even though there were no assignments of error as to its sufficiency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2973; Dec. Dig. § 719.*]

3. INJUNCTION (§ 19*)—GROUNDS—MULTIPLICITY OF SUITS.

Rev. St. 1895, art. 2989, cl. 3, authorizes the district court to issue injunctions where the applicant is entitled thereto under the principles of equity. The petition alleged that plaintiff sold on commission pianos consigned to him by defendants under written contracts providing that, on all time sales, plaintiff was allowed the first payment by the purchaser to a certain amount, and was to remit the remainder to defendants, together with sufficient notes, etc., to make the total remittance at least 50 per cent. over the price at which the instruments were consigned to plaintiff, the excess to be placed to his credit until defendants' interest therein was satisfied when it should belong to plaintiff; that plaintiff should guarantee the notes and pay for any pianos not paid for by the purchaser; that, after plaintiff had terminated his employment, defendants brought suits in justice's court for a certain sum and to recover four pianos, or their value, which defendants claimed that plaintiff had not paid for, but that defendants were in fact, largely indebted to plaintiff above the amount sued for because of their failure to remit for collateral notes held by them, and plaintiff charged that the justice's suits were brought to vex and needlessly embarrass him, and prayed that their prosecution be enjoined, and that all matters arising out of the contract be settled in this suit. Held, that the petition was sufficient on general demurrer to authorize the district court to grant the relief prayed on the ground of multiplicity of suits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 18; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

4. INJUNCTION (§ 25*)—ACTIONS AT LAW—GROUNDS FOR RELIEF—ERRORS.

As a general rule, when a court of law has jurisdiction of the parties, the subject-matter, and the amount in controversy, and is proceeding in a lawful manner, equity will not interfere to control the proceedings for mere errors of law or judgment, where the trial court can properly determine the dispute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 24; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

5. EQUITY (§ 51*)—JURISDICTION—MULTIPLICITY OF SUITS.

In order to prevent a multiplicity of suits, equity will take cognizance of a controversy, determine the rights of the parties, and grant the relief required to meet the ends of justice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 167-171; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 216*)—OBJECTIONS NOT MADE BELOW—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS.

Where the objection to instructions is merely that matters were omitted therefrom which were not specially requested to be supplied, there is no error available.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. § 216;* Trial, Cent. Dig. § 628.]

7. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS—IGNORING ISSUES.

In an action to enjoin certain suits and settle the rights of the parties under a contract by which plaintiff was to sell pianos consigned to him by defendants, and remit part of the first payments, and notes for the remainder due, so as to make the total amount remitted at least 50 per cent. over the price at which they were consigned to plaintiff, and, after defendants' interests in the notes were satisfied, the residue collected on them was to belong to plaintiff, defendants having negligently failed to collect such notes and make returns as provided for, a requested instruction submitting defendants' right to recover the sum allowed as a discount to plaintiff on his personal notes on account of plaintiff's failure to carry out the terms of the settlement after having received that discount was properly refused as ignoring plaintiff's right to recover for the collateral held by defendants under their contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

Appeal from District Court, Tarrant County; Mike E. Smith, Judge.

Suit by James MacMaster against the Steger & Sons Piano Manufacturing Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Defendants' twentieth assignment of error was that the court erred in failing to submit the question whether the pianos in controversy were sold to plaintiff under the parol contract alleged in plaintiff's petition, or whether they were consigned to him under the terms of the written contract attached to the petition.

The twenty-second assignment of error was that the court erred in failing to submit the issue whether the settlement alleged in the petition and answer was in fact consummated.

The twenty-third assignment of error was that the court erred in failing to submit the question whether defendants were entitled to recover of plaintiff a certain sum, the balance due on plaintiff's personal notes, as set out in defendants' answer.

Special charge No. 3 requested by defendants submitted the question of defendants' right to recover the discount allowed plaintiff on his personal notes, because of plaintiff's failure to carry out the terms of the settlement after having received the discount.

Defendants' twenty-seventh assignment was as to error in overruling defendants' special exception to the allegations of the supplemental petition because plaintiff sought thereby to contradict and vary by parol the terms of the written contracts attached to his original petition, and the averments of the petition excepted to were that, after the written contracts had been entered into, plaintiff and defendants entered into a custom and oral contract whereby defendants undertook the collection of collateral sent them by plaintiff, and that plaintiff had frequently demanded certain collateral which he had means of collecting, and informed defendants thereof, but defendants ignored his request, whereby the collateral became uncollectible.

Flournoy, Smith & Stover and McLean & Scott, for appellants. Israel Dreeben and McCart, Bowlin & McCart, for appellee.

CONNER, C. J. This is an injunction suit filed by appellee to restrain appellants and John L. Terrell and Charles T. Rowland, two justices of the peace of precinct No. 1, Tarrant county, from prosecuting five several suits filed in said justice courts by appellants against appellee, and to recover damages as set out in the petition. The trial resulted in the perpetuation of the preliminary injunction that had been issued and in a judgment for appellee in the sum of $555.60, from which this appeal has been prosecuted.

In the first seven assignments it is urged that "the court erred in refusing to dismiss the injunction suit herein against defendants" because of various omissions in and objections to appellee's petition for injunction. For instance, in the third assignment, it is urged that "the court erred in refusing to dismiss plaintiff's injunction filed herein because the allegation of plaintiff's petition for injunction does not show any equity on its face, or that plaintiff was entitled to said injunction in this," etc.; contradiction in certain clauses being alleged. The fourth assignment is that "the court erred in refusing to dismiss the injunction suit herein against defendants because the plaintiff failed to allege what defense he had to the suits pending in the justice court enjoined herein," etc. We think it manifest from these assignments that they are wholly in the nature of demurrers and exceptions to the petition, and that the proper practice would have been to first challenge the sufficiency of the petition by demurrers, and, in event of adverse rulings, to assign error to the action of the court. We think the assignments of error thus noticed can be considered by us in no event further than to scrutinize appellee's petition for the purpose of determining whether it is good as against a general demurrer, which doubtless it would be our duty to do at all events. So far as we deem it necessary to here state, appellee alleged that prior to all dates involved he had been engaged in selling on commission pianos consigned to him by the appellant piano companies under written contracts providing for private prices to be paid by appellee, when sold for cash, by remitting to appellants the invoice price to him; that on all time or part cash sales appellee was to be allowed "the first cash payment made by the purchaser to the amount of $50, the remainder of such cash payment I am to remit to you (the appellant piano companies), together with a sufficient amount of the interest-bearing notes, contracts, or leases first becoming due to make the total amount so remitted equal to a sum not less than 50 per cent. in excess of the price at which the instrument is consigned to me, which excess shall be placed to my collateral credit until your equity in said notes, contracts, or leases is satisfied, then this excess shall revert to me, and I hereby guarantee the payments of all notes, contracts, and leases so taken, waiving protest and notice of protest and default. And if default is made in the payments of any notes, contracts, or leases so guaranteed, I agree upon your demand, to repossess, or cause to be repossessed at my expense, any instrument for which said default note or notes, contracts, or leases were given in payment. Should I be unable to regain possession of such instrument, I agree to pay the entire amount due you on same in cash, or you may at your option apply any part of my collaterals which you may hold in full or part settlement of the same." The contract further provided that "I [appellee] hereby agree to assist you [the piano companies] in making collection of notes, contracts, and leases indorsed by me when called upon to do so, and without charge for services rendered." Appellee alleged that, prior to the institution of the suits in the justice court, he had terminated his connection with the appellant companies; that said suits had been instituted for the cash sum of $50 alleged to be due, and for the recovery of four certain pianos, or their value, which had been consigned to him, and for which appellants alleged he had not paid; that in truth appellants were largely indebted to him in excess of the amount so sued for on account of the value of collateral notes that had been delivered to appellants under the terms of their said written contracts, and which they had negligently failed to collect and apply and remit, as had been provided, and it was charged that said suits had been instituted in said justice courts with the purpose of vexing, harassing, and needlessly embarrassing appellee, and he prayed that appellants be enjoined from further prosecuting them, and that all matters arising out of said contracts be settled in this suit, and that he have judgment as prayed for. The petition contained many other allegations not deemed necessary to an understanding of this opinion; but as perhaps sufficient therefor the above outline has been given.

The main contention seems to be that the district court is without power to enjoin the justice courts from proceeding with the causes of action properly filed therein, "when said justice court has jurisdiction of the parties, the subject-matter of the suits, the amount in controversy, and is proceeding in a lawful manner with the trial and the disposition of the same," and the case of Railway v. Dowe, 70 Tex. 1, 6 S. W. 790, is cited in support of this contention. The general rule under the present Constitution of this state is undoubtedly as stated in the contention made. Courts of equity will not interfere to control the proceedings of other courts where there have been mere errors of law or of judgment, or where the lower court can hear and determine the dispute. But our statute expressly authorizes the district court to issue injunctions in all cases where "the applicant for such writ may show himself entitled thereto under the principles of equity." See Rev. St. 1895, art. 2989, cl. 3.

Says Mr. Pomeroy in the fourth volume of his work on Equity Jurisprudence (3d Ed., § 1360): "The use of injunctions to stay actions at law was almost coeval with the establishment of the chancery jurisdiction. Without this means of interference to protect the rights of its suitors, the court of chancery could never have established, extended, and enforced its own jurisdiction." And it is a well-established doctrine that a court of equity may take cognizance of a controversy, determine the rights of all the parties, and grant the relief required to meet the ends of justice in order to prevent a multiplicity of suits. 1 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 243 et seq. In section 271 of the volume just cited the author says that the judgment of a court of equity to prevent multiplicity of suits "has also been admitted, under special circumstances, to settle the entire controversy between two parties growing out of some complicated contract involving numerous questions and many actions at law." So that, on the whole, we think it can be scarcely doubted that appellee's petition is sufficient on general demurrer to authorize the relief he sought. Certainly as against appellants, at least, he would be entitled to the restraining process invoked.

Under the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and sixteenth assignments it is insisted, in substance, that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict in appellee's favor on the issue of negligence on appellants' part in the collection of certain collateral notes, for the value of which appellee alleged he was entitled under the terms of the contract. A statement of all the evidence on this issue would confuse rather than otherwise, and we hence deem it sufficient to omit details and to say that, after careful examination, we must disagree with appellants' contention in this particular.

The first paragraph of the court's charge objected to in the fifteenth assignment was correct as far as it went, and the errors complained of in the twentieth, twenty-second, and twenty-third assignments at most constituted omissions merely calling for requested special instructions. Appellants' special charge No. 3 was properly rejected as ignoring appellee's right to recover upon his collateral that appellants were shown to have and to have negligently failed to collect and return as provided for by the written contracts. Nor do we find error in the action of the court in overruling appellants' special exception as complained of in the twenty-seventh assignment. The averments of appellee's petition excepted to seem to us to be consistent with the contracts declared upon, and as in nowise varying or contradicting their terms, as is insisted under this assignment.

We conclude that no reversible error has been shown, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

WISCONSIN & ARKANSAS LUMBER CO.
v. THOMPSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 26, 1908.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 83*)—EMPLOYÉS' DISCHARGE—WAGES—REFUSAL TO PAY—CHARACTER.

A paymaster's statement to discharged employes, who demanded payment of their wages: "You would not go to the car; if this had been reasonable, I would pay you"—was not an absolute refusal to pay, within Acts 1905, p. 538, prescribing a penalty where a corporation fails to pay the wages of discharged employes within seven days from their discharge; the paymaster merely meaning that the employes were not reasonable because they did not go to the car, which was the customary place for payment, and that he could not pay them before definitely ascertaining how much the company owed them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Saline County; W. H. Evans, Judge.

Action by C. F. Thompson and another against the Wisconsin & Arkansas Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

N. P. Richmond and H. Berger, for appellant. H. B. Means, for appellees.

HART, J. This is a suit by C. F. Thompson and J. M. Fielding against the Wisconsin & Arkansas Lumber Company to recover the penalty imposed by statute upon corporations for failing to pay the wages of discharged employes within seven days from their discharge. Acts 1905, p. 538. Separate suits were brought, but the cases were consolidated by order of the court and tried at the same time. There was a jury trial, and verdict for the plaintiffs, and defendant has appealed.

The essential facts in this case are the same as those in the case of Wisconsin & Arkansas Lumber Company v. Reaves, 82 Ark. 377, 102 S. W. 206, and the principles there announced control here. The only difference between the facts in this case and the Reaves Case is as follows: When the laborers went to the paymaster's office, and presented their identification checks, the paymaster said: "You would not go to the car; if this had been reasonable, I would pay you." The paymaster explained that the identification checks did not show whether the parties were discharged, or had merely quit, and did not show the amount due them; that the laborers were in the habit of trading at the company's store in the woods; and that he did not know how much they owed until the report from the woods where they worked was received.

If the language above quoted could be construed as an absolute refusal to pay on the part of the company, then the present case could be distinguished from the Reaves Case; for it would be no use for the laborers to leave their addresses, if the company refused absolutely to pay them. This is in accord with the reasoning of the case of St. L. S. W. Ry. Co. v. Brown, 75 Ark. 137, 86 S. W. 994. We do not think, however, the language is susceptible of that interpretation. The paymaster merely meant to tell them they were not reasonable because they did not go to the car, which was the usual and customary place for the men to be paid off, and that he could not pay them until he had definitely ascertained how much the company owed them.

Counsel for the plaintiffs urge that the Reaves Case be overruled; but no new arguments are presented therefor. No reason is given, and none is perceived by the court, to warrant a departure from the rule adopted in that case. Therefore, under the undisputed facts as disclosed by the record, the court below should have directed a verdict for the defendant, as requested by it.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

1. BOUNDARIES (§ 12*)—NONNAVIGABLE LAKE—OWNERSHIP—RIPARIAN RIGHTS.

The title of adjoining landowners extends to the center of a nonnavigable lake by virtue of their riparian rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

2. QUIETING TITLE (§ 10*)—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a suit to quiet title, plaintiff must succeed, if at all, on the strength of her own title, the burden being on her to show that the land in controversy was of such a character that it passed to her under her chain of title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. § 36; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

3. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 25*)—GOVERNMENT SURVEY—EVIDENCE.

Where the plats of a government survey of land in controversy and the field notes accompanying them showed that the lands when surveyed constituted the bed of a lake and were within the meandered lines thereof, they constituted prima facie evidence that the lands were a part of the lake bed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

4. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 25*)—SURVEY—CORRECTNESS—IMPEACHMENT.

Where a government survey erroneously included within the meandered lines of a nonnavigable lake a quantity of swamp lands as a part of the lake bed, but neither the United States land department nor the state of Arkansas had ever questioned the correctness of the survey but had always treated it as correct, it could not be impeached by an individual claimant in a collateral proceeding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

5. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 108*)—SWAMP LANDS—SECRETARY OF INTERIOR'S DECISION—IMPEACHMENT.

A decision of the Secretary of the Interior as to whether certain lands are within the terms of the swamp land grant is conclusive in the absence of fraud, and cannot be collaterally attacked.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 804; Dec. Dig. § 108.*]

6. BOUNDARIES (§ 12*) — CONVEYANCE BY STATE—PATENTS—EFFECT.

The legal effect of state patents of fractional sections and parts of sections of public lands surrounding the meandered lines of a nonnavigable lake according to the official plats of the public survey was to convey all riparian rights, and by virtue thereof to vest prima facie title to the bed of the lake as shown by the plats from the meandered shore line to the center.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

7. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 58*)—SWAMP LAND ACT—EFFECT.

The swamp land act (Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850, c. 84, 9 Stat. 519), while a grant in present, did not pass the legal title of the lands transferred thereby to the states until the lands had been selected as such and the patents were delivered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 181; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

8. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 25*) — SURVEY—CONCLUSIVENESS—MISTAKES.

Until the government elects to correct mistakes in an original survey of public land and asserts a claim to the lands by virtue of such mistakes, no one can complain or dispute the title of the holders of a prima facie title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 33; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

On Rehearing.

9. EVIDENCE (§ 23*)—JUDICIAL NOTICE—GOVERNMENT SURVEYS.

Courts take judicial notice of the general system of government surveys, and know that lands are surveyed and platted into sections, parts of sections, and fractionals where they abut on streams or other bodies of water.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 29, 30; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

10. BOUNDARIES (§ 10*) — DESCRIPTION OF LAND.

Description of land according to terminology employed in the system of governmental surveys and plats is necessarily a reference to the plats of those surveys, there being nothing known of townships, sections, and parts of sections, except such as are described in the plats of the government surveys.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 90, 91; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

11. BOUNDARIES (§ 10*) — DESCRIPTION—REFERENCE TO PLAT.

A conveyance of a township "according to plats of the surveys" does not include lands which do not appear on the plat of the surveys.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 90, 91; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

12. STIPULATIONS (§ 14*) — CONSTRUCTION — "TOWNSHIPS."

In a suit to quiet title, a stipulation provided that all the surveyed lands in the vicinity were in September, 1850, swamps and overflowed lands, and passed to the state, and that the "townships," including Walker's Lake as meandered on the map, were included by the Secretary of the Interior in the list of lands granted to the state under the swamp land act (Act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850, c. 84, 9 Stat. 519). Held, that the word "townships" as used in such stipulation was limited to the townships as surveyed and platted by the government surveyors, and meant the townships according to the surveys and plats, and did not include unsurveyed lands erroneously included within the meandered line of the lake.

13. JUDGMENT (§ 632*) — CONCLUSIVENESS — PARTIES.

Where the board of directors of a levee district was not a party to a suit involving the character of certain lands conveyed by it to plaintiff under a grant from the state, the rights of the board could not be affected by the decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1148; Dec. Dig. § 632.*]

Appeal from Mississippi Chancery Court; Edward D. Robertson, Chancellor.

Suit by Johanna Little against J. J. Williams and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This case involves a controversy concerning the title to a large body of unsurveyed and unoccupied land containing 1,000 or 1,200 acres of land within the meandered lines of what is known as "Walker's Lake" according to the survey made in 1847 by the United States government. The plaintiff, Johanna Little, claiming to be in actual possession of the lands in controversy, instituted this suit in chancery against the defendant J. J. Williams and others, to quiet her alleged title.

The plaintiff claims title to the land through the following chain: First. United States to state of Arkansas, act of Congress dated September 28, 1850 (chapter 84, 9 Stat. 519), donating swamp and overflowed land. Second. State of Arkansas to Board of Directors of St. Francis Levee District, act of General Assembly dated March 29, 1893 (Laws 1893, p. 172), donating all lands in the district owned by the state. Third. Board of Directors of St. Francis Levee District to plaintiff, deed dated March 11, 1903.

The defendants are the owners by mesne conveyances running back to the state of Arkansas and the United States of the fractional sections, according to government survey, of land bordering on the meandered line of Walker's Lake, and claim title to the lands in controversy by virtue of their alleged riparian rights as such owners. Walker's Lake is, and at the time of the government survey was, a shallow nonnavigable lake. The testimony is conflicting as to the true boundaries of the lake and the character of the territory now in controversy—whether it was water or swamp land—at the time of the government survey. Testimony introduced by the plaintiff tends to establish the fact that the territory was swamp land at that time; and the testimony of defendants' witnesses tends to show that at that time the waters of the lake extended up to the meandered lines of the survey, but have since then receded so as to leave the land dry.

The parties, in addition to introducing the plats and field notes of the government survey and depositions of witnesses, entered into the following written agreement as to facts, which writing was a part of the record: "In order to avoid labor and expense in taking testimony, it is agreed by counsel representing defendants that all of the surveyed lands in the vicinity and locality of what would be south $\frac{1}{2}$ of section 25, the whole of section 36, township 16, range 12 east, and northwest $\frac{1}{4}$ and south $\frac{1}{2}$ of section 31, township 16, range 13 east, Mississippi county, Arkansas, if same were surveyed, were in September, 1850, swamp and overflowed lands, and passed to the state of Arkansas, under the grant of the United States, of date September 28, 1850, and that the townships including Walker's Lake, as meaned on the map, were included by the Secretary of the Interior of the United States government in the list of lands prepared by him and forwarded by him to the Governor of Arkansas, showing the lands which passed to the state under the grant of 1850, and that said lands embraced in said list were subsequently covered by patents from the government of the United States. And it is further agreed that the state of Arkansas never undertook to convey the said lands embraced within the meandered lines of Walker's Lake, except as same might have passed by operation of law to the defendants as riparian owners, prior to the land grant made by the state to the St. Francis Levee Board in 1868."

The chancellor, after hearing the evidence, dismissed the complaint for want of equity, and plaintiff appealed.

Henry Craft, for appellant. S. S. Semmes, Will J. Driver, and Allen Hughes, for appellees. N. W. Norton, amicus curiæ.

McCULLOCH, J. (after stating the facts as above). The first question presented is one of fact, whether, at the time of the government survey in 1847, the land in controversy was a portion of the bed of Walker's Lake, or whether it was swamp land; for if the former state of fact is found to have existed, then the title of the owners of adjoining lands extended to the center of the lake by virtue of their riparian rights as such owners, and, since the recession or drying up of the waters has left the land exposed, it belongs to them. See Rhodes v. Cissel, 82 Ark. 367, 101 S. W. 758, and cases therein cited.

Appellant was the plaintiff below, seeking to quiet her alleged title, and must succeed, if at all, upon the strength of her own title, and not upon the weakness of that of her adversaries. Chapman & Dewey Land Co. v. Bigelow, 77 Ark. 338, 92 S. W. 534. In other words, the burden of proof is upon her to show that the land in controversy was land and not lake bed at the time of the government survey. In addition to that, the plats of the government survey and the field notes which accompany them show that these lands then constituted the bed of the lake, and were within the meandered lines of the lake. This establishes, prima facie, that the lands were a part of the lake bed, and the burden is upon the appellant to overcome it by proof to the contrary.

But, thus conceding the burden to be upon the appellant, the testimony which she has adduced convinces us that she is correct in her contention as to this question of fact, and that the land in controversy was swamp land at the time of the government survey, and was not in the bed of the lake. The surveyors made mistakes in delimiting the boundary lines of the lake, and included a large amount of low swampy land, which the waters of the lake did not cover. These mistakes were not unreasonable ones, and do not demonstrate either fraud or gross carelessness on the part of the surveyors, for the evidence shows that there may have been grounds at that time to believe that the meander line followed the bank of the lake. The intervening territory between the meander line and the bank of the lake was undoubtedly of that indeterminate character, low lands partly covered by water, about which the surveyors could reasonably have been mistaken, and which they may have concluded was the bed of a shallow part of the lake. There was a slash or low place along the meander line, and, as this may have been temporarily covered by water at the time, the surveyors followed its outer line, believing it to be the shore line of the lake.

We are satisfied, however, that a mistake was made in establishing this line as the shore line of the lake. Out of the testimony of all the witnesses, who testify from recollection as to the condition of the land and the boundaries of the lake many years ago, the preponderance lies, we think, with those who say that the land in controversy was swamp land, and not lake bed. In addition to this, the condition in which the undisputed evidence shows the land to be at this day, and the character of the timber growing thereon, is convincing that it was not a portion of the lake in 1847. The present banks of the lake are well marked, and have not materially changed during the memory of those persons whose testimony on the subject preponderates. We will, therefore, treat it as established that mistakes were made in survey, and that this land was in fact swamp land, and not lake bed. The real location of Walker's Lake was and is far inside the meander lines run by the surveyors. At some points the bank of the lake is over a mile from the surveyed meander line.

But conceding this to be true, the fact remains that a meander line was surveyed, which the field notes show was intended to indicate the shore line of the lake. A body of water constituting a nonnavigable lake existed then and still exists within the meander line, though a considerable distance inward from it. The plats of this survey were filed in the General Land Office of the United States, and were accepted and approved ed by that department of the government as correct. In running the meander lines, the surrounding sections and parts of sections were necessarily made fractional, and, under the swamp land act of 1850 (act Cong. Sept. 28, 1850, c. 84, 9 Stat. 519), surveyed land in the townships surrounding the lake were selected by the state. The selections were approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and patents were issued to the state conveying the land by description "according to the official plats of the survey returned to the General Land Office of the Surveyor General." The state of Arkansas has, from time to time, sold to individuals the surveyed lands and conveyed them by descriptions according to the plats.

Neither the land department of the United States nor of the state of Arkansas has ever questioned the correctness of the survey, but, on the contrary, have up to the present time and do now treat them as correct, if we may view in that light a failure to take any steps looking to a correction. Can an individual question the correctness of the surveys when neither the general government nor the state government has ever done so? Can an individual acquire and assert rights in these unsurveyed lands which the government has never asserted against the riparian rights of the adjoining owners?

The Supreme Court of the United States, as early as the case of Spencer v. Lapsley, 20 How. 264, 15 L. Ed. 902, decided that "the issue of the grant or patent conveys the title, and questions of fraud or irregularity, or excess in the survey, cannot be raised by other parties than the government."

Mr. Justice Lamar, in delivering the opinion of the court in Cragin v. Powell, 128 U. S. 691, 9 Sup. Ct. 203, 32 L. Ed. 566, said: "That the power to make and correct surveys of the public land belongs to the political department of the government, and that, whilst the lands are subject to the supervision of the General Land Office, the decisions of that bureau in all such cases, like that of other special tribunals upon matters within their exclusive jurisdiction, are unassailable by the courts, except by a direct proceeding; and that the latter have no concurrent or original power to make similar corrections, if not elementary principles of our land law, is settled by such a mass of decisions of this court that its mere statement is sufficient. The reason of the rule, as stated by Mr. Justice Catron in the case of Haydel v. Dufresne, 17 How. 23, 15 L. Ed. 115, is that great confusion and litigation would ensue if the judicial tribunals, state and federal, were permitted to interfere and overthrow the public surveys on no other grounds than an opinion that they could have the work in the field done and divisions made more equitably than the department of public lands could do."

In Russell v. Maxwell, 158 U. S. 253, 15 Sup. Ct. 827, 39 L. Ed. 971, Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the court, said: "In the nature of things, a survey made by the government must be held conclusive against collateral attack in controversies between individuals. There must be some tribunal to which final jurisdiction is given in respect to the matter of surveys, and no other tribunal is so competent to deal with the matter as the land department. None other is named in the statutes. If in every controversy between neighbors the accuracy of a survey made by the government were open to question, interminable confusion would ensue."

The same learned judge, in delivering the opinion of the court in Whitaker v. McBride, 197 U. S. 510, 25 Sup. Ct. 530, 49 L. Ed. 857, said: "The official surveys made by the government are not open to collateral attack in an action at law between private parties."

Mr. Farnham, in his work on Water and Water Rights (volume 2, § 422), states the same doctrine, as follows: "Where a patent issues for a fractional lot appearing by the plat of the United States survey to be bounded on one side by a meandered lake, the patent is not void so far as it purports to convey the land under the water, though it was an error in the surveyor to treat the tract covered by water as a lake to be meandered, instead of land to be surveyed. Conceding the patent to that extent to be void, it can be avoided only by the United States in a suit to which the patentee is a party. The land passed, and a private individual cannot complain."

The following decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States announce in effect the same principle: Michigan Land & Timber Co. v. Rust, 168 U. S. 599, 18 Sup. Ct. 208, 42 L. Ed. 591; Humbird v. Avery, 195 U. S. 480, 25 Sup. Ct. 123, 49 L. Ed. 286; Oregon v. Hitchcock, 202 U. S. 60, 26 Sup. Ct. 568, 50 L. Ed. 935.

The decisions of this court in Smith v. Hollis, 46 Ark. 17, and Williamson v. Baugh, 71 Ark. 491, 76 S. W. 423, are based upon the same principle. The court in these cases held that the decision of the Secretary of the Interior, in determining whether or not certain lands came within the terms of the swamp land grant, was, in the absence of fraud, conclusive, and could not be overturned in a collateral proceeding.

The legal effect of the patents to the state of the fractional sections and parts of sections surrounding the meandered lines of the lake, according to the official plats of the public survey, was to convey all riparian rights, and by virtue thereof to vest prima facie title to the bed of the lake, as shown on the plats, from meandered shore lines to center. The conveyances executed by the state in turn to its grantees had the same effect. Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 371, 11 Sup. Ct. 808, 35 L. Ed. 428; Mitchell v. Smale, 140 U. S. 406, 11 Sup. Ct. 819, 35 L. Ed. 442.

If title to the lands in controversy has not passed out of the United States to the state and its grantees in that way, it has never passed at all. Though the swamp land act has been held to be a grant in present, the legal title did not pass until the lands were duly selected as such, and the patents were delivered. Rogers Locomotive Works v. American Emigrant Co., 164 U. S. 559, 17 Sup. Ct. 188, 41 L. Ed. 552; Michigan Land Co. v. Rust, 168 U. S. 589, 18 Sup. Ct. 208, 42 L. Ed. 591; Brown v. Hitchcock, 173 U. S. 473, 19 Sup. Ct. 485, 43 L. Ed. 772; Ogden v. Buckley, 116 Iowa, 852, 89 N. W. 1115; Funston v. Metcalf, 40 Miss. 504.

These lands have never been selected or patented at all, unless the patents to the adjoining fractional sections embraced them. The state of Arkansas, by the compromise settlement contract entered into with the United States, which was approved by act of the General Assembly of Arkansas, March 10, 1897 (Laws 1897, p. 88), and by act of Congress, April 29, 1898, c. 229, § 4, 30 Stat. 368 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 1592), expressly relinquished her claim to any unpatented swamp land. So the title to these lands is either in the owners of the adjoining lands by virtue of their riparian rights, according to the legal purport of the patents and subsequent conveyances, or it remains in the United States government. Until the government elects to correct the mistakes in the original survey and assert claim to the lands, no one can complain or dispute the title of the holders of the prima facie title. Schlusser v. Cruickshank, 96 Iowa, 414, 65 N. W. 344; Ogden v. Buckley, 116 Iowa, 352, 89 N. W. 1115; Minnesota Land Co. v. Davis, 40 Minn. 455, 42 N. W. 299; Lamprey v. Mead, 54 Minn. 290, 55 N. W. 1132, 40 Am. St. Rep. 328; Whitaker v. McBride, 197 U. S. 510, 25 Sup. Ct. 530, 49 L. Ed. 857. Appellant, in no event, has any shadow of title, for if the state took title as riparian owner under the patent to the adjoining land, she in like manner conveyed it to her grantees, and had no title to donate to the levee board. Towell v. Etter, 69 Ark. 34, 59 S. W. 1096, 63 S. W. 53; Jefferies v. East Omaha Land Co., 134 U. S. 178, 10 Sup. Ct. 518, 33 L. Ed. 872.

Whether or not the state can now correct any mistake as to the quantity of land conveyed by her patent to individuals, is not presented in this case, and we therefore refrain from any discussion on that point.

The case of Chapman & Dewey Land Co. v. Bigelow, 77 Ark. 338, 92 S. W. 534, has no application to the facts of the present case, and is not controlling. In that case the meander line was run by the government surveyors along the bank of a stream, and title was claimed under a patent of lands bordering on this meandered line by virtue of riparian rights to lands lying beyond the body of water meandered. This court refused to sustain the claim, holding that no title passed under the patent to lands lying beyond the meandered stream.

Neither do Horne v. Smith, 159 U. S. 40, 15 Sup. Ct. 988, 40 L. Ed. 68, Niles v. Cedar Point Club, 175 U. S. 300, 20 Sup. Ct. 124, 44 L. Ed. 171, nor French-Glenn Live Stock Co. v. Springer, 185 U. S. 47, 22 Sup. Ct. 563, 46 L. Ed. 800, have any bearing on the present case. They are cited in the Bigelow Case, and the facts of each bring them all within the same class of cases, but they have no controlling force here, because of the difference in the facts.

We conclude that the decree of the chancellor is correct, and the same is in all things affirmed.

On Rehearing.

The decision is vigorously assailed on the ground that we were mistaken in holding that the unsurveyed land between the meandered line and true shore line of this lake was not patented by the United States to the state of Arkansas. Courts take cognizance, judicially of the general system of government surveys, and, accordingly, we know that lands are surveyed and platted into sections and parts of sections and into fractionals where they abut on streams or other bodies of water. The record in this case contains a plat and the field notes of the governmental surveys of the land surrounding Walker's Lake, and they confirm the facts of which we are already judicially cognizant. Bittle v. Stuart, 34 Ark. 224; 7 Enc. Ev. pp. 987, 988; Knabe v. Burden, 88 Ala. 436, 7 South. 92; Ledbetter v. Borland, 128 Ala. 418, 29 South. 579; Peck v. Sims, 120 Ind. 345, 22 N. E. 313; Muse v. Richards, 70 Miss. 581, 12 South. 821; Stanford v. Bailey, 122 Ga. 404, 50 S. E. 161.

Description of lands, according to terminology employed in the system of governmental surveys and plats of lands, is necessarily a reference to the plats of those surveys; for those terms are meaningless unless so considered with reference to the surveys and plats. There is nothing known of townships, sections, and parts of sections of lands except such as are described in the plats of the government surveys. Therefore, giving the word "township," used in the stipulation of facts, the meaning which we must attribute to the parties who employed the term, it has reference to the townships surveyed and platted by the government surveyors, and means the townships according to the surveys and plats. A conveyance of the township "according to plat of the surveys" does not include lands which do not appear on the plat of the surveys. We do not mean to hold that the unsurveyed land could not have been selected as swamp lands and patented to the state by the use of proper descriptive terms in the patent, but this was not accomplished by reference to townships, sections, or parts thereof according to the plat of the surveys when the unsurveyed land did not appear on the plats at all. The plats showed it to be water, and not land.

We are convinced, also, that, even if we discard the technical meaning of the word "township," the language of the stipulation is susceptible of no other reasonable construction than that only the surveyed land appearing on the plat of the public survey was meant to be covered by the agreement. It is evident that the parties meant only the surveyed lands appearing on the plat, leaving all questions as to the character of the unsurveyed territory and title thereto open to further proof and adjudication. We find nothing to indicate that appellees' counsel meant to concede that, if the locus in quo should be found to have been land and not lake bed at the time of the survey in 1847, it was included in the patents from the United States to the state of Arkansas and belonged to appellant. In this respect, the stipulation deals only with the surveyed land. It reads that "all of the surveyed lands in the vicinity and locality * * * were, in September, 1850, swamps and overflowed lands and passed to the state of Arkansas under the grant of the United State of date Sept. 28, 1850, and that the townships including Walker's Lake, as meandered on the map, were included by the Secretary of the Interior of the United States government in the list of lands prepared by him and forwarded by him to the Governor of Arkansas, showing the lands which passed to the state under the grant of 1850, and that said lands embraced in said list were subsequently covered by patents from the government of the United States."

Now, as it was only stipulated that the surveyed lands passed to the state as swamp and overflowed lands under the act of Congress, it would be unreasonable, in the absence of a clear expression, to construe the meaning of the stipulation to be that the unsurveyed lands were patented by the United States to the state.

We therefore think that we were correct in saying that "the legal effect of the patents to the state of the fractional sections and parts of sections surrounding the meandered lines of the lake, according to the official plats of the public survey, was to convey all riparian rights and by virtue thereof to vest prima facie title to the bed of the lake, as shown on the plats, from meandered shore line to center," and that, "if title to the lands in controversy has not passed out of the United States to the state and its grantees in that way, it has never passed at all."

We have not been unmindful of the earnest reliance of counsel upon the case of Kean v. Calumet Canal Co., 190 U. S. 452, 23 Sup. Ct. 651, 47 L. Ed. 1134, but we do not think that the case supports their contention. On the contrary, we think that the views already expressed are in conformity with the conclusion reached in that case. The facts there were that the land in controversy at the time of the survey made by the government, as well as at the time of the issuance of the patent to the state, was the bed of a nonnavigable lake duly meandered by the survey and situated within the bounds of the section of land patented. The court held that the title to the bed of the lake passed to the state under the patent, and in turn to the state's grantee under its patent, basing that conclusion upon the decisions in Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 371, 11 Sup. Ct. 808, 35 L. Ed. 428, and Mitchell v. Smale, 140 U. S. 406, 11 Sup. Ct. 819, 35 L. Ed. 442. It is apparent, therefore, that the court based its conclusion as to the passage of title under the patent upon the fact that the title passed as a riparian right or as an appurtenant to the surveyed land which was conveyed. This is apparent when we consider the language used by the court in the two former cases.

In Hardin v. Jordan, supra, Mr. Justice Bradley, speaking for the court, said: "It has never been held that the lands under water, in front of such grants, are reserved to the United States, or that they can be afterwards granted out to other persons, to the injury of the original grantees. The attempt to make such grants is calculated to render titles uncertain, and to derogate from the value of natural boundaries, like streams and bodies of waters."

In Mitchell v. Smale, supra, the same learned justice, speaking for the court, said: "Our general views with regard to the effect of patents granted for lands around the margin of a nonnavigable lake, and shown by the plat referred to therein to bind on the lake, were expressed in the preceding case of Hardin v. Jordan, and need not be repeated here. We think it a great hardship, and one not to be endured, for the government officers to make new surveys and grants of the beds of such lakes after selling and granting the lands bordering thereon, or represented so to be. It is nothing more nor less than taking from the first grantee a most valuable, and often the most valuable, part of his grant."

It therefore appears from the above quotations that the court held that the title to the bed of the lake passed because of the riparian or appurtenant rights, for it was not surveyed out as land, and was not described on the plat as land. In other words, it was conveyed as lake bed and not as land. And so it is in the present case: If the title to the unsurveyed land in controversy passed at all from the general government to the state under the patents, it passed by virtue of riparian rights, for it was designated on the plats as water, not land; and, if the title did not pass in that way, the state's title in like manner passed to its vendees.

Counsel for the Board of Directors of St. Francis Levee District has filed a brief, as amicus curiæ, calling attention to the fact that the rights of the district in unsurveyed lands claimed to have been donated by the act of 1893 should not be prejudiced by a decision that the compromise between the state and United States affected its right to lands donated prior to the compromise. The district not being a party in the case, its rights cannot be adjudicated herein. The compromise is referred to in the opinion merely to call attention to the fact that the state has thereby released her claim to all unpatented swamp lands, and cannot now make selections of swamp land and call for patents for the purpose of correcting mistakes in surveys. If the state did not obtain title under the patents, it is now too late for her to procure title.

Appellant claims title as vendee of the levee district, but conceding (though not deciding) that the donation act of 1893 could be operative as a grant of the state's equitable claim or title to unpatented swamp lands, and that the state could not thereafter release the claim to the general government, yet the right is not conferred upon appellee to question the accuracy of the original survey, and disturb the prima facie title of prior patentee of the adjoining land.

It may be that the donation act of 1893 conveyed to the levee district the state's equitable title under the swamp land grant of 1850 to unsurveyed lands situated, for instance, like those in the case of Chapman & Dewey Land Co. v. Bigelow, supra, the prima facie title to which had not been created by patent, and that the state could not, subsequent to the donation to the levee district, release the claim to the general government. But we are not required, by the facts of this case, to decide that question.

After a very careful re-examination of the case, bearing in mind the importance and magnitude of the questions and interests involved, we are of the opinion that we reached the correct conclusion on the former hearing. The petition for reconsideration is therefore denied.

SKAGGS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Oct. 19, 1908.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 634*)—TRIAL—ABSENCE OF JUDGE.

Where the judge, during the argument of counsel for accused, left the bench and stepped across the hall from the courtroom to a closet, and was absent for two minutes, during which a practicing attorney of the bar sat in the judge's chair, at his request, but whether the doors were open so that the judge while out of the room could hear the proceedings was not shown, error did not appear.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1461; Dec. Dig. § 634.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 634*) — ABSENCE OF JUDGE.

The integrity of a criminal trial is destroyed by the temporary absence of the judge only when such absence is such that he must for some period have lost control of the proceedings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1461; Dec. Dig. § 634.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 703*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

An instruction that, if defendant confessed he had committed rape on prosecutrix, that alone would not authorize a conviction, but it must be shown that the offense was actually committed, and if the jury should find from the evidence beyond reasonable doubt that defendant confessed, and that the crime was committed, they should then convict, was not objectionable as on the weight of evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1762; Dec. Dig. § 763.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 535*)—"JUDICIAL CONFESSIONS"—EFFECT.

A confession, made by accused on preliminary examination before a magistrate, is a judicial confession, and is sufficient to justify a conviction, under Kirby's Dig. § 2385, providing that a confession, unless made in open court, will not warrant a conviction unless corroborated by proof of the commission of the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 535.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, p. 3854.]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1171*)—APPEAL—CONFESSION OF ERROR.

Where accused confessed to rape, and was convicted of assault with intent to rape, such confession being judicial and sufficient to sustain a conviction of the graver offense, a confession of error by the Attorney General, on account of remarks of the prosecuting attorney, was immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Dec. Dig. § 1171.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1055*)—OPENING STATEMENT—DENUNCIATORY LANGUAGE—OBJECTIONS.

Where the judge sustained an objection to denunciatory language, used by the prosecuting attorney in his opening statement concerning accused, and nothing further was requested, the statement was not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2666; Dec. Dig. § 1055.*]

7. WITNESSES (§ 337*)—ACCUSED—IMPEACHMENT.

After accused had testified in his own behalf, the prosecuting attorney should have been permitted to prove that accused's reputation for morality and veracity was bad, though he was not entitled to show that he was a gambler of the worst sort.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 1129; Dec. Dig. § 337.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 706*)—OFFER OF PROOF.

Accused having testified in his own behalf, it was not error for the prosecuting attorney, in presence of the jury, to request permission to prove that defendant was a man of bad character, a gambler of the worst type, and unworthy of belief, the court having sustained defendant's only objection thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1661; Dec. Dig. § 706.*]

9. RAPE (§ 48*)—EVIDENCE—CIRCUMSTANCES.

In a prosecution for rape, evidence that prosecutrix made complaint is admissible under certain circumstances, but the details thereof are inadmissible, unless they are part of the res gestæ or corroborate prosecutrix's testimony when attacked.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 67-69; Dec. Dig. § 48.*]

10. RAPE (§ 38*)—CORROBORATION.

In a prosecution for rape, evidence of prosecutrix's physical appearance, and the condition where the crime was committed, are admissible in corroboration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 65; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1055*)—APPEAL—SCOPE OF REVIEW—EXCEPTIONS—NECESSITY.

Language of the prosecuting attorney, denunciatory of accused, and assigned as error in a motion for a new trial, will not be considered on appeal, where no exception was taken at the time, and no rulings were asked thereon in the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2666, 2667; Dec. Dig. § 1055.*]

McCulloch and Hart, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Sebastian County; Daniel Hon, Judge.

Elijah Skaggs was convicted of assault, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Elijah Skaggs, Mrs. Margaret Irene Taylor, her brother, Mr. Todd, and a Mr. Allen, came to Ft. Smith in May, 1908, from Dallas, Tex., in and about which place these parties had resided for a number of years. When they reached Ft. Smith they went to a hotel and had dinner together. After they came out of the hotel, the suggestion was made that they see the town, and she proposed going to the park. Her brother proposed that he and Mr. Allen go together, and that she and Skaggs go together. This was agreed to. Her brother and Mr. Allen went somewhere else, and she and Skaggs got on a car and went to the park, some distance from the city. They walked around the park for some time, and then crawled out of the rear fence and went some little distance into the woods. What occurred there will be referred to later. She and Skaggs returned from the park on the same car, but not sitting together, and, immediately upon arrival in the city, she went to the mayor's office, and seemed rather excited. The city clerk told her the mayor was out, and asked her if there was anything she wanted, and she remarked that a rape had been committed. He told her that the mayor had nothing to do with it, and sent her to Sam Edmondson, a justice of the peace, to whom she then went and made complaint. He went out with her and Mr. Todd, her brother, and two officers. They went to the back end of the park, and saw the tracks where a man and woman had walked, and the imprint of the heels of the woman's shoes were similar to those worn by Mrs. Taylor. They found the place where these tracks led to, and it was trampled down, and the appearance of the ground indicated that persons had been scuffling there. Mrs. Taylor exhibited a torn undergarment. Skaggs was arrested, and had a preliminary trial before said magistrate. His conduct in said court was thus afterwards described by the justice of the peace (and Skaggs did not deny it): "Q. I will ask you if you arraigned the defendant, and advised him of the crime with which he was charged? A. I did. Q. What was his answer? A. His answer was that he was guilty of rape, and he was guilty of murder, and I remarked to him if he wanted an attorney, and he said he did not; that he wanted to suffer the penalty of the law for what he had done, and I said to him that that was a very grave matter; that if he entered a plea of guilty in the case, the penalty was hanging, and I said, 'My friend, don't you want a lawyer?' and he said 'No; I am not only guilty of rape, but I am guilty of murder,' and I said I did not know of anybody being killed, how could you be guilty of murder, and he said, 'I am guilty of the crime for which I am accused. I am guilty of murder because I have taken that woman's honor'—and pointed to Mrs. Taylor." Mrs. Taylor testified in said examining court that when they reached the place where the scuffle was indicated, he had grabbed her, and she fought him, but he was strong and overcame her and ravished her, tearing her undergarment in order to accomplish his purpose; and that she immediately came back and made complaint as stated. She repeated this same testimony before the grand jury, and Skaggs was indicted for rape. While he was in jail she visited him four times. There was testimony that the first time she visited him he offered her $500 to withdraw her charge, and she became very angry thereat, but later held long private conversations with him.

Skaggs was put on trial, and the state introduced Mrs. Taylor as the first witness. She testified that she had known Skaggs for four years, during which time he was preaching the gospel; that she believed him to be the King of Kings and Lord of Lords, and Elijah the prophet, and that she was a disciple of his; that before they came to Ft. Smith they made a covenant: The King was to restore all things, and she was willing to be a sacrifice to him; that they went to the park, to have the appearance of having committed an offense which he did not commit, so that he would be hung, in order that all men might have glory and peace and honor. In his testimony he was more explicit as to this covenant: He says that he and Mrs. Taylor agreed that he should die and rise on the third day; that he should die by hanging; that he knows he is King of Kings and Lord of Lords; that he is Elijah, King of the Gentiles, the same as Christ was King of the Jews; that he wanted to be hung, and on the third day rise and redeem the world; that he did not want to murder any one, and in order to accomplish the purpose it was agreed that a rape should be simulated. Mrs. Taylor testified that Skaggs did not ravish her physically; that the rape was a spiritual one. She admitted that her former testimony before the justice of the peace and before the grand jury made out a charge of rape against him, but said that the wrong interpretation had been placed upon it; that she meant a spiritual and not a carnal rape. She says she tore the garment herself, and that he had not touched her. The state proved her former testimony, which she admitted, proved the appearance of a scuffle and the torn garment, and her excited and almost hysterical manner immediately after the occurrence, and also proved that in the trial before the justice of the peace Skaggs in open court confessed that he had raped her, and said that he wanted to be hung therefor. Other testimony was adduced showing admissions which he had made, and which tended to prove that his conduct was actuated by a carnal and not a spiritual mind, and that he had accomplished a physical rape. In his testimony he admitted practically all of the testimony adduced by the state, but claimed that he had committed this spiritual rape for the purpose of being hung and rising on the third day and redeeming the world. He said that he had consulted a lawyer before he went to the park (and this was also proved by the lawyer), to ascertain the punishment for the crime of rape in this state. He averred his readiness to be hung then, but said that he had been told by his best friends that the jury would not hang him, and that, if he pleaded guilty, they would send him to the penitentiary, and he did not want to go to the penitentiary; that he would rather be hung than go to the penitentiary. The defendant introduced the testimony of a deputy constable, who said he saw Mrs. Taylor and Skaggs at the park. He said he saw them turn towards the south side of the park, and they stayed about 30 minutes or a little longer. That he does not think they were out of his sight more than two minutes. The defendant did not touch her while in his sight. He was within about 30 or 40 feet of them when they were south of the park. He did not go out where they claimed they were. He says that he did not stop at the place where the scuffle was alleged by her to have occurred. He says that she was using profane language and cursing Skaggs. Mrs. Taylor was recalled, and denied that she saw this officer, and denied using the language which he attributed to her. This was substantially all the testimony in the case. The jury convicted him of assault with intent to rape, and assessed his punishment at 21 years in the penitentiary. Skaggs has appealed, and the Attorney General confesses error, and the prosecuting attorney of the Twelfth circuit files a brief insisting that there was no error.

Rowe & Rowe, for appellant. Wm. F. Kirby, Atty. Gen., Daniel Taylor, Asst. Atty. Gen., and A. A. McDonald, Pros. Atty., for the State.

HILL, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). 1. The first point upon which the Attorney General confesses error is the absence from the courtroom of the presiding judge. The record on this point reads as follows: "While defendant's counsel was making his argument to the jury, the judge stepped across the hall from the courtroom to the water-closet, and was absent from the courtroom for the space of about two minutes, and while out of the courtroom T. S. Osborne, a regular practicing attorney of the bar, sat in the judge's chair, at the request of the judge. No objection was made to this, and no exception taken to it during the trial." The authorities are not entirely harmonious as to the effect of the absence of a judge from the bench during the progress of a trial. The subject may be found reviewed in Horne v. Rogers, 110 Ga. 362, 35 S. E. 715, 49 L. R. A. 176; Ellerbe v. State, 75 Miss. 522, 22 South. 950, 41 L. R. A. 569. This court had the subject before it in Stokes v. State, 71 Ark. 112, 71 S. W. 248, and the court followed the language of Judge Chalmers in Turbeville v. State, 56 Miss. 793, a leading case on the subject. The Turbeville decision is applicable here, as shown by the following excerpts: "During the arguments of counsel to the jury, the judge left the bench, and stepped into a room immediately adjoining and in the rear of the bench, and separated from it only by the thickness of the wall, through which a door opened. He placed a member of the bar on the bench, with instructions to call or notify him if needed. He remained in this room, thus absent from the bench, and distant from it, as the bill of exceptions shows, 5 or 6 feet, during the greater portion of the time consumed in the several addresses of counsel to the jury. It does not appear whether the door which opened from the bench or rostrum into this room (styled the judge's 'retiring room') was closed or open while the judge was thus absent. * * * If we could consider this statement of the facts as showing such absence from the room, on the part of the judge, as constituted even a temporary relinquishment of the control of the court and of the conduct of the trial, we should unhesitatingly reverse the judgment. There can be no court without a judge, and his presence, and the presiding genius of the trial, is as essential during the argument as at any other time. We do not mean to say that he must actually listen to every word that falls from the lips of counsel while they are addressing the jury, for this might impose a burden too heavy to be borne, but we do mean that the conduct and control of the argument within legitimate limits is confined to him as a judicial duty, and cannot be by him devolved upon another. While he will not be precluded from changing his seat to any portion of the room he may prefer, or from temporarily engaging in conversation, or reading, or writing, he must remain within the hearing of counsel, so as to be able instantly to assert his authority, if demanded by anything that may occur. While it will rarely be necessary or proper for him to interfere with counsel, instances may arise that will require it; and, moreover, the conduct of the jurors, spectators, or officers of court may be such as to demand the instant interposition of his authority. * * * The bill of exceptions in this case fails to show clearly that there was any relinquishment by the judge of the functions of his office, or any such bodily absence as prevented their instant assertion when demanded; and we decline, on this account, to reverse the judgment."

It is thus seen that the determining test is whether the judge has lost control of the proceedings. If he has done so, even if it be but for a short time, the integrity of the trial is destroyed. Applying that principle here, the record fails to show that the judge was out of hearing of the proceedings of the court when he stepped across the hall to a closet for a brief space of time. It does not disclose the distance from the courtroom to the closet, or whether the doors were opened or closed, or whether the proceedings could or could not be heard by him. The matter then before the court was the address of the defendant's counsel to the jury. The trial having taken place in June, and the doors between courtrooms and halls at that time of the year being usually left open, it may well be inferred that the judge was within the hearing of the proceedings of the trial, and within the reach of it, so that he could instantly have asserted his authority. On the other hand, it may have been that the doors were closed, or that the closet was in such a position that he was withdrawn entirely from hearing the proceedings, and was unable to instantly control them, in which event it would vitiate the trial. The burden is on the appellant to show affirmatively that the judge had lost control of the trial; and this record fails to show that, leaving it, at best, a matter of conjecture as to whether or not he had removed himself for a brief period of time from the immediate presence of the proceedings, where he could not exercise his legitimate functions as presiding judge of the court.

2. The next confession of error is for the giving of the fourth instruction, which is as follows: "If you find from the evidence that the defendant made a confession that he had committed the crime of rape on the person of Margaret Irene Taylor, that alone would not be sufficient to authorize you to convict; but the confession of defendant, if made, accompanied by proof that the offense was actually committed, will warrant a conviction, and if you find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant made the confession of the crime, and that the crime was committed, you should convict." The Attorney General says that, under Duckworth v. State, 88 Ark. 192, 103 S. W. 601, and Thomas v. State, 85 Ark. 138, 107 S. W. 390, this instruction is erroneous. This is not an instruction on the weight of the evidence, and is not obnoxious to the objection for
